Supporters of the ballot efforts in the West — often called "Kelo-plus" — say they want to stop so-called regulatory takings, the idea that government effectively takes private property when zoning laws limit how it can be used.

Opponents say the regulatory-takings initiatives are essentially a ruse, that they are trying to exploit anger over the Kelo decision and eminent domain to roll back zoning regulations that are critical to controlling growth, protecting the environment and preserving property values.

The more far-reaching proposals in the West — in Idaho, Arizona, California and Washington State — are citizens' initiatives supported by signature petitions, and they are often supported financially and logistically by national libertarian groups.

This House Is My Home, a group based in Boise that is sponsoring the Idaho measure, Proposition 2, is among groups in several states that have received strong financial help from Fund for Democracy, headed by Howard S. Rich, the New York real estate investor who is chairman of the libertarian group Americans for Limited Government. As of late June, Fund for Democracy had given at least $237,000 to This House Is My Home, about two-thirds of the money raised by the group. The next filing deadline is Oct. 10.

"We are essentially a 'networking station' that brings together grass-roots activists, donors and community leaders who share a common interest," John Tillman, president of Americans for Limited Government, said in an e-mail message. "In this case, that common interest is in restoring property rights for the average citizen."

Affluent outsiders have been drawn to Idaho in recent decades, lured by technology jobs, mountain recreation and abundant sunshine. Boise, the capital, has boomed, as has Sun Valley, where newcomers from California build second homes not far from ranchers who herd sheep over the Sawtooth Mountains. About two-thirds of Idaho land is under federal control, and frustration runs deep in rural areas with newcomers who, after buying their piece of paradise, try to restrict land use further in the name of preservation and environmentalism.

"Katie's family, my family, they did this great job of developing this country," said Rob Struthers, 59, Ms. Breckenridge's partner in life and work. "Now all these people come in and say, 'Wow, what a beautiful place.' But they don't trust us to keep it that way. Instead of rewarding us, they're penalizing us."

In an era of sun-splashed subdivisions, land here can be a farmer's greatest asset. Mr. Ribi, the councilman, expressed some sympathy for farmers who have been "down-zoned" under a new county plan.

But Mr. Ribi, a venture capitalist, is trying to galvanize opposition to the initiative by tapping the same independent streak that may make some anti-government Idahoans interested in the measure.

"These are guys on the right wing who always want local control and all of a sudden they're saying let's let these guys from Washington, D.C., and outside think tanks have control," Mr. Ribi said. "That's why I think we've lost perspective."

If the Supreme Court ruling in the Connecticut case inflamed passions for property rights, the initiatives in the Western states are more directly rooted in events in Oregon. In 2004, Oregon voters passed a measure that allowed property owners to file claims that zoning restrictions had hurt their property value. That law, known as Measure 37, requires government to either pay for the lost value or waive the zoning rules if an owner makes a successful claim.

About 2,400 claims totaling more than $5.6 billion have been filed since the measure was upheld in court this spring, according to the Oregon Department of Land and Conservation Development. "Not a penny" has been paid to property owners, said Sheila A. Martin, director of the Institute of Portland Metropolitan Studies at Portland State University. Local governments, lacking money to pay, have simply waived the zoning rules.

But while Measure 37 grew out of frustration with Oregon's famously strict zoning rules, Idaho does not have such comprehensive restrictions. Even if some rural landowners are frustrated with new zoning rules, said Stephanie Witt, director of the Center for Public Policy at Boise State University, "It's not like people are rebelling against this really restrictive growth management law."

The Castle Coalition, a property rights group that has fought for eminent domain overhauls, does not list a single "eminent domain abuse" case in Idaho on its Web site. It calls Idaho "one of the best states in the country for protecting owners from eminent domain abuse."

John Eaton, government affairs director for the Idaho Association of Realtors, said the initiative "blows up the stability that we have right now."

"We're the property rights people but we're not going to support this," he said. "This is crazy."

Ms. Breckenridge, dusty boots on the mat by the door, was not ready to predict how the vote might go up in swank Sun Valley or down in urban Boise. Closer to home, however, she was confident.

"Everybody that's connected to the land is going to vote for it," she said, "because there's an anger, a rising anger."

IMMIGRATION:

In New York Immigration Court, Asylum Roulette (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

Tears streaked Meizi Liu's face in 2003 as she told an immigration judge in New York of being forcibly sterilized in China. The judge, Jeffrey S. Chase, had won awards as a human rights advocate before his appointment to the bench in 1995. But now he had 1,000 pending cases, and he had heard it all before.

He insisted that she was lying, ridiculed her story and, when she would not recant, denied her petition for asylum.

The tables turned after appeals by Ms. Liu and others reached federal court this year. In scathing decisions, the court rebuked Judge Chase for "pervasive bias and hostility," "combative and insulting language" and remarks "implying that any asylum claim based on China's coercive family planning policies would be presumed incredible."

It is always judgment day in the windowless courtrooms where immigrants plead to stay in the United States. But these days, as never before, the nation's 218 immigration judges are also being judged, even as they struggle to complete 350,000 cases a year amid an immigration debate that promises to send them many more.

Appeals courts criticize some judges by name, citing abusive behavior and bad decisions. Studies highlight stark disparities in judgment, like 90 percent of asylum cases granted by one judge and 9 percent down the hall. Faced with mounting criticism, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales vowed to introduce yearly performance evaluations of the judges, who are Justice Department employees. The Harvard Law Review urged a campaign to turn the five worst judges into "media villains" to motivate reform.

Yet a more complicated picture emerges in the federal building in Lower Manhattan. There, Judge Chase, who colleagues say is chastened since being rebuked, is one of 27 immigration judges searching for ways to handle 20,000 cases a year, driven as much by scarce resources and escalating demands as by quirks of personality and power.

In asylum cases, the wrong decision can be a death sentence. In others, banishment hangs in the balance, with the prospect of families split up or swept into harm's way. But before they can consider the merits of a case, judges must cope with an intricate web of laws, changing conditions in distant lands, and a mix of false and truthful testimony in 227 tongues vulnerable to an interpreter's mistake as small as pronouncing "rebels" like "robbers."

As the caseload has grown, spurred in part by stepped-up enforcement, so has the pace demanded by "case completion goals" set in Washington.

To stay afloat, New York judges schedule 30 to 70 cases at a time, hold 4 contested hearings a day and decide more than 15 cases a week, all without law clerks, bailiffs, stenographers or enough competent lawyers.

"The court is a stepchild of the whole immigration system," said Sandra Coleman, who spent years on the immigration bench in Miami. "They want to make the judges the villains, and there are judges who are villains, I don't deny that. But the problem is the system."

Many federal judges agree. "I fail to see how immigration judges can be expected to make thorough and competent findings of fact and conclusions of law under these circumstances," John M. Walker Jr., chief judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, told the Senate Judiciary Committee in April, urging that the number of immigration judges be doubled.

With one of the largest caseloads among the nation's 53 immigration courts, and with nearly half its cases concerning asylum, New York illustrates the crunch that judges face in many big cities where complicated matters crowd the docket.

Caseloads exploded in the 1990's. In 2000, an unpublished report by a Justice Department evaluation team warned that New York judges were "reaching the point of exhaustion and burnout."

The report urged a slower pace and an increase in the staff-judge ratio to three to one from two to one. Instead, an evaluation last year found that the ratio had slipped even lower.

Justice Department rules do not allow immigration judges to speak to reporters. But weeks of observation, court records and interviews with lawyers, clerks, interpreters and immigrants show that the judges are coping in very different ways, with far-reaching consequences.

Patricia Rohan, who keeps a twinkling Statue of Liberty lamp in her chambers, is recognized after 24 years on the bench as a model of soft-spoken fairness and efficiency.

On a recent weekday, with 575 cases pending, she patiently took notes as a man who shells fish explained why deportation to Gambia would put his Bronx-born daughters at risk of genital mutilation. She gently questioned an Ecuadorean cleaning woman of 55 who avowed that love, not a green card, had prompted her marriage to an American 15 years after she immigrated illegally. Teasing out supporting evidence in both cases, Judge Rohan dictated favorable decisions into an aging tape recorder.

Other judges have a different approach. Sandy K. Hom, appointed in 1993, is also invariably polite, but so quick and predictable in his denials of asylum — 91 percent in recent years, compared with Judge Rohan's 25 percent — that lawyers regularly advise people assigned to him to move to another state.

Given his speed, he has the fewest pending cases, about 345. But many of his decisions have been rejected on appeal, including one in which he denied asylum to a widowed Armenian Christian and her children and ordered them deported to Iraq, arguing that since Saddam Hussein's ouster, they had no reason to fear religious persecution.

In another case, records show, he mixed up the medical documents presented by Janeta Kutina, a 69-year-old Latvian woman of Jewish heritage, confusing the deaths of her father and her husband, both victims of anti-Semitic violence. Then, the appeals court found, he cited his own mistake as evidence that her account was inconsistent.

Down the hall and at the other end of the spectrum, Margaret McManus grants asylum at the highest rate in the country — 90 percent — but at the price of what Kevin Kerr, president of the clerks' and interpreters' union local, complains is a chaotic calendar with 931 pending cases. She typically reschedules cases until petitioners can secure supporting documents, pursue other avenues or find lawyers.

A judge's fact-finding is much harder without a lawyer to speak for those facing deportation, who are not entitled to court-appointed counsel. Many get what the 2000 Justice Department report called "the high-volume, low-margin, piecework approach" practiced by "an unsavory subculture" of "travel agency" lawyers. Nor do government lawyers know each case.

Judge Chase's trajectory illustrates why those judges unable to come to terms with the system's deficiencies may risk losing their judicial bearings.

As a young immigration lawyer, he joined rallies on behalf of Chinese asylum-seekers and gave other lawyers videotaped lessons on asylum.

"Some of the judges will have their minds made up before they enter the courtroom, depending on the country an immigrant is from," Mr. Chase, whose wife immigrated from Iran, told a Newsday reporter in 1995. "A judge needs to start each case with a clean slate and listen to the lawyer and the applicant. Rather than have that look on his face of 'Why are you wasting my time?' "

But before long, incredulous tirades became his trademark in many Chinese asylum cases, according to court records and interviews with a dozen lawyers. Openly frustrated with a pattern of boilerplate claims that he suspected had been concocted by smugglers, he applied his own tests of honesty.

In September 1999, at the first court appearance of Guo-Le Huang, who said his wife had been forced to have an abortion in her last month of pregnancy, Judge Chase rejected the man's assertion that he was not working because he lacked papers.

"That is the most ridiculous thing I have ever heard," Judge Chase said, setting the tone he would take with Mr. Huang over two years. "I'm not going to waste my court time on this case." He questioned why Mr. Huang lived in a Hispanic neighborhood, interrupted an account of persecution with sarcasm and berated him for giving up his firstborn for adoption because she was a girl, calling the act "sexist" and "inhumane."

In the harried world of immigration court, many lawyers seemed to accept his tactics as an idiosyncratic tool, not unlike the long wooden claw that another judge, lacking a clerk, uses to hand down documents. And, statistics show, Judge Chase granted 42 percent of the 2,729 asylum requests he heard through 2004, including 250 of 943 from China.

"He's trying very hard to get to the truth," said one lawyer, Robert Murtha. "A lot of these people, if you look behind the foolish lies they're telling, they really do have a case. But the lawyer that they go to adapts their story to conform with the pattern, and it does drive him crazy."

Another lawyer, Peter Lobel, described Judge Chase as a "deeply caring man," whose approach was " 'I don't care what your claim is, just be honest with me.' " But he added, "He got so it was like an interrogation."

Several lawyers credited Judge Chase with unusual generosity to petitioners who admitted to falsehoods — no help to those who maintained they were telling the truth. Ms. Liu, now 39, the asylum-seeker who told of being forcibly sterilized, testified that family-planning cadres in China subjected her to painful uterine surgery when her second child was a baby. She fled in 2000, leaving her children in hopes of reunion in America.

"The judge said, 'You have been lying all day, but if you admit to lying, I will grant your case,' " Ms. Liu recalled through an interpreter. "I was very angry, because everything I said was true."

In 2003, she appealed his denial to the Board of Immigration Appeals, the internal review body. But a year earlier, its reviews had been sharply curtailed when John Ashcroft, then attorney general, cut board membership to 11 from 23 and set tight deadlines to reduce a large backlog. Single board members issued 50 decisions a day, typically one-sentence rulings affirming denials.

Like Ms. Liu, many of those who received such decisions turned to federal court. Second Circuit filings jumped 53 percent; it is finding merit in 20 percent of the immigration appeals, returning them for revision.

Ms. Liu's case was remanded in February, and lawyers say Judge Chase tried to change. But in July, the 2001 Huang case caught up with him, in a blistering Second Circuit decision prominently published in The New York Law Journal.

Mr. Lobel described the judge as devastated and braced for more: "He said, 'I learned my lesson, but some of these cases are still in the pipeline.' "

Ms. Liu is still waiting, too, and worrying about which judge will decide her family's fate.

New Wall Not Expected To Stop Migrants (AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Rising from the Pacific surf and zig-zagging along the border for 14 miles, Tijuana's border fence has done little but push illegal migrants into the Arizona desert and feed the smuggling industry since it went up in 1994.

Today, as the U.S. prepares to build a high-tech barrier with 700 miles of extra fencing, motion detectors and remote controlled devices, smugglers are already figuring out how to beat the new security.

Even before President Bush signed the $1.2 billion funding bill Wednesday to strengthen busy crossing points, border patrol figures indicated that smugglers have been hiding more migrants in vehicles, or diverting them across one of the most inhospitable sections of the border — a mountainous stretch of searing desert near Yuma, Ariz.

Some experts predict smugglers could turn to boats and tunnels, two methods popular with drug smugglers but seldom used by migrant traffickers.

"It doesn't matter what they do. There isn't a wall that can stop people because there will always be someone who finds a way to cross," said 37-year-old Jose Lopez, a construction worker who said he had just been deported to Tijuana after being detained in San Francisco.

Because he has three children still in the U.S., Lopez is considering crossing again, even though he risks three years in jail because of prior arrests for carrying fake ID.

No amount of border security will stop illegal immigration; the reality is that roughly half the estimated 12 million undocumented foreigners in the United States entered on bona fide visas and stayed after they expired.

While the interview process for visas has become tougher, it has failed to stop these so-called "overstays" from reaching for the American dream.

If they cannot get a visa, there's a smuggling business that moves millions of people from Mexican towns to employers throughout the United States.

The increased enforcement that began with Operation Gatekeeper in 1994 — and produced the corrugated metal and chain-link fence — dramatically cut illegal border crossings in the Tijuana-San Diego area, but overall, they kept their pace. Total arrests along the nearly 2,000-mile border with Mexico has ebbed and flowed since then but changed little: 1.3 million in 1995, compared with 1.2 million in 2005.

Trafficking has flourished; the average price for being smuggled through a port of entry in the Tijuana-San Diego area — usually in the trunk of a car or using false or borrowed documents — shot up from $300 in 1994 to $2,500. Crossing through the Arizona desert can cost up to $1,800.

Jose Ramos, a professor and researcher at the Tijuana-based Colegio de la Frontera Norte, a think-tank focused on border affairs, expects smugglers to charge even more as they look for new ways to cross.

"These organizations will have to innovate, become more sophisticated, and for the migrant that will mean an even higher cost," Ramos said. "It wouldn't surprise me if smugglers began crossing migrants through underground tunnels or began using boats."

In Altar, a Mexican farming town of 7,000 and a gathering point for those heading to Arizona, hundreds of men carrying backpacks and jugs of water mill around the town's plaza. They are waiting for their smugglers to drive them to the final staging area, Sasabe, which borders on the sparsely populated Tohono O'odham Indian reservation on the U.S. side.

Hiking for days through snake-infested desert under a broiling sun, some don't survive. Still, the paths through the desert near Sasabe are less hostile than the terrain near Yuma, which is expected to become the next big crossing area.

Other migrants are locked in the back of tractor-trailers, stuffed in hollowed-out dashboards or hidden in car engines, risking suffocation and heat exhaustion.

From Oct. 1, 2005, to Sept. 15 of this year, 426 people died while illegally crossing the border, and the Colegio de la Frontera Norte says the death toll since 1994 is about 3,700.

"More walls will make it more difficult for migrants to cross, but they will keep trying, even if they risk dying," said Luis Kendzierski, a priest who directs a Tijuana migrant shelter.

Often, migrants too tired or poor to attempt another crossing end up staying just south of the border. Ramos said Tijuana's population has more than doubled to about 1.3 million since the U.S. crackdown began.

"This has created all sorts of problems for Tijuana, and many other border cities where this happens, because they lack the necessary public services," he said.

Jesus Villalobos, 31, deported from Los Angeles a week ago, plans to hire a smuggler before crossing again — as soon as possible, to beat the new security measures.

"I need to get back because my daughter is there, my life is there," Villalobos said while resting at a migrant shelter in Tijuana.

"It's already dangerous to cross, and with another wall it will only get more dangerous and expensive."

Associated Press reporter Luis Perez contributed to this story from Tijuana.

A Country Of Newcomers (LAT)

By William H. Frey

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Americans need a more rational discussion of immigration, which is the driving force for population growth.

NEARLY 30 years ago, President Lyndon B. Johnson stood before the U.S. Census Bureau's Population Clock to proclaim the arrival of the 200-millionth American.

But don't expect President Bush to do the same when the 300-millionth American is anointed within a week or so.

This time around, because of the milestone's connection with the politically charged issue of immigration, and because of the backlash immigrants have generated in much of the country, the president most likely will remain quiet.

Because the truth is, it is immigration that is driving the growth of the U.S. population. In fact, odds are that the 300-millionth American will be the child of immigrants or an immigrant himself — as likely as not born or residing in Los Angeles. Right now, about half of U.S. population growth in any given year or month is attributable (through migration or natural increase) to Latinos, the vast majority of whom are either first- or second-generation Americans. To celebrate this fact publicly just a few weeks before the midterm elections would be tantamount to rolling the political dice.

The volatility of this issue has much to do with the culture clash that this 300-millionth American symbolizes: He or she is arriving, after all, in a profoundly different mainstream America than 30 years ago.

At the heart of of this mainstream are the baby boomers, who now comprise most adults over age 40. This much-ballyhooed generation came to embody the image of middle America during the second half of the last century. Conceived during the prosperous post-World War II period, they brought a rebellious, progressive sensibility to the country in the 1960s and '70s and beyond. With the help of the programs of the Great Society, they became the most well-schooled generation to date and the epitome of America's largely white suburban middle class with which most of today's adults now identify.

Yet, the boomers also came of age at a moment when the U.S. was becoming more insular than it had been before; they, in fact, had less exposure to immigrants and foreign wars than their parents. From 1946 to 1964, the years of the boom, the immigrant share of the U.S. population shrunk to an all-time low (under 5%), and those who did arrive were largely whites from Europe.

Despite their interest in righting domestic wrongs, such as racial discrimination, and bursting glass ceilings, boomers did not have much interaction with people from other countries.

Perhaps it should come as no surprise then that the once liberal baby boomers — who now constitute the core of middle-aged middle America — should be resistant to the country's new younger generation, increasingly made up of first- and second-generation Latin Americans and Asians.

This is especially the case as these newcomers spill out to a heartland which, until recently, was strewn with modern-day "Leave It to Beaver" communities — a dispersal that has spawned about 500 largely anti-immigrant bills introduced in the first half of this year, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

What used to be thought of as white flight on the part of the previous generation, which flocked to the suburbs during the 1950s and '60s, is now taking the form of "white fright." Indeed, a Pew Research Center survey in March shows that more than half of the population over 50 believes that immigrants are a burden because they take housing, jobs and healthcare.

Yet, there is actually little need to worry about immigration. It adds a needed youthful element to a population that would become stagnant if it had to rely on the far-below-replacement fertility of the nation's aging native-born whites. Their infusion into the workforce will be especially useful to retiring boomers who wish to be supported in their golden years.

The low immigration years, through which most of today's adult population grew up, were atypical in our history. The "pull yourself up by the bootstrap" attitudes of the early 20th century foreign-stock generations, who survived the Depression and World War II, created the circumstances that made way for the baby boomers.

THE SAME KIND of can-do attitudes are evident among early 21st century immigrants and their children, who show a willingness to work hard, learn English, move to the suburbs and achieve the American dream.

Today's immigration debate is both emotionally and politically charged, but a more rational discussion is possible once the dust settles after the November elections. Such a discussion should move beyond the immediate illegal immigration rancor and focus on how best to provide our newcomers and their children a pathway to the middle class — the same path we and our parents were handed.

Meanwhile, let's celebrate the arrival of the 300-millionth American, be he from across the border or born to a Latino mother here in Southern California. He may not be a boomer, but he is our future.

The 300 Millionth Footprint On U.S. Soil (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

By one count, more than half of all the people who have ever lived in the United States are living today. And their ranks are expanding. On any given day, 11,000 babies are born and 3,000 immigrants arrive, outnumbering the people who die or emigrate.

At the current rate, the person who tips the population past 300 million will emerge in a week or so.

The recent surge of immigrants actually makes America's diversity closer to what it was in 1915, when the 100 millionth arrived, than in 1967, when the 200 millionth was born (chances are nearly even that a baby born today will be Hispanic). At all three milestones, the nation was either on the verge of war or already in one.

An American born today will most likely have fewer siblings, delay marriage and other trappings of adulthood, retire later and live longer.

There's a good chance that the 100 millionth did not live long enough to witness the birth of the 200 millionth. The 300 millionth will be only at the midpoint of life when, according to today's estimates, the 400 millionth is born, sometime around 2050.

Getting A Handle On Illegal Immigrant Crime Difficult (HC)

By Peggy O'hare

Houston Chronicle, October 8, 2006

Numbers are sketchy, but some experts agree group adds strain

The slaying of Houston police officer Rodney Johnson by a Mexican national who returned here after being deported has cast another uncomfortable spotlight on the estimated 400,000 illegal immigrants living in the Greater Houston metropolitan area.

Making up about 10 percent of the area's population, this demographic — alternately scorned as freeloaders and defended as hard workers seeking better lives — accounts for 7 percent to 9 percent of those caught up in the local criminal justice system as inmates or defendants.

While various agencies acknowledge such statistics are incomplete, the numbers nonetheless indicate that immigrants living here without authorization have an impact on Harris County's courts and jails, as well as the state's prisons.

Even a single-digit assessment of 7 percent to 9 percent of the people flowing into the doors of these various entities can involve thousands of people and millions of dollars each year.

"I believe it has created a tremendous burden on the criminal justice system," said U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Austin, who hosted a congressional subcommittee hearing on the immigration controversy in Houston six weeks ago. "Any percentage of illegal aliens coming in the United States with a criminal history is unacceptable, whether it's 1 percent or 10 percent. All you have to do is talk to the family of Rodney Johnson to verify that."

Still, academics who have studied the immigrant population for years caution against making sweeping judgments of a vast population segment they say is unfairly suffering public wrath for the actions of a few.

With the number of deportations at an all-time high, they question critics' assessment of how Houston should control this burgeoning population.

"The laws are very tough already. I'm not sure there needs to be a toughening-up of the laws," said Joseph Vail, director of the University of Houston Law Center's Immigration Clinic, which represents indigent migrants in immigration matters.

"There may need to be a more effective use of the laws. But the laws already are very tough, and they've been that way since 1996," he said, referring to the passage of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, which vastly expanded the number of offenses that can lead to deportation.

While Vail questions how accurate the estimated numbers of illegal immigrants might be, he understands the volatility surrounding the issue, especially considering the recent outrage over Johnson's death.

"Any alien who's here unlawfully and is arrested or convicted of a crime and has to be incarcerated at taxpayer expense is a burden," Vail said.

Costing millions of dollarsA paucity of statistics makes it difficult to assess how much impact illegal immigrants actually have on public safety and the criminal justice system.

But the inmate populations in the Harris County Jail and state prisons — and the nearly 81,000 defendants referred to the county's local Pretrial Services each year — offer some clues.

According to testimony from Harris County sheriff's Maj. Michael O'Brien at a recent U.S. House subcommittee hearing hosted by McCaul in Houston, the Sheriff's Department spent more than 15 percent of its budget in the most recent fiscal year to investigate, arrest, process, incarcerate and provide medical care to illegal immigrants.

At the time, O'Brien testified, this amounted to more than $41 million, but sheriff's officials said Friday that the actual cost attributed just to those who willingly admitted to being in the U.S. illegally was probably closer to $28 million.

The Texas Department of Criminal Justice, meanwhile, estimated it cost $132 million to incarcerate illegal immigrants in its prisons during the 2005 fiscal year, according to testimony given by a TDCJ official at McCaul's hearing.

Both agencies recovered only a fraction of the money spent through a federal grant program designed to help state and local governments with the costs of incarcerating the undocumented.

Under the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program administered by the U.S. Department of Justice, Texas' state prison system recovered more than $18.5 million — just 14 percent of what it spent locking up undocumented immigrants in its facilities that year.

The Harris County Sheriff's Department, meanwhile, recovered about 10 percent of its costs from the same federal program — or about $2.7 million — which left the rest of the bill to be shouldered by taxpayers.

Harris County received the second-highest payment of any governmental agency in Texas, second only to the prison system.

Records provided by the federal funding program show Harris County locked up 972 illegal immigrants for at least four days in its jail facilities throughout the fiscal year, along with 3,104 other inmates whose immigration status was unknown. Those who spent less than four days in jail weren't counted.

Courts feel impact, tooThe Texas prison system, meanwhile, incarcerated 7,863 undocumented migrants in that same time period, along with 3,852 more inmates whose immigration status remained in question.

A survey of the state prison system's total population on May 31 revealed that nearly 7 percent of the inmates — 10,376 people — said they were foreign citizens, said TDCJ spokeswoman Michelle Lyons.

Slightly more than 4 percent of those locked up in state prisons at that time — 6,612 inmates — have been ordered turned over to federal immigration authorities' custody once they finish serving their state sentences at TDCJ, Lyons said.

Undocumented immigrants also have an impact on Harris County's courts. About 16 percent of those defendants interviewed by Harris County Pretrial Services last year — almost 13,000 of the nearly 81,000 questioned — reported they were not U.S. citizens, said director Carol Oeller.

More than 7,500 of those defendants — about 9 percent of all those interviewed — acknowledged they came here without authorized documentation, Oeller said.

That latter percentage is not much of a change from years past, she said.

Pretrial Services officers do not seek to enforce immigration laws or alert federal authorities of an undocumented immigrant's presence, Oeller said.

"During the course of a defendant interview, we ask, 'Are you a U.S. citizen?' If they say no, the officer will say, 'What documents do you have to be in this country?' We don't see the papers," Oeller said. Based on their answers, defendants are recorded in the court files as legal residents, undocumented immigrants or guests with visas or work permits.

"From our perspective, there are Supreme Court and lower court case laws that say someone who is a non-U.S. citizen is entitled to the same due process as a U.S. citizen," she said.

Years-long debateOne of the country's leading experts on the undocumented-immigrant population's size estimates there are nearly 400,000 such people living in the Greater Houston metropolitan area — making up about 10 percent of the total population.

Jeffrey Passel, a senior research associate at the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington, D.C., estimated that 11.1 million undocumented immigrants were living in the U.S. in March 2005. He concluded that Texas ranked second among states having the most undocumented immigrants, estimating 1.4 million to 1.6 million lived in the Lone Star State at that time.

While such numbers will always be subject to debate, academics and politicians say the undocumented-immigrant population likely will remain an explosive issue for years to come.

"Illegal immigrants are the Willie Horton of the 2006 elections," said criminologist Ramiro Martinez, a visiting scholar who recently arrived at the UH Center for Mexican American Studies to research how Latinos impact Houston crime.

(Horton, a convicted murderer who raped a woman while on furlough from prison, was the focus of a controversial political ad during the 1988 presidential campaign.)

Despite the numbers, Martinez expects to find Latino homicides and violent crimes are lower than expected in areas of Houston having large immigrant populations.

That's because studies across the country have shown the number of immigrants in a community rarely influences the level of crime — and indicate areas with high concentrations of immigrants are safer, he said.

TAX:

As Exemptions Grow, Religion Outweighs Regulation (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

At any moment, state inspectors can step uninvited into one of the three child care centers that Ethel White runs in Auburn, Ala., to make sure they meet state requirements intended to ensure that the children are safe. There must be continuing training for the staff. Her nurseries must have two sinks, one exclusively for food preparation. All cabinets must have safety locks. Medications for the children must be kept under lock and key, and refrigerated.

The Rev. Ray Fuson of the Harvest Temple Church of God in Montgomery, Ala., does not have to worry about unannounced state inspections at the day care center his church runs. Alabama exempts church day care programs from state licensing requirements, which were tightened after almost a dozen children died in licensed and unlicensed day care centers in the state in two years.

The differences do not end there. As an employer, Ms. White must comply with the civil rights laws; if employees feel mistreated, they can take the center to court. Religious organizations, including Pastor Fuson's, are protected by the courts from almost all lawsuits filed by their ministers or other religious staff members, no matter how unfairly those employees think they have been treated.

And if you are curious about how Ms. White's nonprofit center uses its public grants and donations, read the financial statements she is required to file each year with the Internal Revenue Service. There are no I.R.S. reports from Harvest Temple. Federal law does not require churches to file them.

Far more than an hourlong stretch of highway separates these two busy, cheerful day care centers. Ms. White's center operates in the world occupied by most American organizations. As a religious ministry, Pastor Fuson's center does not.

In recent years, many politicians and commentators have cited what they consider a nationwide "war on religion" that exposes religious organizations to hostility and discrimination. But such organizations — from mainline Presbyterian and Methodist churches to mosques to synagogues to Hindu temples — enjoy an abundance of exemptions from regulations and taxes. And the number is multiplying rapidly.

Some of the exceptions have existed for much of the nation's history, originally devised for Christian churches but expanded to other faiths as the nation has become more religiously diverse. But many have been granted in just the last 15 years — sometimes added to legislation, anonymously and with little attention, much as are the widely criticized "earmarks" benefiting other special interests.

An analysis by The New York Times of laws passed since 1989 shows that more than 200 special arrangements, protections or exemptions for religious groups or their adherents were tucked into Congressional legislation, covering topics ranging from pensions to immigration to land use. New breaks have also been provided by a host of pivotal court decisions at the state and federal level, and by numerous rule changes in almost every department and agency of the executive branch.

The special breaks amount to "a sort of religious affirmative action program," said John Witte Jr., director of the Center for the Study of Law and Religion at the Emory University law school.

Professor Witte added: "Separation of church and state was certainly part of American law when many of today's public opinion makers were in school. But separation of church and state is no longer the law of the land."

The changes reflect, in part, the growing political influence of religious groups and the growing presence of conservatives in the courts and regulatory agencies. But these tax and regulatory breaks have been endorsed by politicians of both major political parties, by judges around the country, and at all levels of government.

"The religious community has a lot of pull, and senators are very deferential to this kind of legislation," said Richard R. Hammar, the editor of Church Law & Tax Report and an accountant with law and divinity degrees from Harvard.

As a result of these special breaks, religious organizations of all faiths stand in a position that American businesses — and the thousands of nonprofit groups without that "religious" label — can only envy. And the new breaks come at a time when many religious organizations are expanding into activities — from day care centers to funeral homes, from ice cream parlors to fitness clubs, from bookstores to broadcasters — that compete with these same businesses and nonprofit organizations.

Religious organizations are exempt from many federal, state and local laws and regulations covering social services, including addiction treatment centers and child care, like those in Alabama.

Federal law gives religious congregations unique tools to challenge government restrictions on the way they use their land. Consequently, land-use restrictions that are a result of longstanding public demands for open space or historic preservation may be trumped by a religious ministry's construction plans, as in a current dispute in Boulder County, Colo.

Exemptions in the civil rights laws protect religious employers from all legal complaints about faith-based preferences in hiring. The courts have shielded them from many complaints about other forms of discrimination, whether based on race, nationality, age, gender, medical condition or sexual orientation. And most religious organizations have been exempted from federal laws meant to protect pensions and to provide unemployment benefits.

Governments have been as generous with tax breaks as with regulatory exemptions. Congress has imposed limits on the I.R.S.'s ability to audit churches, synagogues and other religious congregations. And beyond the federal income tax exemption they share with all nonprofit groups, houses of worship have long been granted an exemption from local property taxes in every state.

As religious activities expand far beyond weekly worship, that venerable tax break is expanding, too. In recent years, a church-run fitness center with a tanning bed and video arcade in Minnesota, a biblical theme park in Florida, a ministry's 1,800-acre training retreat and conference center in Michigan, religious broadcasters' transmission towers in Washington State, and housing for teachers at church-run schools in Alaska have all been granted tax breaks by local officials — or, when they balked, by the courts or state legislators.

These organizations and their leaders still rely on public services — police and fire protection, street lights and storm drains, highway and bridge maintenance, food and drug inspections, national defense. But their tax exemptions shift the cost of providing those benefits onto other citizens. The total cost nationwide is not known, because no one keeps track.

When Values Collide

Few Americans dispute the value of protecting religious liberty. The framers of the Constitution opened the First Amendment of the Bill of Rights with language preserving religious freedom with two clear goals in mind, constitutional scholars agree.

First, they wanted to assure that everyone, even members of small and possibly unpopular sects, could practice their faith without fearing the kind of persecution that many had experienced in their home countries, where a dominant religion was allied with the state. Just as important, the framers wanted to prevent the government from ever being captive to a particular religion or set of beliefs at the expense of people of other faiths.

Over the last two centuries, many scholars say, this tradition of religious freedom and tolerance, a radical concept in the 18th century, has helped this country avoid the spasms of sectarian violence that have erupted in countries from Ireland to India and attracted immigrants bringing talents from across the world.

Some legal scholars and judges see the special breaks for religious groups as a way to prevent government from infringing on those religious freedoms.

"Never forget that the exercise of religion is a constitutionally protected activity," said Douglas Laycock, a law professor at the University of Michigan who has written and testified in support of greater legislative protection for religious liberty. "Regulation imposes burdens on the free exercise of religion. Exemptions lift those burdens." He added, "That is constitutionally a good thing."

Precious as protecting religious freedom is, however, there are cases where these special breaks collide with other values important in this country — like extending the protections of government to all citizens and sharing the responsibilities of society fairly.

Religious organizations defend the exemptions as a way to recognize the benefits religious groups have provided — operating schools, orphanages, old-age homes and hospitals long before social welfare and education were widely seen as the responsibility of government.

But while ministries that run soup kitchens and homeless shelters benefit from these exemptions, secular nonprofits serving the same needy people often do not. And rather than just rewarding charitable works that benefit society, these breaks are equally available to religious organizations that provide no charitable services to anyone.

Similarly, religious nonprofit groups that run nationwide broadcasting networks, produce best-selling publications or showcase a charismatic leader's books and speeches can take advantage of exemptions that are not available to secular nonprofit groups — not to mention for-profit companies — engaged in the same activities.

Any government oversight of religious groups must fit within the First Amendment's command that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

For most of the past half-century, courts interpreted the first part of that clause as a barrier to government action that seemed to treat religious groups more favorably than secular ones, legal scholars said. But today, many lawyers agree, courts are taking a more accommodating view of government actions that benefit religious groups.

The willingness of the federal courts to accept these arrangements increased considerably under the influence of William H. Rehnquist when he was chief justice of the Supreme Court, said Derek H. Davis, until recently the director of the J. M. Dawson Institute of Church-State Studies at Baylor University in Waco, Tex.

"Clearly, we're going to be in this accommodative mode for some time," added Mr. Davis, who sees Chief Justice Rehnquist's successor, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. as likely to follow in Chief Justice Rehnquist's footsteps on cases affecting religious groups.

The problem is, efforts to protect the free exercise of religion can clash with efforts to assure that religion is not favored by the government.

Besides regulatory exemptions and special tax breaks, some of which have been in place for decades, religious organizations have recently become eligible for an increasing stream of federal grants and contracts from state and federal governments. This policy shift began in 1996 under President Clinton, and has continued with greater force under President Bush. Known in the Bush administration as the Faith Based Initiative, it has drawn considerable attention in political, religious and academic circles.

But the broader tapestry of regulatory and tax exemptions for religious groups has gone largely unacknowledged. Indeed, some religious leaders and politicians — focusing not on these special accommodations but on issues like the display of religious icons on public land — argue that religious groups in America are targets of antagonism, not favoritism. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, in introducing a legislative agenda last July, said, "Radical courts have attempted to gut our religious freedom and redefine the value system on which America was built."

In March, hundreds of people and a number of influential lawmakers attended a conference called "The War on Christians and the Values Voter in 2006" in Washington and applauded the premise that religion was under attack.

Society "treats Christianity like a second-class superstition," Tom DeLay, then a Republican representative from Texas, told the crowd. "Seen from that perspective, of course there is a war on religion."

The argument that religious groups are victims of discrimination drew a sigh from Ms. White, the day care director in Alabama, where licensed day care centers are finding it harder to compete with unlicensed faith-based centers that do not have to comply with expensive licensing requirements.

James E. Long, a deputy attorney general for Alabama's department of human resources, acknowledged that licensed day care operators have complained time and again that the exemption is unfair. "But I am unaware of any bill ever having been introduced" that would eliminate it, Mr. Long said. "That would be a very contentious issue. I'm sure the churches would want to be heard on that."

Breaks for Social Services

On an early summer day at the Harvest Temple Church of God in Montgomery, a lively group of older children tossed soccer balls around a dim, cool gymnasium. In a smaller room to the side, staff members rocked sleeping infants and comforted cranky toddlers.

This bustling church-based center, next to the church sanctuary in a well-tended middle-class neighborhood, covers its costs and helps support the work of the church, the church pastor said.

"We have talked about getting licensed before in the past, but it would cost us quite a bit of money," Pastor Fuson said. The staff would probably be large enough to meet state standards, he said, but the center would need costly renovations to upgrade the facilities.

Ms. White, whose licensed program, Auburn Daycare Centers, has become nationally accredited during her tenure, understands how demanding the state requirements are. Her centers in Auburn have to comply with them, down to the specific toys required for each age group.

As in many states, these regulations were a response to conditions that had put young lives at risk. In Alabama alone, almost a dozen children died in day care facilities in the two years before the state began upgrading its licensing requirements in 2000.

Ms. White said the root problem in Alabama is that there is not enough state aid for working families who need good day care. But given the state's limited resources, she said, it seems unfair that subsidies are available to unlicensed centers as well as licensed ones — a view shared by the Federation of Child Care Centers of Alabama, which has lobbied for greater financing and universal licensing.

Some churches in Alabama have voluntarily obtained licenses. The Rev. Paul B. Koch Jr., of First Christian Church in Huntsville, whose day care center is licensed, thinks licensing for such programs is appropriate and raises the quality of care. "But the Christian Coalition is still strong in Alabama and this is an issue for them," he said.

John W. Giles, president of the state's Christian Coalition, confirmed that his organization supported the exemption, noting that state oversight would be intrusive and was unnecessary "because the pastors and congregations are your quality control." Although most of the unlicensed centers are run by Protestant churches or ministries, the exemption covers all faiths, from an Islamic preschool program in Huntsville to a Catholic parish center in Tuscaloosa.

Eleven other states — including Utah, Maryland, Illinois and Florida — also have exempted religious child care programs from at least some of the rules that apply to other nonprofit programs, according to the National Child Care Information Center in Fairfax, Va.

One state that has dropped off that list is Texas.

In 1997, George Bush, who was the governor, pushed through legislation that exempted faith-based day care centers and addiction treatment programs from state licensing, allowing them to be monitored instead by private associations controlled by pastors, program directors and other private citizens. Other laws enacted on his watch steered more state financing to these "alternatively accredited" institutions.

Fewer than a dozen child care centers and about 130 addiction treatment programs took advantage of this new alternative, according to subsequent studies. But several of these later became the focus of state investigations into complaints of physical abuse. A study by the Texas Freedom Network Education Fund, a nonprofit research organization that opposed the faith-based initiatives, found that "the rate of confirmed cases of abuse and neglect at alternatively accredited facilities in Texas is more than 10 times that of state-licensed facilities."

In spring 2001, the Texas Legislature quietly allowed the alternative accreditation program for day care centers to lapse.

Two leading First Amendment scholars, asked about faith-based day care licensing exemptions like these, said they were unfamiliar with the practice but thought it sounded legally dubious. "I think what you describe is unconstitutional," said Ira C. Lupu, a law professor at George Washington University and the co-director of legal research for the Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy, an independent project of the Rockefeller Institute of Government.

Professor Witte, the director of Emory University's Center for the Study of Law and Religion, said in an e-mail response that he "would frankly be surprised to find even this Supreme Court going that far."

However, when a group of licensed day care centers challenged the Alabama law in a federal court in mid-2001, arguing that it deprived them of their constitutional right to equal protection before the law, the group lost.

Judge Myron H. Thompson of United States District Court, who ruled on the case, said the state could have adopted the arrangement to avoid church-state entanglements or simply to accommodate the free exercise of religion. Indeed, he cited four other federal cases, all decided since 1988, that had upheld similar exemptions for day care centers in other states.

In Judge Thompson's view, it is "well settled" constitutional law that "the possible economic inequalities that might result from religious exemptions such as day care licensing exemptions" are not a violation of anyone's equal-protection rights.

Exemptions From Zoning Rules

"When you fly in to Denver at night, you can always pick out Boulder," said Ben Pearlman, an athletic young lawyer who grew up there. "It's the only one with big patches of darkness around it."

As one of Boulder County's three governing commissioners, the soft-spoken Mr. Pearlman talks about protecting the county's spectacular beauty as if it were a sacred trust. In 1978, the county limited intensive development to already urbanized areas, buffered by large swaths of prairie and farmland. The landscape therefore now stands in stark contrast to the spreading carpet of subdivisions, office parks and malls in neighboring counties around Denver.

To Alan Ahlgrim, the mellow and mesmerizing preacher who founded Rocky Mountain Christian Church in eastern Boulder County in 1984, those encroaching subdivisions look like spiritual vineyards, full of families ready to be transformed by his church's call for them to become "blessed to be a blessing" to others.

"The church has never grown fast enough to suit me," Pastor Ahlgrim said with a grin that showed he was almost, but not quite, serious.

But the church, one of more than 200 in the county, did grow fast enough in the last 22 years — from about three dozen families in 1984 to more than 2,200 people today — to burst from its original building and five subsequent expansions approved by the county.

Today, its enthusiastic young congregation is once again bumping up against the walls of its 106,000-square-foot home, which sits on 55 acres in an agricultural buffer zone around the small town of Niwot. It is holding multiple services to handle the overflow congregation, but its Sunday school space is full, with some classes spilling out into hallways and temporary buildings set up in a parking lot.

Yet church members cringe at the notion of turning away newcomers. "Who do you say no to? Do you hang a 'no vacancy' sign out front?" asked Guy Scoma, a young father who visited the church as a lonely widower and stayed on when he met, then married, his wife, Kaarin.

The church wants to almost double the size of its facilities so it can accommodate up to 4,500 people. The church could then provide a new children's wing, more rooms for adult classes and a gymnasium with room for two basketball courts or potluck suppers for 1,000. The new wings, linked to the existing building by spacious galleries, would be surrounded by more than 1,200 landscaped parking spaces, 60 percent more than today.

But the county's land-use plan and zoning rules for the agricultural buffer zone where the church stands would limit any construction on the site to a single residential building. So the church cannot build without the approval of the Boulder County commissioners. And in February, after an emotional public hearing attended by more than a thousand people, Mr. Pearlman and his two fellow commissioners said no.

"People are always trying to develop their properties to the limits of the law and sometimes beyond," Mr. Pearlman said. But the worst suburban sprawl is the consequence of "lots of little decisions that have this cumulative effect," he continued. "We're trying to resist this death by a thousand cuts, and preserve the land where we can."

Like the leaders of large, fast-growing churches across the country confronting zoning restrictions on their expansion plans, Pastor Ahlgrim is unhappy. The decision "is severely restrictive to our mission," he said. Like worshiping, teaching and gathering for fellowship, the practice of sharing with the community — in this case, allowing certain outside groups to use the church when it's available — is "vital to our mission," he continued. "When one of your core values is generosity and you are restricted from sharing what you want to share — what God has provided — we consider that to be a severe limitation."

The church had no choice but to go to court, he said.

The church has sued the county under a federal land-use law enacted by Congress and signed by Bill Clinton in 2000 to protect religious organizations from capricious or discriminatory zoning restrictions by local governments. The unusual law came after a decade-long bipartisan tug-of-war between Congress and the Supreme Court.

Before 1990, the court had generally held that any government restriction on religion must serve a compelling public interest in the least burdensome way — a standard known as the "strict scrutiny" test. But in one Oregon case dealing with two Native Americans' sacramental use of peyote, an illegal drug, the majority concluded that there was nothing unconstitutional about states expecting citizens to comply with valid, neutral and generally applicable laws — like those criminalizing peyote — even if compliance conflicted with religious beliefs.

This "Smith decision," Employment Division v. Smith, provoked a fierce reaction that has energized the drive for more legislative protections for religion ever since. In 1993, under pressure from a broad coalition whose members ranged from the Anti-Defamation League to the Southern Baptist Convention to the American Humanist Association, Congress adopted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, which restored the "strict scrutiny" test to any federal, state or local government action affecting religious practice. A new tool had been added to the First Amendment emergency kit, although no one was quite sure how to use it.

Then the Supreme Court tugged back. In 1997, it ruled that the religious freedom act could not be applied constitutionally to the states. In reaction, 13 states have subsequently adopted similar measures of their own. But Congress thought the decision left room for it to address zoning restrictions and, separately, religious restrictions imposed on prisoners.

In 2000 Congress adopted and Mr. Clinton signed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, which restored the "strict scrutiny" test to local zoning decisions, making it easier for churches to challenge those decisions in court. The act also made it easier for prisoners to challenge restrictions on their religious practices.

The provisions that apply to prisoners have been upheld, but the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the land-use provisions that Rocky Mountain Christian Church is invoking in its lawsuit against Boulder County. One of the church's allies in the fight is the Justice Department's civil rights division, which is defending the law's constitutionality in cases around the country.

Defenders of the law say that some cases invoking its protections have addressed actions by local governments that seem to reflect blatant religious bias. For example, Rabbi Joseph Konikov of Orlando, Fla., successfully sued his local government under the law in 2002 after county officials repeatedly cited and fined him for holding small worship services in his suburban home, in violation of a zoning provision later found to be an unconstitutional burden on religious freedom.

"It was like Communist Russia," said Rabbi Konikov, who said his grandfather had fled the Soviet Union to escape religious oppression. He has continued to hold services in his home. "It was very satisfying to see that, at the end, our Constitution and our American values and freedoms came through for us."

Other zoning challenges, all invoking the 2000 law, have been filed by a Sikh society that wants to build a temple in a low-density residential area of Yuba City, Calif.; a Hindu congregation seeking permission to expand its temple and cultural center on a busy highway in Bridgewater, N.J.; and a Muslim organization that has been trying for years to build a mosque on land that the local government in Wayne Township, N.J., now wants to buy for open space.

Seeking a Protective Balance

Critics of the 2000 law argue that the First Amendment itself has long prohibited religious discrimination in zoning, and that such zoning decisions could have been challenged just as successfully in the courts if the law had never been passed.

When Congress considered the law, "what was actually being discussed was 'How do we make sure churches don't get discriminated against,' " said Marci A. Hamilton, a law professor at the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University in Manhattan and the author of "God vs. The Gavel: Religion and the Rule of Law" (Cambridge University Press, 2005), which calls for closer scrutiny of some religious exemptions, especially those affecting land use and family law.

"Unfortunately, the answer was to give such an expansive remedy that not only are they not getting discriminated against, but they are now capable of discriminating against all other landowners," added Professor Hamilton, who is advising Boulder County in its case.

The financial stakes in the Boulder lawsuit are large.

Under the 2000 law, if the county loses, it will have to pay not only its own legal bills but also those of the church. If the church loses, it will sacrifice the money it has spent on legal, architectural and public relations fees, but it will not be required to pay the county's legal bills. And unlike the county, it could seek free legal help from various religious advocacy groups, although it has not yet done so.

While a county victory might provide other local governments with a template for defending against similar challenges, some lawyers fear that if Boulder County, with its long history of careful land-use planning and its environmentally demanding voters, cannot successfully argue that preserving open space is a "compelling public interest," few local governments could.

"Religious institutions have realized that land-use authorities are vulnerable to the threat of litigation," David Evan Hughes, the deputy county attorney, asserted in the county's court filings. Without greater clarity from the courts, he continued, the new law's reach "will expand to the point where religious institutions are effectively dictating their own land-use regulations."

Like most Boulder County residents, several church members said they cherish the open space preserved by the county's past land-use decisions. But they think the county was wrong to reject the church's proposal.

Lanny Pinchuk, a church member who formerly served on the county planning board, praised all that the county has done to preserve the environment. "But you can't keep people from coming to the religious institution of their choice," he said. "I feel that is just, well, un-American."

Church leaders and members said their current proposal was the "forever plan," the last expansion the church would make on this site.

But they all struggled to explain why it is an unconstitutional burden for them to have to turn away newcomers now when, if they continue to grow, they will inevitably have to turn away people when their "forever" building is full.

"At some point, we're going to have to say we can't accommodate any more; I mean, we're not going to have a 100-story building over there," said Gerry Witt, a founding church member who has recently put his house on the market so he and his wife, Carole, can move to a less developed area on the western slope of the Rockies.

"So is there any limit?" He thought a moment, then answered his question. "Yes," he said. "There's God's limit. When he says, 'You're at your limit,' that's when we will stop."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Aircraft Carrier George H. W. Bush Christened (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

A ceremony honoring one of the Navy's own comes amid growing dissent over his son's course in Iraq.

NEWPORT NEWS, Va. — George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush, the most famous father-son act in American politics since the Adamses, saluted one another at a rain-drenched, shore-side ceremony Saturday, as an aircraft carrier was christened in the name of the father, a naval aviator who survived a direct strike by Japanese antiaircraft fire over the Pacific 62 years ago.

Doro Bush Koch, the former president's daughter and the current president's sister, smashed a bottle of sparkling wine against the bow of the vessel, and declared: "I hereby christen thee USS George H.W. Bush. May God bless all who sail her."

There were Bush family, friends, political supporters, longtime advisors and members of the administration of the first President Bush, some of whom have also served the second Bush presidency.

But against the backdrop of the reunion on a barge tied up at the bow of the vast vessel ran an undercurrent of the troubles facing the present Bush administration.

On the stage just yards from the ship's bow were two Presidents Bush, the current and former first lady and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whose direction of the war is drawing increasing criticism. Next to Rumsfeld was Sen. John W. Warner, the Senate Armed Services Committee chairman from Virginia who last week became the most prominent Republican officeholder to publicly question the course of the Iraq war.

In the audience was Colin L. Powell, the retired Army general who served the first President Bush as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the second as secretary of State. His disagreements with the current president over the Iraq war are slowly surfacing.

Two other key members of the first Bush foreign policy team — former national security advisor Brent Scowcroft, and Bush's secretary of State and White House chief of staff, James A. Baker III — were seated nearby. Vice President Dick Cheney, who was the first President Bush's Defense secretary, was not present.

Without mentioning the war but sending an unmistakable signal, the senior Bush declared: "I am very proud of our president. I support him in every single way, with every fiber in my body."

He did not, however, say he agreed with every decision his son had made.

The ceremony took place amid renewed questions about the complicated relationship of the father and son, famously competitive and proud and yet never shy about demonstrating their love for each other, as they did again Saturday.

The most recent questions were prompted by a report that the elder Bush and his wife, Barbara, felt that their son had taken the wrong approach in dealing with Saddam Hussein and Iraq.

Bob Woodward, the author and Washington Post editor, writes in his new book, "State of Denial," that Barbara Bush said that her husband was "losing sleep" over Iraq. In addition, Woodward also wrote that Scowcroft, a close friend of the senior Bush, thought that the younger Bush's presidency was, in some respects, a "disaster."

White House officials have bristled at the idea that there is any daylight between the father and son on Iraq policy — or on anything, for that matter, except a competitive round of golf or a chase for the bluefish that run in the Gulf of Maine off the family compound in Kennebunkport.

Without specifying to which statements he was referring, Scowcroft moved earlier in the week to distance himself from the Woodward book. In a declaration eventually distributed by the White House, Scowcroft said that statements attributed to him in Woodward's book "did not and never could have" come from him.

Notwithstanding any possible differences among those at the gathering, the day belonged to the senior Bush and his wife, Barbara, with plenty of family respect and a dose of teasing. He was choked up as he recalled reading, as an officer and thus censor, the letters crewmen with whom he served sent home during World War II — and a bit irreverent when a thunderclap interrupted his speech and he said: "I'm finishing, Lord. I am finishing, Lord."

The younger President Bush said of the new vessel: "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable." He added, "As a matter of fact, [she] probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

For the senior Bush, the moment was especially fitting, given his Navy service. On Sept. 2, 1944, he set off from the deck of the carrier San Jacinto to attack Japanese installations on the Pacific island of Chichi Jima, north of the equator. His Avenger was hit by Japanese fire, and with his engine aflame, he managed to drop his bombs over the target and fly several miles off shore before bailing out. Two others in the plane died.

He spent several hours in an inflated raft in the ocean before he was rescued by the submarine Finback.

"On that day over Chichi Jima, a young American became a war hero and learned an old lesson: With the defense of freedom comes loss and sacrifice," the younger President Bush said, transferring by implication the World War II experience to the battles the military is fighting today.

The San Jacinto, which was decommissioned in 1947 and turned over for scrap in 1971, was a floating shadow compared with the carrier George H.W. Bush. The new ship's displacement will be roughly 100,000 tons, approximately 10 times that of the San Jacinto. It is the 10th and, if the Navy's plan holds, the final carrier in the Nimitz class. The ship is scheduled to be delivered to the Navy in late 2008.

"President Bush," the younger President Bush said. "Your ship has come in."

Aircraft Carrier Is The Bushes' Latest Namesake (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Va., Oct. 7 — It was a rare and poignant moment, one that moved President Bush to tears.

Not the current President Bush, but the first, who was joined Saturday at a shipyard here by dozens of political luminaries and his extended clan — including the son he calls "the president" — to christen a Navy aircraft carrier bearing his name.

The christening of the George H. W. Bush, the latest and last in the Navy's line of Nimitz aircraft carriers, took place under rainy skies, punctuated by thunderbolts so sharp that at one point, the elder Mr. Bush interrupted his speech, looked skyward and said: "I'm finishing, Lord! I'm finishing!" He seemed to burst with pride as he pronounced the occasion "any naval aviator's dream come true."

Though it was a day mostly of reminiscences for the 41st president of the United States, who joined the Navy fresh out of high school and became a decorated pilot in World War II, the elder Mr. Bush also took the occasion to do something he does not often do: comment on the administration of the 43rd president.

"I am very proud of our president," the 82-year-old father said forcefully of his son. "I support him in every single way with every fiber in my body."

The scene was an unusual tableau, both political and personal, for the two Bushes, whose aides have been at odds, and not always beneath the surface, over the war in Iraq.

The audience included some who served both 41 and 43, as the presidential pair are known. Colin L. Powell and James A. Baker III, former secretaries of state, were there, as was Andrew H. Card Jr., who served as transportation secretary for the first President Bush and is the former chief of staff to the second.

But it was also a family reunion for America's current ruling political dynasty. On the stage sat two presidents, two first ladies and a governor, all named Bush. Mr. Card, who was invited to join the current president aboard Air Force One for the trip, described it in deeply personal terms, saying the elder Mr. Bush was like a father to him, the current president like a brother.

"The president is going there not only as the president and commander in chief," Mr. Card said. "He's going there as a very proud son."

Built at the Northrop Grumman naval shipyard here, the George H. W. Bush will not be ready to sail until 2008. Its hulking frame — 1,100 feet long, with a 4.5-acre flight deck — was festooned with red, white and blue bunting, a picture of the elder Mr. Bush attached to its bow.

The current president's sister, Dorothy Bush Koch, who has just published a biography of the elder Mr. Bush titled "My Father, My President," performed the christening honors, whacking a bottle of sparkling wine across the hull as her father and brother looked on.

President Bush introduced "our dad," recounting his father's flying career. His speech touched on light moments, like the time his father was reprimanded for flying too low over a circus ("I was grounded for causing an elephant stampede," he quoted the elder Mr. Bush as saying), and on somber ones, among them the shooting down of his father's plane. Two crew members died; the elder Mr. Bush earned the Distinguished Flying Cross.

But it was the first President Bush, his step a tad slower than in years gone by, his voice a tad shakier, who stole the show. He held hands with his wife, Barbara, belted out the words to "God Bless America" and happily patted his son on the shoulder. In his speech, he grew tearful as he described his duties as a young officer whose job included censoring the mail sent by shipmates.

"I learned a lot about human nature, and I learned a lot about the hearts and dreams of these kids," the elder Mr. Bush said, looking down in an effort to collect himself. He stopped for more than a few seconds, then continued in a throaty voice, "I would see these letters written, and I would count my own blessings."

New Aircraft Carrier Christened In Honor Of George H.W. Bush (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Oct. 7 -- Despite a steady downpour that chilled thousands gathered Saturday in the shipyard here, President Bush and his father, George H.W. Bush, basked in the warm embrace of extended family and friends as they celebrated the christening of a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier named after the former president.

The 41st president of the United States punctuated an affectionate reminiscence of his storied life with a father's unconditional defense of the 43rd. "I am very proud of our president," said George H.W. Bush to loud applause. "I support him in every single way, with every fiber in my body."

It seemed more than a throwaway line, but a pointed response to speculation, fanned most recently by a new Bob Woodward book, that the former president is anguished over the Iraq war and that his closest advisers now see the son's administration as a debacle. For his part, the current occupant of the Oval Office paid warm tribute to a "great dad" and "a man who exemplifies the great character of our country."

President Bush also drew laughs when he lauded his steely mother, after noting that the USS George H.W. Bush will be the latest in the Nimitz class of aircraft carriers. "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable," Bush thundered.

"As a matter of fact," he added, "probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

The official occasion Saturday was the christening of the George H.W. Bush, a naval ceremony that marks the completion of the ship's hull and its ability to float. Another two years of work is necessary before manufacturer Northrop Grumman Corp. can deliver the gigantic $6 billion ship to the Navy, company officials said.

The George H.W. Bush, longer than three football fields and with about 97,000 tons of displacement, is the 10th and last of the Nimitz-class carriers that project American military power to every corner of the globe. The Pentagon is designing the next generation of aircraft carriers, with the first ship's delivery expected in 2015, a Pentagon spokesman said.

Saturday's ceremony was held at the foot of the gigantic gray bow of the unfinished carrier, in the midst of a rainstorm whose loud claps of thunder periodically startled the thousands of dignitaries, Bush family friends, Navy personnel, shipyard workers and company officials gathered at the Northrop Grumman Newport News Shipyard. "I'm finishing, Lord, I'm finishing," Bush promised, drawing laughs as he glanced up at the sky after one particularly powerful thunder clap.

But the storm did little to dampen the festive mood of the crowd, which included dozens of luminaries from the George H.W. Bush administration, including former secretary of state James A. Baker III, former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Colin L. Powell, who also served the son as secretary of state. Also in the crowd were four of the former president's fellow pilots who served in the Pacific theater during World War II, as well as dozens of old friends and retainers from a lifetime in politics.

A huge cheer went up from the crowd when Doro Bush Koch, the ship's "sponsor" and the former president's daughter, smashed a bottle of American sparkling wine across the bow of the carrier at the end of the ceremony. The crowd also cheered the two Bush presidents, who seemed delighted. The elder Bush took it all in with an almost boyish glee. Holding Barbara Bush's hand, the former president sang enthusiastically along with tenor Ronan Tynan, who rendered "God Bless America."

George H.W. Bush, 82, is the first living former president to attend the christening of a carrier in his honor, and when it came his turn to speak, he told the crowd: "This is any naval aviator's dream come true."

As a young pilot, Bush flew bombing missions off the USS San Jacinto, part of a naval task force in the Pacific; in 1944, his plane was shot down by Japanese antiaircraft fire. Bush parachuted into the sea and was rescued by a Navy submarine after he spent more than two hours aboard a rubber life raft.

The current president devoted part of his brief remarks to the lessons of his father's military service. "The generation of World War II taught the world's tyrants a telling lesson," Bush said. "There is no power like the power of freedom -- and no soldier as strong as a soldier who fights for a free future for his children."

Remembering his World War II service, the elder Bush choked up, especially after recalling his task of reading servicemen's mail to make sure they did not divulge any secrets. "I learned a lot from that. I learned a lot about human nature. I learned a lot about the hearts and dreams of these kids," he said, pausing to compose himself. "I would see these letters written, and I would count my own blessings."

In keeping with his rambling style of public speaking, the former president quickly moved on to a bout of reflection. "It seems surreal that you can go from being a young naval aviator, then surviving a horrible war, then losing an innocent child and having some modest success in business, then rising through the killing fields of national politics to be president," Bush said. "And after four thoroughly challenging years as president, it would be even more improbable to see your own two sons rise to become respected national leaders, to say nothing of the private success of our three other kids. I am truly blessed as a dad."

Bush did allow that he could not say this was the greatest day of his life. He recalled telling Barbara Bush that it was the greatest day of his life when son George was elected governor of Texas and son Jeb governor of Florida -- only to be asked, "What about the day we were married?"

"I would simply have to say," Bush added, to chuckles, "this is, maybe, the third happiest day of my life."

Bushes Stay Calm During Stormy Rite (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078059

NEWPORT NEWS, Va. -- With dark storm clouds looming over a Navy shipyard yesterday and thousands of people gathered for the christening of the USS George H.W. Bush aircraft carrier, Chaplain Jonathan Frusti asked God to be present, to bless the ship and all who sail on it.

The rainstorm did not hold off for the guest of honor, though, and a crack of thunder stopped the 82-year-old former president in midsentence as he addressed the crowd, which included President Bush and his wife, Laura, as well as other members of the Bush family.

The elder Mr. Bush spun toward the sky with alarm, then turned back to the soggy crowd and, with a wry smile, his hands and eyes lifted to the sky, said, "I'm finishing, Lord, I'm finishing."

A few minutes later, standing at the bow of the massive $6 billion ship -- more than three football fields long and able to hold more than 80 warplanes -- the former president's daughter, Dorothy Bush Koch, crashed a bottle of American sparkling wine against the ship, CVN 77, which will take to the seas in late 2008.

The ceremony was at times sentimental and moving. The president choked up as he said: "On this proud day, the children of George H.W. Bush bless their father's name, the United States Navy honors his name, and the ship that bears his name sails into this young century as a symbol of American strength and freedom.

"I know you join me in saying to our father, President Bush, your ship has come in."

The elder Mr. Bush wiped away tears and dabbed his nose with a handkerchief as he recalled one of his tasks aboard the ship on which he served during World War II, the USS San Jacinto. As a senior officer, he censored letters of the crew, and yesterday he remembered the hopes, dreams, courage and fear of his fellow sailors.

The president recounted a story about his father's early days as a Navy pilot, and his impulsive decision to fly low over a beach "where young ladies liked to sunbathe."

"It just so happened to be the same day that a traveling circus had set up its tents. Dad's flyover upset an elephant, causing him to break loose and make a run throughout the town. He was called in for a reprimand from his commander. He puts it this way, 'I was grounded for causing an elephant stampede' -- probably the only Navy pilot in American history who can make that claim," the president said to laughter from the crowd.

The president said of the USS George H.W. Bush, the last of the Nimitz-class carriers: "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable. As a matter of fact, [she] probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

The former president was humble, downplaying his heroism after several speakers praised his bravery during World War II. In 1944, he was shot down during a bombing run over Chichi Jima and survived after parachuting into the Pacific Ocean, earning the Distinguished Flying Cross. But he said his story was no different from that of another president who served in the Navy.

"President Kennedy was asked how he became a hero, and he said, 'They sank my boat.' Well, they shot my plane down. But I never considered myself a hero," he said.

The officials on the dais included Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld; Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joints Chiefs of Staff; Sens. John W. Warner and George Allen, Virginia Republicans; Florida Gov. Jeb Bush; and Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas.

The crowd included high-ranking officials past and present, among them former Secretaries of State James A. Baker III and Colin L. Powell and the elder Mr. Bush's press secretary, Marlin Fitzwater.

Mr. Allen compared the struggle of World War II to the global war against terrorism, saying: "The mission of our time is the same as the one for President Bush fighting in World War II, or leading our country and winning the Cold War: Our mission is to protect our freedom in a sometimes hostile world."

The president also invoked the war on terrorism, saying: "In the 21st century, freedom is again under attack. ... And once again, with perseverance, and courage, and confidence in the power of freedom, a new generation of Americans will leave a more hopeful and peaceful world for generations to come."

The carrier is scheduled to be launched today from its dry dock into the James River and taken to an outfitting berth, where work on interior systems will continue.

The ceremony closed with tenor Ronan Tynan singing "God Bless America," which opens with the lines: "While the storm clouds gather from across the sea, let us swear allegiance to a land that's free."

As the wet VIPs scurried, Mr. Fitzwater was asked whether his former boss did the right thing by cutting short his remarks in the face of the imminent storm.

"Absolutely," he said with a smile. "He knows how to take a cue."

Bush Clan Christens Carrier Named For Patriarch (VAPILOT)

By Jon W. Glass

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS — Family, U.S. military might and a long tradition of shipbuilding merged into a gray, rainy Saturday at the christening of the aircraft carrier George H.W. Bush.

The Bush family gathered to honor the clan's patriach at Northrop Grumman Newport News' shipyard, where the $6 billion carrier has been under construction since 2001.

President George W. Bush, the namesake's son, gave the keynote speech, drawing laughter when he told his father: "President Bush, your ship has come in."

The president's sister, Doro Bush Koch, the ship's sponsor, shattered a bottle of American sparkling wine on a "breaker bar" attached to the massive carrier's bow.

"I christen thee U.S. ship George H.W. Bush. May God bless all who sail on her," Koch said, before smashing the bottle two-handed against the bar, bubbly spray flying.

Bush the elder, now 82, was the nation's 41st president. During World War II, he flew planes off the carrier San Jacinto, earning the Distinguished Flying Cross.

"This is any aviator's dream come true," Bush told a crowd of around 5,000, who held umbrellas and wore hooded raincoats. "This is magnificent."

Other Bush family members at the ceremony included former First Lady Barbara Bush, current First Lady Laura Bush and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, the president's brother.

Colin Powell, the former secretary of state and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under the elder Bush, turned heads when he arrived. Other high-profile government officials attending were Clarence Thomas, the U.S. Supreme Court associate justice; Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld; Navy Secretary Donald Winter; and Mike Mullen, the chief of naval operations.

Bush is the first president in the shipyard's 120-year history to participate in the christening of a namesake ship, yard officials said.

There were light-hearted moments. Describing the new carrier, President Bush said: "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable. As a matter of fact, probably should have been named the Barbara Bush" – a reference to his mother's no-nonsense manner.

And there were serious ones. Speaking of his dad's service in World War II, the president said the carrier "honors a generation that valued service above self," but that it also will serve "a new generation of Americans every bit as brave and selfless."

"In the 21st century, freedom is again under attack," he said, noting that 1.6 million Americans have volunteered for military service since the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

Bush recounted how his father carried out one mission during World War II even after his plane was hit by antiaircraft fire, forcing him to bail out.

But the elder Bush, a decorated aviator who joined the Navy on his 18th birthday, said: "I never considered myself a hero. We were no greater than the kids who serve today – all volunteer."

The nuclear-powered carrier, about 60 percent complete, will join the fleet in late 2008 or early 2009. It's the last 10 Nimitz-class carriers – all built at the Newport News shipyard – and boasts new technology making it the most advanced, including new propellers and an updated aviation fuel system for quicker flight turnarounds.

DOJ_NMG_0078061

About 12,000 of Northrop Grumman Newport News' 19,000 employees have worked on the carrier, and many were at the christening.

Others came to be part of history.

"It's something I'll tell my grandchildren about," said Sharon Zebro, who drove from Norfolk. "To have the father and the son here, you don't see that often." Reach Jon W. Glass at (757) 446-2318 or jon.glass@pilotonline.com

Bush Aircraft Carrier Christened In Virginia (HC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven

Houston Chronicle/AP, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Va. — Spraying the bubbles from sparkling wine across the enormous gray bow of the USS George H.W. Bush, the Bush family today christened the nuclear-powered aircraft carrier named after the 82-year-old former president.

"I know you join me in saying to our father, President Bush, your ship has come in," the current president said during a ceremony for the last of the Nimitz-class carriers, the CVN 77.

"She is unrelenting, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable," Bush said, lauding the warship's state-of-the-art design before pausing for a punch line aimed at his mother's well-known steely constitution. "Matter of fact, she probably should have been named Barbara Bush."

The elder Bush, a decorated Navy pilot in World War II, joined the armed forces on his 18th birthday, June 12, 1942. "After our nation was attacked at Pearl Harbor, you simply couldn't find anyone who wasn't anxious to sign up," he told the audience as a heavy rain fell.

"The point is that our nation was totally united against the insidious totalitarian threat against freedom," he said. He added, "In my humble view, we were no greater than the kids that serve today."

The current president said that in the 21st century, "freedom is again under attack and young Americans are volunteering to answer the call."

Doro Bush Koch, the elder Bush's daughter, handled the ritual smashing of a bottle of sparkling wine against the flattop's bow.

Bush father and son and several relatives joined hundreds of others at the Northrop Grumman Newport News shipyard, where the $6 billion, 1,092-foot-long carrier is being built. It is not yet finished and is scheduled to be delivered to the Navy in late 2008.

The christening ceremony was scheduled to be nearly two hours long, but deafening thunderclaps, lightning, wind and intermittent heavy rain left the speakers mostly abandoning their prepared remarks to merely introduce the next in line.

With friends, Navy personnel and shipyard workers looking on, the elder Bush choked up during his informal and sentimental address, while talking about the men with whom he served in World War II.

Four of his fellow Navy pilots from the war traveled to the ceremony, an event the former president called the "third happiest day of his life," after his wedding and the day when two of his sons were elected governors.

"This is every naval aviator's dream," he said

The 10th of the Nimitz-class carriers — the largest warships in the world — features technological advancements that make it a bridge to the next generation of nuclear-powered aircraft carriers.

On Sunday, the carrier was to be launched from its dry-dock into the James River and taken to an outfitting berth, where work on interior systems will continue.

The former president was the youngest pilot in the Navy when he joined, receiving his commission and naval aviator wings before age 19.

Bush flew torpedo bombers off the aircraft carrier USS San Jacinto. In 1944, he was on a mission over the Pacific when Japanese anti-aircraft fire hit his plane. Bush parachuted into the sea and was rescued by a Navy submarine. He later was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross and three Air Medals for his Navy service in the Pacific theater.

Capt. Kevin O'Flaherty, the carrier's prospective commanding officer, is in charge of about 330 sailors now attached to the ship. He said he eventually will be responsible for about 3,000 crew members when the ship is put into service. It is not known where the carrier is to be stationed.

For The Ex-world Leader Who Has Everything: A Bush Aircraft Carrier (AFP)

AFP, October 8, 2006

President George W. Bush unveiled a Nimitz-class aircraft carrier, the George H. W. Bush, christened in honor of his father, in whose footsteps the president followed all the way to the White House.

Speaking to his father as the former president, also an ex-CIA chief and ex-diplomat, looked on in Newport News, Virginia, the US president smiled and said: "President Bush, your ship has come in," calling it "the newest and most advanced aircraft carrier in the nation."

"The generation of World War II taught the world's tyrants a telling lesson: There is no power like the power of freedom," Bush added, referring to his father's service as a young airman in that conflict.

"In the 21st century, freedom is again under attack," the president said. "And young Americans are volunteering to answer the call. And in the years since September 11, 2001, more than 1.6 million Americans have volunteered to wear the uniform of the United States."

Bush said: "The men and women of the United States military represent the best of America. And they deserve the best America can give them. And the George H.W. Bush is the best America can give them."

Made by Northrup Grumman, the nuclear-powered craft is a floating city that will be home to 6,000 Navy staff.

Some seven years in the making, it took 47,000 tonnes of structural steel and one million pounds of aluminum to build the giant, the company says.

It is expected to operate for half a century.

The president's mother, Barbara, looked on as her daughter Doro Bush Koch carried out the traditional honor of breaking a bottle of sparkling wine across the ship's bow.

"The George H. W. Bush is the latest in the Nimitz line. She is unshakable, unyielding, unstoppable. As a matter of fact, she probably should have been named the Barbara Bush," the president quipped.

Of the supercarrier, his father said: "This is a naval aviator's dream come true."

Also on hand for the ceremony were Marvin Bush and his wife, Margaret, and their son Walker; Sandy Randt, the ambassador to China and an old friend of the Bush family; and former White House chief of staff Andrew Card.

"It's a great gift for those of us who get to witness it to see the father and son there at a time of tremendous emotion for both of them. They have such tremendous mutual respect, and it's not just a respect of a father and a son, it's a respect for the country and those who served the country, and a respect for the loneliest office in the world, the president of the United States," Card said.

"Former president Bush is almost like a father to me, and this president is almost like a brother to me, so I feel particularly honored that they would include me," Card added.

Bush Family Celebrates Carrier Christening (UPI)

United Press International, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Va., Oct. 7 (UPI) -- U.S. President Bush christened a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier in Newport News, Va., Saturday named after his father, the 82-year-old former president.

"I know you join me in saying to our father: President Bush, your ship has come in," Bush said to applause as heavy rain fell.

Bush described the Nimitz-class USS George H.W. Bush supercarrier as "unrelenting," "unshakable," "unyielding" and "unstoppable," he said it "probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

His father, a decorated World War II Navy pilot, once flew low over a beach to see women sunbathing, the president said.

The flyover upset a circus elephant, "causing him to break lose and make a run throughout the town," Bush said. His father "was grounded for causing an elephant stampede -- probably the only Navy pilot in American history who can make that claim."

Dorothy Bush Koch, the president's sister, smashed a bottle of sparkling wine against the carrier bow.

Security Gaps In Medicare And Medicaid (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 7 — Federal investigators say they have found serious computer security flaws that could lead to the improper disclosure of sensitive medical information on people enrolled in Medicare and Medicaid.

In a new report, the investigators, from the Government Accountability Office, said "key information security controls were missing" from a huge communication network used by the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

As a result, they said, sensitive, personally identifiable information "could be improperly modified, disclosed or deleted." Moreover, the report said, "these weaknesses could lead to disruptions in services" to millions of Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries.

The network is used to pay claims and to communicate with state Medicaid agencies, health care providers and many private contractors.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said none of the flaws had led to "actual security breaches." Dr. McClellan said he was taking steps to fix the problems.

But the G.A.O. said Medicare officials would not necessarily know if a security breach had occurred because they had no "audit trail" to document use of the computer network, or a reliable way to detect intrusions into their computers.

In their report, the investigators described several problems:

¶The potential for unauthorized users to gain access to the agency's computers because of a lack of strict password controls. Passwords are often so simple that outsiders can guess them.

¶Medicare and Medicaid data not being encrypted. "This could allow an attacker to view medical information" on beneficiaries.

¶A failure to keep complete records of who uses the network, so it cannot be determined who views or modifies files.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, who requested the investigation, said Medicare officials needed "to get on top of these shortcomings immediately."

"Beneficiaries not only rely on Medicare for their health care coverage," said Mr. Grassley, chairman of the Finance Committee, which oversees Medicare and Medicaid, "they expect that the private information they entrust to the government is kept private, safe and secure."

Concern about computer security has increased since May, when the Department of Veterans Affairs reported a laptop computer with personal information on millions of veterans had been stolen from the home of an agency employee.

Dr. McClellan said, "We are very concerned about the specific control weaknesses" identified in the latest report. The computer network carries immense amounts of data with personal information on beneficiaries, including name, sex, date of birth, Social Security number and home address. The network also transmits medical and financial information, showing the diagnosis of a patient's illness, prescriptions, names of doctors and hospitals, services provided and the amounts paid.

Daniel R. Levinson, the inspector general at the Department of Health and Human Services, and his predecessors have expressed concern about weaknesses in Medicare computer security. The weaknesses "could ultimately result in unauthorized disclosure of sensitive information, improper Medicare payments or disruption of critical operations," Mr. Levinson warned last year.

The computer network connects the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services with banks, insurance companies, hospitals, nursing homes, health plans, other federal agencies and private contractors that pay claims for the government.

Medicare paid more than 1.1 billion claims last year. The size of its computer network and the number of transactions increased this year with the addition of a prescription drug benefit. The new program fills more than three million prescriptions a day. Insurers must file detailed data on each transaction.

In June, Medicare officials warned Humana after a company employee left personal information on 17,000 Medicare beneficiaries unsecured on a hotel computer in Baltimore.

The Bush administration is encouraging adoption of electronic health records and is urging doctors to send prescriptions electronically to drugstores. It is also asking beneficiaries to keep track of their health information, including Medicare claims and prescriptions, by using a new online service at www.MyMedicare.gov. In fine print, the government says it "does not warrant the accuracy" of information on the Web site.

Rules Deter Poor Children From Enrolling In Medicaid (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

Needed Documents Unavailable to Some Families, Officials Say

Thousands of low-income children have been unable to enroll in Virginia's Medicaid program since July 1 because of new, tougher federal rules requiring proof of citizenship and identity, state officials said.

Officials for the state program for the poor and disabled said as many as 10,000 eligible children are living without health care largely because their families have been unable to present original birth certificates and other needed documentation to state or local Medicaid officials.

"These new rules are the single greatest factor for why children haven't been able to enroll" in Medicaid, said Linda Nablo, director of Maternal and Child Health at Virginia's Department of Medical Assistance Services, who said exact numbers would be available by the end of the month. "There are cases where everything about them is done, everything about them is approved, and all we're waiting for is [citizenship and identity] documentation.

"In the meantime, these kids are going without health care," she added.

The new federal rules, designed to curb fraud by illegal immigrants, require passports, birth certificates or other identifying documents to be shown when people apply for Medicaid benefits or during annual reenrollment in the program. Parents are also required to offer sworn affidavits as proof of a child's identity.

The rule is part of last year's Deficit Reduction Act, which President Bush signed into law in February. Despite a federal inspector general's report concluding that there was little fraud by illegal immigrants, supporters said the measure would ensure that Medicaid dollars go only to citizens or eligible immigrants. Previously, Medicaid applicants declared their citizenship or legal status, under penalty of perjury, without having to show evidence, although some states demanded proof.

After an outcry from health-care advocates across the country, federal officials exempted elderly and disabled applicants from the new regulations. But the same exemption was not given to most children, which state officials say is making it difficult to enroll minors.

"We're talking about families that don't have a lot of resources," said Shelby Gonzales, director of Partnership for Healthier Kids, a Fairfax County program run by Inova Health System. She and other advocates said families are showing up at social services departments looking for medical coverage but never follow through because of the extra layer of bureaucracy. "There are just a lot of practical reasons why it's been difficult," she said.

State officials said that adults eligible for Medicaid might also be experiencing difficulties enrolling in the program but that it is unclear how many.

Medicaid spokeswoman Mary Kahn said the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services has done everything it could to prepare low-income families under the parameters set by federal lawmakers.

"Of course we're concerned that children who are entitled to health care may not be receiving it because of any misunderstanding about the new rules," she said. "We're working within the parameters that Congress gave us to assure that the goals of the law are met while not excluding people who are legitimately entitled."

Thus far, the changes have only affected those who are seeking health-care benefits for the first time, state officials said. Like most states, Virginia gave those already enrolled several months to gather the necessary documents. But that grace period ends this month, and there is concern that people who can't come up with the documents will be kicked out of the program.

"This is the tip of the iceberg," said Jill Hanken, a staff attorney for the Virginia Poverty Law Center in Richmond, which has been tracking the impact of the new regulations. "Once the grace period is up, unless we see a change, there are going to be a lot of people who simply won't be able to get reauthorized."

Officials in Maryland said they have not been able to determine whether any children have been unable to receive health care, largely because they only recently started tracking changes. Officials in the District reported that the number of children enrolling has not dropped.

Virginia officials and advocates for the poor said the new rules have stymied much of the progress the state has made in enrolling children in the state health-care program. Over the past several years, Virginia has averaged a net increase of 1,700 children a month into the Family Access to Medical Insurance Security Plus program; since July it has averaged a net loss of about 3,500 a month. As of Oct. 1, there were 376,314 children on Medicaid in the state.

Congress's Sorry Session (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

The disgrace of Congress extends far beyond the scandals that have sullied the record of the dominant House Republicans. They are properly being blamed for most of the misdeeds and blunders that have marked this year on Capitol Hill, from the power grabs by Tom DeLay, to the greed of Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney, to the sexual overtures of Mark Foley.

Those were bad enough, and the glacial pace at which party leaders responded to all of them is a further indictment of the current regime. The House session opened with an attempt to change the rule that would have required an indicted Tom DeLay to step down as majority leader. It finished with Mark Foley hustling off to rehab before he answered questions about his electronic messages to underage male House pages.

And in between, what was accomplished? Nothing of significance on any of the major problems confronting the nation.

That is the real failure and the reason there should be a lot of new faces when the next Congress starts work in January.

Whether the need was immigration reform, a rational energy policy, an effort to expand health insurance coverage or greater security for retirement, Congress failed to deliver.

It worked fewer days -- and accomplished less -- than any Congress in recent history, and much of its routine work on spending bills was postponed until after the election.

The legacy of what it left undone -- especially in the fiscal area -- will damage future generations long after the memories of DeLay and Foley and their follies have vanished.

The Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, a bipartisan group of former government officials, expressed dismay last week that Congress had adjourned without adopting a formal budget resolution. Because the House and Senate were unable to agree, the committee's president, Maya MacGuineas, said, "Congress is tasking itself with spending millions of dollars while flying blind. That is no way to run a country."

The liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities added up the damage done by this Congress in a end-of-session report: "The 109th Congress took our already large projected budget deficits and passed legislation that will make them larger. The legislation increased projected deficits from 2005 (the year the Congress convened) through 2011 (when the current five-year budget window ends) by a total of $452 billion. Moreover, the budget deterioration over the past six fiscal years -- 2000 to 2006 -- is the largest deterioration for any six-year period in the past half-century."

Stan Collender, an independent budget analyst writing in National Journal, said that this year's failure implies more tough sledding next year. "Combined with the likely narrower margins in Congress next year (regardless of which party is in the majority), this almost guarantees that work on the budget will be slow, halting and painful. It also means that incremental progress may be too much to expect."

Some of the session's failures may be laid at the feet of the minority Democrats, who used parliamentary tactics, particularly in the Senate, to thwart some Republican proposals. But most of the difficulty can be found on the Republican side of the aisle, where ideological differences and simple political resistance proved to be a persistent problem.

It is difficult to remember, but President Bush's first priority after his reelection in 2004 was changing the Social Security system to include privately owned accounts. For the better part of six months, he spoke everywhere about his plan -- but he never got around to introducing legislation. And every time he tried to drum up support for some version of the scheme, the word came back from the Capitol that Republicans were not prepared to vote for any such idea. In the end, Social Security reform never came to a vote in any committee of the House or Senate, let alone reached the floor. The Republicans simply chickened out.

The record on immigration was not much better. The House passed a punitive bill that would have closed the border and clamped down on illegal immigrants already living here. The Senate followed the president's wishes and approved a more generous and comprehensive approach, including a guest worker program and a difficult but manageable path to citizenship for those residing here illegally.

But House and Senate leaders never ordered the negotiations that might have led to agreement on a final bill, so in the end, little was accomplished.

That was the hallmark of this Congress. We have to do better.

The Economy That Could (LAT)

By Editorial

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Regardless of what any politician says, the Dow's recovery is a tribute to the resilience of the U.S. economy.

AT LEAST IT DIDN'T TAKE A quarter-century. That's how long it took the Dow Jones industrial average to recover from the 1929 stock market crash. The Dow hit an all-time high Tuesday after a nearly seven-year swoon. The previous closing high for the Dow occurred when the nation was still partying like it was 1999 — even though it was Jan. 14, 2000, when inflated dot-com share prices allowed a company such as AOL to buy a company such as Time-Warner.

We know: There's no reason to break out the champagne. The Dow may be the nation's most established stock index, but it tracks a mere 30 blue-chip companies — and its recent surge owes a lot to such old-economy stalwarts as Caterpillar, Boeing and Altria (which is not a missionary group that builds schoolhouses in Africa but rather Philip Morris renamed). The more representative S&P 500 index is still about 10% off its 2000 high, and the tech-heavy Nasdaq composite is, well, you don't want to know.

Still, the Dow's milestone is worthy of celebration. The economy is strong, as President Bush gloated on Friday. Unemployment — 4.6%, according to the Labor Department's jobs report — and inflation are reassuringly low, growth is steady and the global economy appears to be sound. Corporations have become more efficient and profitable and their market valuations more reasonable than during the '90s bubble.

Despite concerns about a correction in housing prices, consumers remain confident. There have been legitimate concerns about households not faring as well as corporations in recent years, but even on this front, there is good news. Average hourly wages in September were up 4% from a year earlier.

It's always amusing to watch the political spinning of economic data, especially because it foolishly presupposes (on both sides of the statistical food fight) that the government is omnipotent. Democrats look shrill when they engage in mental contortions to argue that what is plainly good news is a mirage. It's equally disingenuous for the president to claim that his temporary tax cuts, which were sold to the country as a needed "stimulus" at a dire time, must be made permanent at a time of prosperity.

If Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. wants to avoid becoming just another in a series of Treasury secretaries who shrank in office to little more than White House cheerleaders, he is going to have to persuade the president to take advantage of this strong economy and address some of the federal government's structural long-term deficits.

In the meantime, all politics aside, the Dow's recovery is a tribute to the resilience of the U.S. economy, which has weathered the 9/11 attacks, Enron and other corporate scandals, increased global competition, rising oil and commodity prices, geopolitical risks associated with the war in Iraq and nuclear proliferation. There is a lot to keep one up at night, and nervousness about uncertainty and change helps explain why not everyone is exulting over objectively good data. What's more important, though, is that people don't panic either. With any luck, the Dow will hit 15,000 before it hits 10,000 again.

Raise The Gasoline Tax? Funny, It Doesn't Sound Republican (NYT)

By Daniel Gross

FOR nearly two decades, Alan Greenspan owned the biggest megaphone in Washington as chairman of the Federal Reserve. When Mr. Greenspan dispensed advice on matters economic — interest rates, budget and tax policies, entitlements, the stock market, the best kind of mortgage — people listened.

As a rule, Mr. Greenspan, a Republican by temperament and background who was reappointed twice by Bill Clinton, adhered closely to Republican orthodoxy on taxes: the lower the better. Mr. Greenspan was hardly a proponent of raising taxes on energy to encourage conservation, a policy prescription generally associated with the politicians and economists of the left.

Until now. In late September, as he spoke to a group of business executives in Massachusetts, a question was posed as to whether he'd like to see an increase in the federal gasoline tax, which has stood at 18.4 cents a gallon since 1993. "Yes, I would," Mr. Greenspan responded with atypical clarity. "That's the way to get consumption down. It's a national security issue."

Mr. Greenspan isn't the only Republican-aligned economist to have discovered, or rediscovered, a fondness for higher energy taxes since leaving government service. N. Gregory Mankiw, the Harvard economist who served as chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers from 2003 to 2005, favored a higher gas tax before going to Washington, and has been banging the drum loudly for it since he left. On his blog, Mr. Mankiw has formed the Pigou Club, named for Arthur C. Pigou, the British economist credited with introducing the notion that taxes could be used to correct imperfections in the market. The roster of what Mr. Mankiw calls "economists and pundits with the good sense to have publicly advocated higher Pigovian taxes, such as gasoline taxes or carbon taxes," includes some of the usual suspects — Paul Krugman, a columnist for The New York Times, and Al Gore, for example — as well as unusual suspects like Gary S. Becker, the economics professor and Nobel laureate at the University of Chicago.

Andrew A. Samwick, chief economist on the Council of Economic Advisers from July 2003 to June 2004, and a professor of economics at Dartmouth, is a member in good standing. So is Martin S. Feldstein, the intellectual godfather of a generation of Republican economists. In June, Mr. Feldstein laid out his own Pigovian plan on the home page of Republican economic orthodoxy — the Wall Street Journal editorial page. The government, Mr. Feldstein said, should essentially ration gas by distributing tradable gas rights that entitle people to use gasoline. Those who don't want to use them could sell them, and those who want to drive more would buy them. "The 50-cent price of the T.G.R. would have the same incentive effect as a 50-cent gasoline tax," he wrote.

What gives? Clearly, there is an emerging consensus among economists — right and left — that the nation would be better off, geopolitically and economically, if Americans used less gasoline. "Given the role that imported oil plays today, you can't continue to be a responsible economist and not talk about ways to reduce that dependence," Mr. Samwick said. "If you are concerned about the external consequences of imported oil, then you should raise the cost of it." And free-market economists view a higher gas tax as a more elegant solution than, for example, raising auto efficiency standards.

Others chalk up the rising chorus for a higher gas tax to a growing unity among economists across the political spectrum on the deleterious effects of global warming. "The U.S. has reasonable arguments for not signing the Kyoto treaty, but we need to propose some other measure that will help reduce emissions," said Kenneth Rogoff, former chief economist at the International Monetary Fund and professor of economics at Harvard. A sharply higher tax on gas would help reduce consumption, and hence emissions.

But as much as Republican-leaning economists like Messrs. Greenspan, Mankiw and Samwick may think that it's a good idea, the Republican politicians who control the levers of power in Washington think that it's an awfully bad one, even though gas taxes in the United States are far lower than those in other industrialized countries. According to the International Energy Agency, American gas taxes in August were a mere 40 cents a gallon on average, compared with $4.24 a gallon in Britain and $3.99 in Germany.

The last increase in the federal gas tax was enacted as part of the so-called deficit reduction act of 1993, a package of spending cuts and tax hikes that didn't receive a single Republican vote in Congress. And because President Bush and his top political advisers are known to be adamantly opposed to any increase in the gas tax, economic advisers haven't pushed it much. "We didn't have policy discussions about raising the gas tax," Mr. Samwick recalls of his time in the White House.

THIS highlights a professional hazard faced by academic economists who serve in presidential administrations. They must act as team players who value the overall success of the administration — even if they don't agree with all of its policies. As a result, economists must often stow some of their policy ideas in an intellectual coat check at the White House gates, where they can be reclaimed upon return to private life.

In the 1990's, during the less-disciplined Clinton years, it was relatively common for economic policy makers and advisers to publicly disagree — sometimes loudly — about issues ranging from health care to welfare reform.

"We were allowed to advocate for our ideas, both inside and to some degree outside," said Brad DeLong, who served as deputy assistant secretary for economic policy at the Treasury Department from 1993 to 1995 and is now a professor of economics at the University of California, Berkeley. "But that's not the way the current system works."

When it comes to economic policy, the Bush administration has proved itself to be an intellectually regimented environment, less like the Harvard economics department and more like the Harvard crew team.

Roller Coaster At The Pump (NYT)

By Editorial

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

It seems a little too convenient. As the stretch run to the midterm Congressional election approaches, gasoline prices fall precipitously. The sudden shifts in prices seem to come out of the blue. And unlike copper or pork bellies, oil is a commodity always charged with political significance.

It only sets the bloggers typing faster and the pundits chattering louder when a key player in the price swing is the investment bank Goldman Sachs, whose chief executive, Henry Paulson, left to become President Bush's Treasury secretary. The suspicions were serious enough that the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, addressed them. He joked that it would take "the kind of magisterial clout unknown to any other human being" to rig gas prices. But with 42 percent of respondents to a Gallup poll saying that they believed the Bush administration was manipulating prices ahead of the election, it is probably not a laughing matter behind closed doors at the White House.

Mr. Snow is actually right — no one can control the 85-million-barrel-a-day global market in petroleum products. But consumers' gut feeling that something is not right with the gasoline market is a recognition of fundamental changes in supply and demand that have made prices more volatile and attracted ever more speculation. Average Americans find themselves at the whim of an increasingly capricious market, one that strikes hard in the pocketbook. And it might become worse.

Our demand for petroleum products strains the limits of the global capacity to supply them. In past decades, if a pipeline broke in Nigeria, Saudi Arabia might compensate by setting workers to pumping more oil. Now, with little additional capacity, rising prices are necessary to balance out supply and demand. Each bump can feel like an earthquake. But to speculators, volatility means the potential for big profits, so hedge funds and investment banks pile in to make bets, bidding oil futures up to unnatural highs and making the market even more unstable.

Summer is usually a time when prices go up; as families climb into minivans for vacations, demand increases. Predictions of another dire hurricane season this summer had the speculators salivating as they envisioned big storms headed for those oil rigs and refineries along the Gulf Coast. When the hurricanes failed to materialize and the driving season came to an unimpressive ending, the shouts of "Buy!" turned to cries of "Sell!"

Consumers may be relieved to find that prices at the gas pump plunged as a result, but unfortunately they could very well be in for more volatility and new price spikes down the road. As long as the demand for oil and gasoline grows faster than the ability to produce and refine them, the slightest shocks to supply will keep sending prices rocketing higher. The only way to get a stable market back is to cut back consumption, through greater efficiency and alternative fuels.

Foley Consuming GOP As Elections Draw Near (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Chris Cillizza

DOJ_NMG_0078069

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) was trying to talk about security Friday at bustling Port Everglades, but with planes roaring overhead and containers slamming onto trucks, nobody could hear him.

That's a common problem for Shaw and Republican candidates around the country these days -- trying urgently 30 days before Election Day to frame a winning message but finding their efforts drowned out by the furor over former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

"It's sucking all the air out of the room," Shaw said in an interview after his news conference at the port. "It's a tough time; there's just total saturation right now."

Back in Washington, Republican strategists acknowledge privately that, even under their best-case scenario, Foley's sexually charged messages and allegations that House leaders were too passive in responding to them will remain an all-consuming distraction for GOP campaigns for the next week.

Their strategy -- equal parts hope and calculation -- relies on waiting for the story to die down in local news outlets, even if it continues to dominate national news, while also accusing Democrats of exploiting a personal lapse for political gain.

In both parties, there is rough agreement among operatives that the impact of the Foley scandal is likely to be felt in two different ways.

There are several places where local factors could amplify the scandal's destructive power against Republican candidates. Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R), who is facing questions about his own role in responding to reports of Foley's conduct, is suddenly in a tough race against Democrat Jack Davis in an upstate New York district. In Pennsylvania, Republican Rep. Don Sherwood's already troubled campaign hardly needed anything that might remind voters of his admission earlier this year that he had an affair with a woman who accused him of physical abuse.

Beyond these specific races, however, many strategists in both parties believe the scandal might echo principally as a metaphor for a GOP leadership that over the past year has drawn more attention for ethical lapses and partisan turmoil than legislative achievements.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll conducted after the revelations found 63 percent of voters "dissatisfied" or "angry" with House Republican leaders, and 73 percent disapproving of the job Congress is doing. In a Time magazine poll, 68 percent said the scandal will have no effect on their vote, but only 16 percent said GOP leaders handled it appropriately.

"People aren't going to vote on this issue, but it's given people an easy way to think about everything they're unhappy about," said Democratic media consultant Anita Dunn.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who is running the House Democrats' campaign committee, said he believes the GOP's own conservative activists are among the most repelled by Foley's behavior and by allegations of a lackadaisical response by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Among partisans, he said, "it only energizes our base and makes theirs more despondent." Among independent voters, he added, "nobody votes for this much chaos."

Notably, a frustrated GOP strategist who spoke on the condition of anonymity essentially agreed, saying his party's mishandling of Foley "speaks to our inability to govern and do the right thing. It says everything about who we are as a party."

In several places across the country, the Foley fire is being aggressively fanned by Democrats. In Indiana's 9th District, former representative Baron Hill (D) is airing an ad attacking Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R) for accepting campaign cash from Republican leaders who "knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley." Minnesota child-safety advocate Patty Wetterling, a House candidate whose son was abducted in the 1980s, delivered Saturday's Democratic radio address, attacking GOP leaders for their "silence" on Foley and urging voters to "restore integrity to Congress." In Ohio, Mary Jo Kilroy (D) is running ads on Christian radio, trying to taint Rep. Deborah Pryce (R) by association: "Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages."

Even New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Thomas H. Kean Jr. recently urged Hastert to resign, although most Republican candidates simply condemned Foley's behavior and called for a full investigation before trying to pivot back to local issues and national security.

In a sign that he is on the defensive, Reynolds went on the air this weekend with ads in Buffalo and Rochester that amounted to a mea culpa over Foley. "Nobody's angrier and more disappointed that I didn't catch his lies," the New York congressman says. "Looking back, more should have been done, and for that, I am sorry."

Most places, though, accusation, not apology, is the Republican approach. Party operatives are distributing talking points to talk radio and conservative blogs detailing the Democratic ties of groups such as Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and American Family Voices -- two interest groups working to promote the scandal around the country. Republicans have also been working to remind conservatives of Democratic reaction to past sex scandals including those of President Bill Clinton and then-Rep. Gerry Studds (Mass.), who admitted to sexual contact with a page and went on to serve a decade longer in the House. Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.), who is close to White House adviser Karl Rove, released an open letter drawing a connection between the Studds and Foley cases.

For all its intensity, the calculation in both parties is that the Foley scandal is unlikely to reshape the basic dynamics of the Nov. 7 elections, which still seem to hinge on voter attitudes toward Iraq, the economy and President Bush.

Carl Forti, communications director at the National Republican Congressional Committee, said he has seen no polling in individual races that suggest Foley is seriously eroding support for GOP candidates. "I think most of our campaigns had gotten back to talking about local issues by Tuesday or Wednesday," he said.

Shaw, the mild-mannered dean of Florida's congressional delegation, was trying to do just that as he campaigned for a 14th term representing the 22nd District, immediately south of Foley's. He showed off some fancy X-ray machines he had secured for Port Everglades, and suggested his seniority on the Ways and Means Committee and his close relationship with House leaders have paid dividends for his constituents. But polls show him in an extremely tight race with his challenger, state Sen. Ron Klein, who thinks the Foley incident illustrates why Shaw's close ties with national Republicans will be a liability.

"People have lost their trust in Washington, and this shows why," Klein said after a campaign event Friday in Delray Beach. "It reinforces the feeling that the people running the show in Congress are more interested in protecting their power than protecting kids." He added, "People have had enough of this go-along, get-along attitude."

Shaw's ability to get along with Hastert has helped him in the past. In 2000, the speaker helped ram an $8 billion Everglades restoration bill through the House a few days before the election. Shaw was then reelected by fewer than 600 votes, and subsequent redistricting gave him more Republican constituents. But although Shaw was comfortably reelected in 2004, his district narrowly supported Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) over Bush. And the redistricting has shifted its geographic center from Shaw's Fort Lauderdale toward Klein's Boca Raton.

Klein is the nation's best-funded Democratic challenger, and he has spent his money on ads linking Shaw to Bush and the GOP Congress. He has criticized Shaw's unstinting support for the Iraq war, and in a district teeming with retirees, he has hammered Shaw for supporting Bush's prescription drug plan, as well as elements of Bush's Social Security plans. Now Klein has called for Hastert and anyone else who knew anything about Foley's electronic activities to resign and is assailing Shaw for his close relationship with the speaker.

Shaw says he is also "very proud" of the record of the Republican Congress, as well as his own record of bringing home the bacon. In an interview, Shaw praised Hastert's response to the allegations and suggested it was "quite a coincidence" that the story broke after it was too late to replace Foley on the ballot, on the day Republicans were passing an immigration bill. He warned that Democrats will pay a price "if they timed this politically."

Even if Foley only costs Republican candidates a percentage point or two, that could make the difference in races as close as Shaw's. "It's the only thing people are talking about -- in the parking lot, on the soccer field, everywhere," said Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.), who has been friends with Klein since they served together in the Florida legislature. "It's another congressional scandal, and it's right in our back yard; it can't help but resonate."

Dems Positioned To Challenge GOP Control (NYT/AP)

By David Espo

DOJ_NMG_0078071

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Aided by public revulsion over an Internet-age sex scandal, Democrats enter the final month of the campaign well-positioned to challenge for control of Congress, while Republicans increasingly express concern about holding onto power.

"We're going to need everything we have to make sure we're victorious," said Republican Rep. Tom Cole of Oklahoma, who had long experience as a party strategist before his election to Congress.

"I think we have the ability to do that but it depends on how well we perform," he added.

Yet with four weeks -- and an unknown number of swings in political momentum -- remaining until the Nov. 7 elections, Democrats guarded against excessive optimism.

"It's still an uphill battle," said New York Sen. Chuck Schumer, speaking at the end of a tumultuous week in which Republicans struggled to overcome the political damage caused by former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., and his sexually explicit computer messages to teenage male pages.

Democratic candidates are in competitive races for seven Republican-held seats in the Senate and 30 or more in the House, according to public as well as private polls. Equally significant is that barring a change, GOP opportunities for offsetting gains appear minuscule -- only three or four House seats currently under Democratic control and one in the Senate.

Members of the leadership in both the House and Senate are among the Republicans in jeopardy -- Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Rep. Deborah Pryce in Ohio -- as Democrats look for major gains in the Northeast and Midwest.

Four Republican congressmen are in trouble in Pennsylvania. And strikingly, three more are struggling for survival in Republican-red Indiana -- at the same time Sen. Richard Lugar is coasting to a sixth term without so much as a Democratic opponent.

Thirty-six states are electing governors this year. Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger leads in the polls for re-election in California, but Democrats are in commanding positions to succeed retiring Republicans in New York and Ohio.

The fate of hundreds of ballot initiatives will be decided. Several states will vote on proposals to ban same-sex marriages and raise the minimum wage. Republicans hope the former will boost turnout in crucial congressional races, and Democrats have similar plans for the latter.

In the race for control of Congress, Democrats must gain 15 seats to wrest control of the 435-member House, and six to establish a majority in the 100-member Senate.

Strategists in both parties agree the fall campaign already has been marked by two distinct trends. The first, which began after Labor Day, saw gradual movement toward the Republicans as President Bush campaigned vigorously on national security issues.

That momentum began to dissipate two weeks ago with the partial publication of a government intelligence report that cast doubt of his administration's claims of progress in Iraq.

Then came Foley's resignation Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit computer messages he had sent to teenage male pages who work in the Capitol. In the following days, Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and other GOP leaders struggled to answer questions of when they learned of Foley's actions and what they had done about them.

"It has stopped any momentum that the president had in improving his standing, mostly because it knocked him off the front pages and it knocked security off the front pages," said Steve Lombardo, a Republican pollster.

It did more than that. Some Republicans canceled planned campaign appearances with Hastert, and Democrats challenged their GOP opponents to call for his resignation.

Republican Rep. Mike Simpson of Idaho said he was no longer confident the GOP would retain power, a shift from a week earlier, when he said he was "fairly confident" they would. "It's a real toss-up, he said.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll taken while the scandal was dominating the news found that about half of likely voters said the issues of corruption and congressional scandal would be important when they cast their ballots.

About two out of three of those voters said they would choose the Democratic candidate.

Officials in both parties said the long term impact of the page scandal was unclear.

"The real question is whether it's a crystallizing event for voters," said Carter Eskew, who has advised numerous Democratic lawmakers and candidates. "Whether they saw this is the last straw and they start to coalesce" around the belief that Republicans are not willing to be accountable for actions that occur on their watch.

Apart from Santorum, Republican incumbents in trouble include Sens. Conrad Burns in Montana, Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island, Mike DeWine in Ohio and Jim Talent in Missouri.

Sen. George Allen of Virginia recently has joined the list, although Republicans expressed hope his position had finally stabilized after weeks spent trying to rebut charges of racism and religious insensitivity. Democratic challenger Jim Webb recently reported a sharp jump in fundraising, and the party is also expected to come to his aid with television commercials in the campaign's final weeks.

Democrats also remain optimistic about their prospects in Tennessee, where Republican Bob Corker's staff recently underwent an upheaval and Democratic Rep. Harold Ford has proved a resilient contender.

Republicans cite their prospects in New Jersey, where Tom Kean Jr. is in a close race with Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez. And Democrats unexpectedly began advertising on television in Maryland for Rep. Ben Cardin, although polls show him leading Republican Michael Steele comfortably in a reliably Democratic state.

In the House, Democrats said they were still looking for late-developing opportunities, and Republicans are hoping to avoid last-minute ambushes.

Bush campaigned in recent days for California lawmakers in little evident jeopardy, and the National Republican Congressional Committee commissioned a poll to check the status of an open seat in Idaho, an area that is among the most Republican in the country.

Foley's departure created an instant opportunity for Democrats to gain a seat previously out of reach in Florida. Democrats also said they are increasingly optimistic about their prospects for seats vacated by Rep. Jim Gibbons in Nevada and Katherine Harris in Florida.

Pryce and Rep. John Hostettler of Indiana are among the most vulnerable of the Republicans in the House, both trailing their Democratic rivals in private polls. Other GOP incumbents in tight races include Reps. Jim Gerlach, Michael Fitzpatrick, Curt Weldon and Don Sherwood, all from Pennsylvania; Thelma Drake of Virginia; Heather Wilson of New Mexico; and Chris Chocola and Mike Sodrel of Indiana.

Sodrel had a distinction of sorts -- the first Republican to be hit with commercial that featured a picture of Foley.

It said Sodrel had accepted $77,000 in campaign donations from "the House leadership who knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley."

Foley Case Is Campaign Fodder For Democrats (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

As candidates seize on the scandal, the issue has changed the focus of the election and appears to be taking a toll on GOP prospects, analysts say.

WASHINGTON — As the congressional page sex scandal has unfolded in Washington, Democratic candidates across the country are seizing on the controversy as a potent campaign issue and an emblem of why voters should strip Republicans of their majority in the midterm elections.

Just over a week after Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned his seat, some analysts said the scandal was abruptly changing the focus of the fight for control of Congress — at least for now. It is taking a toll on Republicans' national prospects, even though only a handful of GOP lawmakers are directly affected by the reports that Foley sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage congressional pages.

Democratic ads are popping up nationwide to put a spotlight on allegations that House GOP leaders were slow to respond to early clues about Foley's misconduct. The first such ad was aired days ago by Minnesota House candidate Patty Wetterling, a child safety advocate who was asked by Democratic leaders to give the party's weekly national radio address Saturday.

"Our nation's children and their parents don't deserve to endure fear in our schools, and it is wrong to make children endure fear within the halls of Congress," Wetterling said.

The scandal has helped increase the number of Republicans facing competitive challenges from 37 last week to 43 now — a shift that includes four lawmakers who were considered safe but have now moved into the danger zone, according to the nonpartisan Cook Political Report's weekly analysis Friday.

"For Democrats, who have been hammering home a 'time for change' theme, the scandal in Washington and the inept handling of it by the Republican leadership in Congress crystallizes this message in a way that 30-second commercials never could," said Amy Walter, analyst of House elections for the Cook report.

Republicans are clearly nervous but remain hopeful that the scandal will recede in the month leading up to election day. They take heart from a poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press that found that the scandal had not had discernible impact on whether voters planned to vote Democratic or Republican.

National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman Carl Forti said the impact would be felt only in a handful of districts where lawmakers were directly involved in controversy about how the scandal was handled — including Foley's district, which was considered safe for the GOP but now is considered likely to go Democratic. In other districts, Forti said, "people are going to the polls and it's going to be a choice between the two people on the ballot."

But a well-placed GOP strategist conceded that the landscape could quickly change as the scandal continued to unfold.

"If something else emerges, because they are following the story so closely, that will also penetrate real quickly so the dynamic could easily change," said the strategist, who spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing party anxieties.

Over the weekend, for example, the Washington Post reported that a new source corroborated a crucial claim by Foley's former aide Kirk Fordham that Scott Palmer, chief of staff to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), was aware of Foley's inappropriate contacts with pages long before he had acknowledged.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean did not contradict the account, saying only that the issue was being reviewed by the House Ethics Committee.

Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that suggestions of a possible high-level coverup probably would embolden even more Democratic candidates to make the issue part of their campaign.

As a result, the midterm election campaign may end as Democrats had hoped in the beginning — with a focus on ethics. That Democratic strategy had run aground for months when party members got caught up in corruption charges. Now, renewed focus on corruption may work more to their advantage.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll taken while the scandal was dominating the news found that about half of likely voters said the issues of corruption and congressional scandal would be very or extremely important when they cast their ballots. About two-thirds of those voters said they would choose the Democratic candidate.

"Everybody out here in the Republican Party is trying to decouple as best they can from Washington," said Floyd Ciruli, an independent pollster in Denver. "The Foley issue has reignited the whole notion that Washington is corrupt. It reinforces the notion they don't police themselves, they're arrogant, they think they're above the law."

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win a majority in the House, and six to capture control of the Senate.

The ripple effects of the scandal are reaching beyond House races into Senate campaigns.

In Tennessee, when Republicans ran an ad that said Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., who is running for Senate, attended a party with Playboy Playmates, he snapped: "I'm not going to take a lecture on morality from a party that took hush money from a child predator."

In Montana, Democrats are circulating photos of endangered GOP incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns appearing with Foley, with whom he worked on Internet safety legislation.

In the New Jersey Senate race — where questions about the ethics of Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez have been a major issue — GOP nominee Tom Kean Jr. scrambled quickly to distance himself from Washington leaders and Friday issued an unconditional call for Hastert to resign as speaker.

"He is the head of the institution and this happened on his watch," Kean said. "The culture of protecting each other has eroded Congress and the public's faith in government."

Among House Republicans, probably no one has more to fear than Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee. He has come under scrutiny in the Foley investigation because he learned in the spring of the "overly friendly" e-mails sent to pages. Reynolds said he had informed Hastert, who has said he does not recall the conversation, and relied on others to investigate.

Now, Reynolds' once-safe seat has become a tossup, according to the Cook report analysis. Democrats have released a poll showing Democrat Jack Davis, a businessman, ahead of Reynolds, 50% to 42%. Reynolds aides claim his own polls do not show him trailing, but this weekend the congressman began airing a 60-second ad that strikes a defensive note.

"Nobody's angrier and more disappointed than me that I didn't catch [Foley's] lies," Reynolds says. "Looking back, more should have been done. And for that, I am sorry."

Another member of the GOP leadership, Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), has been put on the defensive by her Democratic challenger's assertion that Pryce should have known Foley was a child predator.

"Republican leaders were more concerned about protecting politicians than protecting teenagers," says the ad, broadcast on Christian radio stations by Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy. "Deborah Pryce is part of the problem in Congress."

Pryce immediately called a news conference and accused Democrats of "blatantly politicizing" Foley's resignation. She said it was an "outrage" to suggest she had protected a predator, contending she did not know about the explicit e-mails until the news broke in recent weeks.

The scandal teed up an issue tailor-made for Wetterling, the Minnesota House candidate, who made her name as a national advocate for missing children after her son was abducted, never to be seen again.

In her radio address Saturday she said, "We need to restore integrity to Congress, integrity that was further damaged by congressional leadership's silence."

But she is running against a polished state senator, Michele Bachmann, in a district that leans Republican. Although the Cook report now rates this a tossup, Walter said, "The district's GOP lean gives Bachmann a cushion that may be enough to protect her in this bleak political environment."

Walter also argues that the climate poses new risks even for GOP incumbents far removed from the Foley scandal but who have faced other ethics questions, including Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville) who has been on the defensive about his relationship with disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Some Republican strategists fear that the political impact of the scandal will not be to increase votes for Democrats, but simply to demoralize GOP voters so much that they do not go to the polls at all.

"It's one more blow in terms of Republican turnout, one more reason why Republicans will say, 'Why bother?' " said GOP pollster Eddie Mahe.

Bauer Says Republicans May Be Hurt By Foley Case (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Catherine Dodge

Bloomberg, October 8, 2006

Oct. 7 (Bloomberg) -- The Mark Foley sex scandal may make it harder for Republicans to turn out voters in the November elections, said Gary Bauer, the president of American Values, a group that advocates the protection of traditional marriage.

``The Foley mess makes it harder to galvanize that base," Bauer said in an interview on Bloomberg TV's ``Political Capital with Al Hunt" airing this weekend.

About 78 percent of the American public has heard or read about the scandal and 25 percent said they are less likely to vote for the Republican candidate in their district because of it, according to a Time magazine telephone poll taken Oct. 3-4.

Bauer added that the situation may change if an investigation finds that Democrats had information about Foley and timed its release for political reasons.

``Radical gay rights organizations" and ``liberal politicians" are wrong to be ``sitting in judgment of the Republican Party," Bauer said. ``There are still people serving in the United States Congress that engaged in some fairly bizarre behavior in the other party."

Bauer, who was domestic policy adviser to former President Ronald Reagan and a 2000 presidential candidate, said anyone who didn't pursue allegations against Foley for political reasons should share the blame.

``If anybody in the leadership or anybody out of the leadership in either party didn't act on this, either to save seats in Congress or didn't act on it because they wanted to wait until a few weeks before an election in order to win seats," they should be held accountable, Bauer said.

The Time poll showed that 64 percent of the respondents said Republican leaders tried to cover up the Foley scandal and just 15 percent said the Republican leadership handled it properly. The poll of 1,002 adults has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, resigned his congressional seat Sept. 29 after ABC News questioned him about sexually explicit electronic messages sent to male pages. Pro-Republican groups and some party lawmakers have said House Speaker Dennis Hastert should have acted more forcefully when informed of other, less explicit Foley e-mails to another page.

Bauer founded his Arlington, Virginia-based group in 2000.

A Political Limbo (NSWK)

By Marcus Mabry

Newsweek, October 8, 2006

How low can the Republicans go?

Come hell or high water-ran the conventional wisdom-Republicans could rely on two issues to win elections: the war on terror and values. Then came Mark Foley. The drip-drip-drip of scandal surrounding the former Congressman from Florida, which became a deluge this week, now threatens to sink Republican hopes of keeping control of Congress, says the NEWSWEEK poll out today.

And that was the good news for the GOP. More worrisome still, the Foley fiasco is jeopardizing the party's monopoly on faith and power. For the first time since 2001, the NEWSWEEK poll shows that more Americans trust the Democrats than the GOP on moral values and the war on terror. Fully 53 percent of Americans want the Democrats to win control of Congress next month, including 10 percent of Republicans, compared to just 35 percent who want the GOP to retain power. If the election were held today, 51 percent of likely voters would vote for the Democrat in their district versus 39 percent who would vote for the Republican. And while the race is closer among male voters (46 percent for the Democrats vs. 42 percent for the Republicans), the Democrats lead among women voters 56 to 34 percent.

The pace of the news on the Foley scandal is making it difficult for Republicans to stop their slide. On Thursday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert declared that mistakes were made in handling the Foley case and that he would remain in his post to make sure the misdeeds were thoroughly investigated. Almost immediately, ABC News reported that three more former pages had come forward to say that they had received suggestive e-mails and instant messages from Foley. And just as Republicans were attempting to form a united front to paint the timing of the Foley revelations as Democratic dirty tricks-What did Nancy Pelosi know and when did she know it?-the Republicans got a fratricidal shot out of the dark-on Iraq. Virginia Republican Sen. John Warner declared that the United States had 90 days to quell the violence in Iraq, or risk losing the war. To top it off, on Friday an aide to Karl Rove resigned over the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling and corruption scandal.

Meanwhile, the president's approval rating has fallen to a new all-time low for the Newsweek poll: 33 percent, down from an already anemic 36 percent in August. Only 25 percent of Americans are satisfied with the direction of the country, while 67 percent say they are not. Foley's disgrace certainly plays a role in Republican unpopularity: 27 percent of registered voters say the scandal and how the Republican leadership in the House handled it makes them less likely to vote for a Republican Congressional candidate; but 65 percent say it won't make much difference in determining how they vote. And Americans are equally divided over whether or not Speaker Hastert should resign over mishandling the situation (43 percent say he should, but 36 percent say he shouldn't).

The scandal's more significant impact seems to be a widening of the yawning credibility gap developing between the President, his party and the nation. While 52 percent of Americans believe Hastert was aware of Foley's actions and tried to cover them up, it's part of a larger loss of faith in Republican leadership, thanks mostly to the war in Iraq. For instance, for the first time in the NEWSWEEK poll, a majority of Americans now believe the Bush administration knowingly misled the American people in building its case for war against Saddam Hussein: 58 percent vs. 36 percent who believe it didn't. And pessimism over Iraq is at record highs on every score: nearly two in three Americans, 64 percent, believe the United States is losing ground there; 66 percent say the war has not made America safer from terrorism (just 29 percent believe it has); and 53 percent believe it was a mistake to go to war at all, again the first time the NEWSWEEK poll has registered a majority in that camp.

As a result, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's approval rating has fallen to just 30 percent, and more Americans believe he should resign than remain, 48 percent vs. 37 percent. And while a plurality of Americans approve of the job Condoleezza Rice is doing as Secretary of State, 48 percent vs. 32 percent who disapprove, on the heels of Bob Woodward's bestselling critique of the Bush administration, "State of Denial," a solid majority, 58 percent, believe Rice did not pay as much attention as she should have been expected to pay to the domestic terror threat posed by al Qaeda before 9/11. (Only 22 percent believe she did.)

Democrats now outdistance Republicans on every single issue that could decide voters' choices come Nov. 7. In addition to winning—for the first time in the NEWSWEEK poll—on the question of which party is more trusted to fight the war on terror (44 to 37 percent) and moral values (42 percent to 36 percent), the Democrats now inspire more trust than the GOP on handling Iraq (47 to 34); the economy (53 to 31); health care (57 to 24); federal spending and the deficit (53 to 29); gas and oil prices (56 to 23); and immigration (43 to 34).

And even if the Republicans manage to bail out their ship before the midterms, they'll have a hard time matching their one-time strengths to voters' priorities. A third of registered voters, 33 percent, say the single most important issue that will decide their vote will be Iraq; compare to 20 percent who say the economy and only 12 percent who say terrorism, which ties with health care.

The good news for the GOP? The election is still four weeks away.

Democrat Hopeful Assails GOP Over Foley (NYT/AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A Democratic congressional candidate whose son was abducted 17 years ago said GOP congressional leadership failed to protect teenage House pages from former Rep. Mark Foley's advances.

"Foley sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug to protect their political power," Minnesota Democrat Patty Wetterling charged in her party's weekly radio address Saturday.

"If a teacher did this and the principal was told but did nothing, once the community found out, that principal would be fired."

Wetterling, running for an open seat against Republican state Sen. Michele Bachmann, is already airing a hard-hitting television ad over revelations that Foley, R-Fla., had been sending inappropriate e-mails to teenage pages for years.

"We need a new direction in Congress because our children need strong voices," Wetterling said in the radio address. "We need to stop the sexual exploitation of children across the country, and in Washington we must hold accountable all those complicit in allowing this victimization to happen."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has rejected calls to resign, saying he hasn't done anything wrong. Republicans, including President Bush, have closed ranks around Hastert in recent days.

Hastert had blamed Democrats for the election-season revelations, but on Thursday abruptly changed course and took responsibility for the matter.

In a Newsweek poll released Saturday, 52 percent said they believe that Hastert was aware of Foley's inappropriate messages to pages and tried to cover them up. Forty-two percent said they trust Democrats to do a better job of handling moral values, while 36 percent said they trust Republicans more.

Wetterling's 11-year-old son, Jacob, was abducted in 1989 on a rural road. Despite a massive search effort, Jacob was never seen or heard from again. The loss transformed Wetterling from a stay-at-home mom to a national advocate for missing children.

"For 17 years, I have fought for tough penalties for those who harm children," Wetterling said. "Members of Congress are not and should not be above the law."

GOP Scandal Shows Dangers Of Stifling Dissent (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

If there was an Olympic competition in closing ranks, surely the Republican Party would take the gold.

Prominent conservatives and House Republican leaders tumbled over one another early last week to complain about the way House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) handled the sex scandal that forced the abrupt resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

In a private poll of top Republicans, Hastert still might not be their first choice to serve as speaker next year if the party retains its House majority. But by week's end, the public rebellion against him had almost entirely dried up. With leading conservative voices such as the Wall Street Journal editorial page insisting that any leadership change would only embolden Democrats, the flood of criticism thinned to a trickle.

At the revolt's high tide, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), jabbed at Hastert. By week's end, both looked like Chinese officials summoned to a self-criticism session during the Cultural Revolution: Each issued submissive statements praising Hastert and abjectly pledging their support. Even Paul M. Weyrich, a shrewd and independent conservative strategist, reversed his call for Hastert's resignation after an impassioned phone call from the speaker.

The pirouettes might be especially pronounced, but these are familiar steps for the GOP in recent years. Marginalizing internal dissent and promoting party unity have been hallmarks of the Republican governing strategy under President Bush.

Using both carrots and sticks, the White House and GOP congressional leaders have successfully encouraged Republican legislators and activists to see themselves more as part of a team and less as autonomous voices representing distinct and divergent constituencies. With only a few exceptions (education, immigration), the GOP has tried to resolve every policy choice in a manner that maximizes agreement within their coalition and minimizes the opportunity for Democratic influence.

That approach has produced undeniable benefits for the GOP: a series of narrow, often virtually party-line, legislative victories and massive turnouts by the party's base that powered victories in the 2002 and 2004 elections. And, although there's a reasonable political case to be made for removing the speaker, circling the wagons around Hastert might make more sense as a short-term campaign strategy than forcing him out.

But the Foley scandal dramatizes the long-term dangers of governing with a mind-set that prizes party loyalty over principled independence and denies the value of legitimate checks and balances.

In this environment, for instance, it's not surprising that Republicans didn't notify Rep. Dale E. Kildee of Michigan, the sole Democrat on the House Page Board, when questions about Foley first emerged. Republicans probably didn't think it was remarkable to exclude Kildee because they exclude Democrats from virtually all serious House business.

And it was hardly surprising that GOP leaders and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, didn't press Foley too hard or seriously investigate his contacts with pages. For six years, the White House and congressional Republicans have created a culture in which asking tough questions that might cause near-term political headaches for the party is viewed as conduct disloyal to the team.

That was the clear message in 2004 when Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, criticized his Senate counterpart, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), for holding public hearings on the Abu Ghraib abuses. Hastert sent an equally strong signal the next year when he dismissed the GOP chairman of the House Ethics Committee after the panel admonished then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) for a series of ethics violations.

Just as revealing is the potential conservative rebellion stewing in South Carolina against first-term Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

In this year's tumultuous debates over military tribunals and warrantless surveillance, Graham, a military lawyer, has asked the Bush administration tough questions, served as a bridge between the parties and displayed an incisive and independent intellect.

Apparently Graham has been too tough and independent for some back home; one local party official is trying to organize a primary challenge against him in 2008. "The voters of South Carolina sent Lindsey Graham to Washington to vote like a senator from South Carolina, not a senator from New York," Alan Gardner, the activist, told the National Journal's electronic political newsletter, the Hotline.

Unity can be a powerful asset for a party. But the unmistakable lesson from the GOP's current distress is that stifling questions and quashing independence doesn't bury problems. It plants them in soil where they inevitably grow more forbidding.

Does anyone doubt that the Bush administration would be better off today if the Republican-led Congress had conducted more genuine oversight in 2003 about the plans (or lack thereof) to rebuild and stabilize Iraq after overthrowing Saddam Hussein? Or that the House would not have experienced so many scandals — from DeLay to Foley and beyond — if the GOP leadership, with the collusion of leading Democrats, had not crippled the ethics process?

"If everyone thinks there is no sheriff in town," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the independent watchdog group Democracy 21, "you wind up with the Wild West."

Novelist Ellen Ullman wrote that in relationships, you tend to go out the way you came in. That may be true in politics too.

In 1994, Democrats lost control of the House partly because many voters correctly concluded they had grown arrogant and insular during their long years in the majority. Republicans benefited from that experience much more than they appear to have learned from it.

Pelosi Muses About A Democratic House (SDUT/AP)

By David Espo

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 8, 2006

Possible Madame Speaker puts anti-lobby rules at top

WASHINGTON – Franklin Roosevelt had his first hundred days.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is thinking 100 hours – time enough, she says, to begin to "drain the swamp" after more than a decade of Republican rule.

As in the first 100 hours the House meets after Democrats – in her fondest wish – win control in the Nov. 7 midterm election and Pelosi takes the gavel as the first "Madame Speaker" in history.

Day One: Put new rules in place to "break the link between lobbyists and legislation."

Day Two: Enact all the recommendations made by the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

In the time remaining until 100 hours have elapsed: Raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, maybe in one step. Cut the interest rate on student loans in half. Allow the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients.

Broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal funds – "I hope with a veto-proof majority," Pelosi added in an Associated Press interview Thursday.

All the days after that: "Pay as you go," meaning no increasing the deficit, whether the issue is middle-class tax relief, health care or some other priority.

To do that, she said, Bush-era tax cuts would have to be rolled back for those above "a certain level." She mentioned annual incomes of $250,000 or $300,000 a year and higher, and said tax rates for those individuals might revert to those of the Clinton era. Details will have to be worked out, she emphasized.

"We believe in the marketplace," Pelosi said of Democrats, then drew a contrast with Republicans. "They have only rewarded wealth, not work."

"We must share the benefits of our wealth" beyond the privileged few, she added.

Pelosi, 66, has been a leader of the House Democrats since 2002. But her political apprenticeship dates to childhood, when her father was mayor of Baltimore.

Now, her political base is about as liberal as it gets – San Francisco. It's a fact that Republicans love to emphasize to voters who might want to visit, but not feel comfortable living there.

Republicans find her an attractive political target, and recently said she would try to "cut and run" from Iraq while "launching bitter partisan investigations" of the Bush administration, possibly including impeachment hearings.

"If the election were held today, we'd be successful," Pelosi predicted, claiming that her party's prospects are expanding as the campaign enters its final month. "So many other races are emerging right now."

Democrats must gain 15 seats to regain the majority they lost in 1994, and have candidates in competitive races for 30 or so Republican-held seats, say strategists in both parties. By contrast, only a handful of Democratic-controlled seats appear ripe for possible Republican takeover.

How The Democrats Would Rule The Hill (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

Washington

IN the final weeks of this bruising campaign, the debate, in many ways, comes down to this: What would happen if the Democrats win?

Republicans warn, ever more urgently, that a Democratic takeover of Congress would mean wrenching ideological change: higher taxes; big new spending; maybe even impeachment.

Democrats insist they have no intention of an abrupt lurch to the left, offering instead a relatively modest agenda and the less-than-revolutionary rallying cry of "more oversight!"

In fact, a Democratic majority in the House or the Senate — or both — would immediately change Washington in fundamental ways after four years of one-party Republican rule. That majority seemed less theoretical last week as Republican woes, most recently the scandal over Mark Foley and Congressional pages, added up. Even so, it would operate under some formidable constraints, political and institutional.

A Democratic Congress would have sweeping new powers to set the agenda and focus the political debate — through the hearings it calls, the witnesses it summons and the kind of legislation it brings to the floor. "More oversight" could be more revolutionary than it sounds, with the rise of lawmakers like Representative Henry A. Waxman, the hard-charging California Democrat who would take over the House Government Reform Committee; in an interview, he promised a review into "waste, fraud and abuse of taxpayers' money" related to Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and homeland security.

A Democratic majority in the Senate could also stymie, or at least slow, the conservative reconstruction of the Supreme Court, assuming another vacancy occurs in the next two years, and force President Bush to seek more bipartisanship on all judicial nominees.

"You're not going to have a polarizing figure," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who would take over the Judiciary Committee. "It would require more of an effort at consensus for lifetime appointments."

Moreover, a Democratic Congress could force Mr. Bush and a Republican minority to take a stand — again and again, if it chooses — on popular Democratic causes like raising the minimum wage or encouraging embryonic stem cell research. "If you have true openness in the debate, you have the chance to make some of these issues too hot for the president and too hard for many Republicans to vote against," said Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader who would most likely be speaker if the Democrats prevail.

But even if Democrats wanted a true liberal restoration, with two years of major legislation — and some, in their heart of hearts, yearn for just that — they almost certainly won't have the numbers to achieve it. Even if they win control of both houses next month, their majorities will most likely be narrow: in the Senate, fewer than the 60 votes necessary to break a filibuster and force a vote; in both House and Senate, fewer than the two-thirds necessary to override a presidential veto.

Democrats are also unlikely to have the extraordinary unity that the Republican majority had in its early days, given their divisions on issues like Iraq strategy.

The new Democrats would most likely include some high-profile moderates or conservatives like Bob Casey Jr., the Democratic candidate for Senate in Pennsylvania, underscoring the ideological range in the Democratic caucuses. (One veteran Democrat said, somewhat ruefully, that his party would be unable to emulate the Republicans' party discipline even if it wanted to, and thus will have to look for bipartisan coalitions.)

A Democratic candidate like Brad Ellsworth, the sheriff of Vanderburgh County in Indiana, is already carefully differentiating himself from his national party leaders. "This election isn't about Nancy Pelosi or Hillary Clinton," he says in one television ad. "Here's what I believe: I'm pro-life. I believe in a traditional marriage and the Second Amendment."

There are other, more subtle restraints on the Democrats. This would not be a return to the old, pre-1994 Congress, confident in its power, unable to imagine losing majorities and, as a result, willing to take big chances or, put another way, overreach (the failed effort at national health insurance in 1993-94). The men who would probably ascend to the chairmanships of the key committees are some of the last of the "old bulls," who came of age in the Democratic glory days on Capitol Hill. Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan was elected in 1955, Charles B. Rangel of New York in 1970. But even they have been tempered by 12 years in the minority, a Democratic leadership aide said.

More than half the Democrats in the Senate and the House have gone to Congress since the Republican ascendancy began in 1994.

What's more, both parties will immediately head into the presidential election cycle, yet another restraint on Democrats' running off the liberal pier.

Representative Pete Stark, the decidedly liberal Democrat on the House Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, said: "The '08 contest for the White House will be the major moderating influence. I don't think we're going to run out and impeach Rumsfeld and Bush, although a lot of my constituents would like to."

Ms. Pelosi, mindful of the power of the Republican charge that the Democrats will spend the next two years on partisan payback, explicitly ruled out impeachment of Mr. Bush in an interview on Thursday. "Absolutely," she said. "We don't have time for that."

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, contends that these are the same old liberal Democrats — quite literally, in the case of the potential committee chairmen. "And if you look at the agenda," he said, "that hasn't changed."

And "when they talk about investigations and oversight," Mr. Mehlman added, "I think Americans would prefer our generals to be fighting terrorists as opposed to fighting subpoenas."

Still, the official Democratic agenda is less Great Society than New Direction, as it is somewhat ambiguously called. "They're appropriately wary of both high expectations for what they can achieve, as well as the risk of some of their members running off in directions that would be harmful to their long-term interests in winning back the White House and holding the Democratic majority," said Thomas Mann, a Brookings scholar and co-author of "The Broken Branch: How Congress Is Failing America and How to Get It Back on Track."

So the Democrats, for now, promise carefully focused change, like raising the minimum wage, expanding assistance for college tuition, giving the government the authority to negotiate prices for the new Medicare prescription drug program. They call for the immediate start of a "phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq." They promise to "fight any plan to privatize Social Security, in whole or in part."

Nowhere is the party's careful calibration more apparent than on taxes. Many Democrats are running on a promise of fiscal responsibility and cutting the deficit, and many have argued that the nation should look for new revenues by rolling back the Bush administration's tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans. But as the election approaches, and as Republicans scrutinize every Democratic utterance on taxes, Democrats have grown more cautious. Mr. Rangel, in an interview on Friday, said any major effort to change the tax code would have to be bipartisan and involve Mr. Bush. "Members have to believe that if they're going to support legislation that's politically painful, they're going to have to support it on a bipartisan basis and not have one side pay for it at the polls," he said.

Stan Collender, a longtime budget analyst, predicts two years of "utter stalemate," regardless of who is in control next year. "There's no agreement on what to do or how to get it done," he said. What would happen under a Democratic majority, Mr. Collender added, would be two years of hearings about the impact of Mr. Bush's tax and budget policies. "Not a bad thing," he said, but "whether it creates sharper divisions in the country is another question."

In the end, the course of divided government turns as much on the attitude in the White House as on Capitol Hill, many Democrats noted. President Bill Clinton, after his party's devastating defeat in 1994, began a complex dance of confrontation and negotiation that resulted in major legislation: the overhaul of welfare and a balanced budget. Many Democrats are skeptical that Mr. Bush, in the final two years of his term, would be quite so eager to compromise and produce.

Morris P. Fiorina, a political scientist at Stanford, said, "I think we're going to limp into 2008."

Fight On All Fronts (NYT)

By DNC Chairman Howard Dean

WE live in dangerous times that demand real leadership. The president's foreign policies have failed. Recent polls show that a plurality of Americans trust Democrats over Republicans to handle the war on terrorism and the war in Iraq, and two-thirds of Americans want a new direction for our country.

Democrats will answer this call by standing up for change with a unified agenda, including a defense policy that's tough and smart. That's a policy for tracking down terrorists, providing our troops and agencies with the tools they need to stop future attacks and following the 9/11 commission recommendations to close the gaps in our security.

Democrats will stand up to Republican attempts to once again use fear to win elections in November. We will make sure voters know that a Democratic Congress will not rubber-stamp the administration's policies, which put the agenda of the far right ahead of what's good for America. We offer a new direction that will restore to Congress the competence, efficiency and fairness that Americans deserve.

— HOWARD DEAN, chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Competence Sells (NYT)

By DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel

REPUBLICANS have declared Iraq the central front on the war on terrorism. Yet Republicans in Congress ignored warnings that the invasion lacked sufficient troops; did not ask about the plan to secure the postwar environment (as it turns out, there wasn't one); and went into denial as Baghdad descended into chaos. Congressional Republicans asked no questions when the administration staffed the Coalition Provisional Authority with cronies rather than experienced professionals, or when the authority lost track of $8.8 billion in reconstruction money.

Similar Republican negligence and incompetence have led to the failure to secure Afghanistan, to apprehend Osama bin Laden, to address the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea — even to rebuild the Gulf Coast, where, a year after the inept response to Hurricane Katrina, families still live in trailers and billions in relief funds are unaccounted for.

Our nation confronts very real dangers at home and abroad. Will voters feel safer sticking with a Republican Congress that sent our troops into battle without a plan, cut aid to local law enforcement and allowed cronyism to undermine our emergency response system, or will they want a Democratic Congress that will demand real accountability and oversight?

If Republicans want to make national security the fulcrum of the debate this election, Democrats should echo President Bush's immortal words: "Bring it on."

— RAHM EMANUEL, Democratic representative from Illinois and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Iraq, Iraq, Iraq (NYT)

DEMOCRATS face the hard necessity of conducting a debate about the war in Iraq — and about ending it well short of victory, even as young Americans continue to fight and die. Debate now will not substitute for the honest, consensus-building discussion that should have happened before we sent our soldiers into battle, nor for the Congressional oversight that might have kept the hole from being dug deeper. Still, it needs to happen in the name of accountability, if for no other reason.

The challenge is to maintain a level of discourse that rises above the glib sloganeering that has typified the administration's defense of its behavior, but that also transcends disgust and anger. Many Americans of my generation inevitably recall the 1960's and 70's, when the repugnant rhetoric and behavior of some war protesters repelled many Americans and thus helped prolong the war in Vietnam.

Today the evidence of arrogance, deceit, and miscalculation has grown so decisive that rhetorical excess will serve only to distract from it. America deserves, and I believe will reward, a level of debate that befits the sad and solemn circumstances that make it necessary.

KARL ROVE is telling Republicans that they should campaign on the American economy, virtually the "strongest in the world," and on the Iraq war because Republicans will be there for "the last tough battles," while Democrats "fall back on the party's old platform of cutting and running."

Well, do you want to know what I am telling Democrats? Run on the economy and Iraq. We want this battle. This is indeed the strongest economy in the world for the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans. But there has been so little income growth for so many years that the great majority of citizens face stagnant incomes, growing financial pressures, high health care and gas prices, and jobs with fewer and fewer benefits.

The more Republicans talk about great times, the more they fuel voter frustration with a party out of touch with people's financial worries. And the more Republicans talk about "cut and run," the more voters focus on the ugliness of today's Baghdad. It is as though a smug conservative debate team were so busy winning the argument over setting a withdrawal deadline that it completely missed the consuming national anxiety and anger over the deception and incompetence, the misplaced priorities, the spread of violence and the failure to keep America safe. So, Karl, thank you.

DEMOCRATS face a danger as well as an incredible opportunity this fall. The danger is they will run a safe, "We're not as bad as they are" campaign. To be sure, the Republican leadership under George Bush is so bad that Democrats might be able to win majorities in both the House and the Senate with nothing more than this simple refrain. But such a victory would be hollow and short-lived.

The incredible opportunity before us is to build a new majority for change. This is not a matter of pushing the party to the left or right so much as it is one of embracing the evident hunger among the American people to set the nation on a new course. President Bush and the Republicans represent staying the course; Democrats represent changing the course.

Bold change on Iraq, energy policy and health care will carry the day for Democrats in November. To carry the day beyond November, we must be the party that empowers and challenges the American people to participate in the hard work of charting a new course.

IN 1994, Republicans took advantage of the dissatisfaction Americans felt with the Democratic Party. They didn't win Congress just by saying, "We're not them." Rather, they offered an alternative worldview: the Contract With America. Democrats haven't yet offered that alternative vision.

Time is too short for a comprehensive agenda, so I suggest we concentrate on a single issue: health care. Imagine a November in which Americans are not only unhappy with the Republicans, but when we in our turn hold out clear and believable hope to nearly 50 million uninsured Americans and many more insured but worried ones. Surely my party — the party of Franklin D. Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy, of Social Security and Medicare — still has in it the vigor to offer another plain-spoken, big vision for America.

Americans are sensible. They won't put their faith in us for who we're not, but they might for who we are.

TAKE the number of children you have, multiply it by $500 and send the money to Uncle Sam. If you're married, the marriage penalty is coming back. Your income tax rate? That goes up too. All this, if the Democrats win.

The Bush tax cuts will terminate three years after the next Congress convenes. The $1,000 per child tax credit will drop to $500, marriage-penalty relief goes away, and all income tax rates go up. Republicans have vowed to make the tax cuts permanent. Democrats have pledged to reverse them. If I were running for Congress, that would be part of my message.

I'd remind elderly voters that their increasingly popular new prescription drug benefit was brought to them thanks to a Republican initiative, delivered through private markets, not government controls.

As for war and peace, stand strong. Whether it was the nuclear freeze, opposition to the liberation of Kuwait, or their cut and run proposals in Iraq, Democrats choose wrongly on foreign policy and defense. The country wants to win in Iraq and I'd proudly support our mission, confident we'll be victorious if we act long-term. Democratic control will lead to retreat.

I'd enjoy clashing with my opponent but, above all, I would treat him or her with respect. At the end of the day, we're all in this together.

REPUBLICANS face a disillusioned base that wonders why it has been abandoned. Despite Republican control of the White House, Senate and House, federal spending has increased 45 percent since 2001 and government is more intrusive in the everyday lives of Americans. Meanwhile, even the Bush tax cuts have yet to be made permanent.

Let's be frank. America is facing a catastrophic fiscal meltdown that has the power to cripple our society. Americans are waiting for a serious, adult debate on retirement security and the appropriate size and scope of government.

Republicans need to return to the ideas that inspire their voters — lower taxes, less government, more freedom. That vision brought us into the majority in the first place. Reining in federal spending, reforming a broken tax code, passing realistic immigration reform and creating an ownership society through entitlement reform are all big ideas that resonate with voters. When conservatives abandon limited government principles, we lose our credibility with voters. It's an Armey's Axiom : When we act like us, we win. When we act like them, we lose.

THE November House elections have now been nationalized. Republicans won't win by saying, "Elect the incumbent." They can still win, however, by embracing the national nature of the contest and emphasizing their strengths: protecting us from terrorism; creating a thriving American economy.

First, there have been no terrorist attacks on America since 9/11. The partisan rebuttal by the Democrats is that this is just good luck. The Republicans should vigorously respond that the good luck explanation is dangerously irresponsible. There are debatable aspects of the war on terrorism, but the results are not attributable simply to good luck. They are the direct result of steps taken by the president and supported by Congress.

Second, look at our economy. Real economic growth, real personal take-home income, numbers of those employed — all are at record highs. This is also not the result of good luck. The robust economy stems from actions the Republican president and Congress have taken and (wisely) not taken. Republicans let working men and women keep more of the fruits of what they create. Republicans have not built up unnecessary regulations and costs on those who create jobs.

The contest will then be between the Democrats' national issues (Iraq and management of the House) versus the Republicans' national issues (protecting us from terrorism and providing more jobs for Americans). Republicans can win that battle.

CONDEMN the Foley scandal as the egregious abuses of one man, but don't pretend that the failure to take earlier action wasn't anyone's fault. Apologize for sins of omission — but stress that Republicans would never intentionally allow such behavior.

Failure in Iraq would be catastrophic. But if it's a choice between defeat today or defeat tomorrow, the Democrats' appeal to quit sooner will seem the more practical plan. Concede obvious errors in prosecuting the war, demand accountability from officials and pledge support for the changes necessary to hold territory and improve security. Commit to expanding the Army and Marine Corps and help pay for this by banning earmarks and changing wasteful procurement policies.

John Bolton has done a good job at the United Nations and will strike voters as the right man for an often feckless institution that welcomes anti-American tirades from petty dictators. Democrats blocked his nomination. Hold them accountable.

We have provided a fence and more border agents, but we must do more to secure our borders while we develop a temporary worker plan and a program to impose responsibilities on illegal aliens in exchange for a place at the rear of the citizenship line.

Shock the voters. Admit we have spent too much of their money. Promise to quit acting like Democrats and start acting like the penny-pinching managers they expect us to be.

Remind voters we remain the party best able to provide effective governance in a time of change, instability and war, and that we have not become just the party of government, valuing power over principles.

WHISTLING PAST DIXIE

How Democrats Can Win Without the South

By Thomas F. Schaller

Simon & Schuster. 336 pp. $26

Everyone has advice for the Democrats these days. If you're ever stranded on a desert island, the quickest way to get attention may not be to launch a signal flare but to declare your candidacy as a Democrat. Someone will be with you shortly to explain what you should do.

The minority party attracts so many caring advisers because it has lost five of the last seven presidential elections and is constitutionally prone to deep bouts of soul-searching. It is going through such an identity crisis now, as liberal activists debate with those in the center-left over how to win back the majority. Making the situation especially urgent is the tantalizing disarray in the GOP ranks: Neoconservatives have been discredited by the Iraq quagmire, Northeastern moderates dislike Southern social conservatives, and small-government-loving fiscal worriers are outraged at the GOP-led government's lack of budgetary restraint. As the midterm elections loom, Democrats have an opportunity; they just need the right plan to embrace their moment.

Thomas B. Edsall and Thomas F. Schaller have both contributed well-documented and thoughtful arguments that might help direct Democrats out of their wilderness. Edsall's accessible Building Red America is not presented as a guidebook but as a tour of the political landscape. Republicans have learned how to manage that landscape and adapt more quickly to changes on it. Democrats, on the other hand, keep losing for a reason: Their party is no longer a populist coalition, but it keeps trying to run as one, and its leaders fail to understand the connection between middle-class voters' economic self-interest and their concerns about cultural values.

These days, both parties have abandoned the middle ground. Republicans don't care about it, and Democrats aren't talented enough to find it. But in this dim world, Republicans keep coming out on top. "The Republican Party holds a set of advantages, some substantial and some marginal," Edsall writes, and unless Democrats find a way to solve their problems, "the odds are that the Republican Party will continue to maintain, over the long run, a thin but durable margin of victory."

Some of the ground covered by Edsall, a veteran Washington Post political reporter now writing for the New Republic, will feel familiar (the rise of conservatives in the South, white flight from the Democratic Party and so on), but unless you're the kind of political junkie who is so intense that people move away from you at cocktail parties, you won't get bored. Building Red America nicely weaves together the strands of contemporary politics, moving from descriptions of tactical electoral strategy to broader cultural currents to demographic shifts. If you've ever wondered why "activist judges" are the two most powerful words in Republican politics, the book offers a tidy explanation. (Corporate executives and small-business owners worry that judges will enforce regulations and reward plaintiffs; social conservatives worry that judges will destroy the institution of marriage and give unfair advantages to women and minorities.)

In analyzing the conservative ascendancy, Edsall has clearly done his reporting and spent time trying to figure out both parties. With a few rare exceptions, he doesn't step into the reporter's trap of falling in love with every bit of his own field work. There's plenty of data, history and anecdote here, but it's not applied with a trowel. The analysis is clinical, not emotional, which means that Edsall can be sympathetic to conservatives' genuine cultural concerns even as he's being clear-eyed about the GOP's rejection of the politics of consensus and its use of anger and fear to rouse its base and demonize its opposition. This should make partisans on both sides angry, which is a good place to be as a political writer.

If Edsall portrays Republicans as cynical and manipulative, he paints the Democratic Party as hapless and structurally flawed. The party has not come to terms with eroding public support for the liberal agenda, he argues; it is held captive by special interests such as unions and trial lawyers but hasn't found a way to manipulate its core constituency groups over long stretches of time the way the GOP has. The occasional bursts of populist sentiment from Democratic candidates -- Al Gore's "people against the powerful" theme, or Howard Dean's claim to represent the "Democratic wing of the Democratic Party" -- will continue to fail because the affluent college-educated voters who make up much of the party's base are more interested in socially liberal issues. "At the top, the ascendant wing of the party is not populist," Edsall writes. "It is elitist."

If that zinger doesn't get him an inbox full of angry letters, Edsall's view of the Democratic Party's cultural failings will. He disagrees with those on the left who argue that Republicans have won voters through trickery -- by emphasizing values issues like abortion or prayer in school and then doing nothing to help those voters economically. Instead, he argues that Democrats should forge a link with voters who feel that rapid cultural change undermines the sense of family and community that they believe are preconditions for economic success. "Traditional values of family, neighborhood, church, school, and the workplace are, to millions of voters, 'money in the bank' -- they are what holds people together, providing security against a rainy day."

Schaller's Whistling Past Dixie is more prescriptive and less rewarding. He's got a thorough plan for Democrats, as well as maps and tables to show the party how to win. He wants the party to stop worrying about the former Confederacy and start focusing on the Midwest and the West. The geographical theory makes sense -- so much sense, in fact, that it's not very revolutionary. There are not a lot of presidential strategists arguing that Democratic candidates should spend time in Alabama, Mississippi or South Carolina rather than Ohio, Wisconsin and New Mexico, some of the states the book offers as particularly ripe targets. Yet Schaller argues the case at great length, as if the party were busily planning to build a coalition from the South outward.

Moreover, where Edsall is judicious about dealing with only what is useful in his notebook, Schaller's book makes you suspect there isn't a statistic, chart or study he has left off the page. His analysis is also ideologically tainted. He's a Democrat offering advice for Democrats, so his sources and opinions come almost exclusively from the left. You can feel his thumb on the scale. It also clots the writing; he dishes out clunkers such as, "the Republican minority sheep is bleating loudly while dressed up in a majority wolf's disguise," and "political catnip for tort reform tigers, culture-of-life lions, pro-family panthers, and cages brimming full with a variety of sharp-clawed conservative fat cats." Oh my. Schaller's case would be more persuasive if he'd run it by a cast of Republican strategists and then let us hear their voices, either supporting his view or trying to poke holes in it.

If you can wade through the first part of Whistling Past Dixie , it does pick up steam as Schaller discusses the battleground states and the set of ideas that Democrats should embrace to build a new majority. The analysis of target states is well done, and if you read it before the midterms, you're likely to feel a rush of revelation as you realize how crucial battles in Ohio, Colorado and Nevada are. Schaller's suggestion that Democrats improve their national security credentials by focusing first on homeland security is tightly argued. (This whole set of issues is strangely lacking from the Edsall book.) Schaller also challenges liberal orthodoxy by proposing that Democrats embrace the language of Second Amendment rights to capture the votes of Midwestern and Western gun owners. At least one suggestion -- that Democrats realign their primary and caucus structure to spotlight winnable Western states -- is so prescient the party has done just that by moving Nevada's voting earlier in the process.

The least attractive suggestion in the book, though, is that Democrats should "run against the conservative South" in much the same way that Republicans have ridiculed "liberal elites" along the Eastern seaboard. Lampoon evangelicals in the South, and you offend fellow travelers in those other regions you're trying to win. It would also seem hard to create more negative stereotypes of the Southern Republican than those so often applied to George W. Bush, the supposed know-nothing cowboy, or the cultural conservatives who have supported the GOP majority.

The coming midterm and presidential elections are likely to be highly exciting: Both parties are engaged in deep internal struggles, and the issues are as grave as they have been since the early days of the Cold War. The rhetoric and punditry will be foggy and furious. Two books like these, with hard facts and data, will be useful to have during the storm. Â·

Cheney Back Delivering The Grim Campaign Speech (WP)

By Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Democrats Cast As Foils to the Nation's Security

MILWAUKEE -- Vice President Cheney sometimes starts speeches with a Ronald Reagan quotation about a "happy" nation needing "hope and faith." But not much happy talk follows. Not a lot of hope, either. He does, though, talk about the prospect of "mass death in the United States."

The not-so-happy warrior of the past two campaign cycles is back on the road delivering a grim message about danger, defeatism and the stakes of the coming election. If it is not a joyful exercise, it is at least a relentless one. Even with poll ratings lower than President Bush's, Cheney has become a more ubiquitous presence on the campaign trail than in the last midterm election.

He takes on not only the traditional vice presidential assignment of slicing up the opposition but also the Cassandra role of warning about dire threats to the nation's security. While others get distracted by Capitol Hill scandal, Cheney remains focused on the terrorists, who are, as he says in his stump speech, "still lethal, still desperately trying to hit us again." Bush, he says, is "protecting America" while the Democrats advocate "reckless" policies that add up to a "strategy of resignation and defeatism in the face of determined enemies."

But the message is carefully targeted. More than half of Cheney's fundraisers in this two-year cycle have been behind closed doors. Even at a lunchtime speech to Wisconsin Republican donors that was open to reporters, gubernatorial candidate Rep. Mark Green did not stand on stage, ensuring no pictures of the two together on the news, and some other Republican candidates did not attend at all.

That is okay with the White House, which at a perilous moment is counting on Cheney's under-the-radar campaign to rally the base, not the broader public. "The fact that he's willing to go after Democrats as harshly as the Democrats are going after the White House gets the party faithful going," said GOP strategist Glen Bolger.

It happens to inflame the Democratic faithful as well, and party strategists consider him a prime target for their own pitch to voters. "When he threatens Democrats and calls them names, it's something that really fires up our base," said John Lapp, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's independent expenditure program.

Cheney's fundraising visits often end up as fodder for opponents of those he tries to help. "Dick Cheney, Big Oil and Big Drug Companies Threw Curt Weldon a secret Washington thank you party," reads a Democratic brochure targeting the Republican Pennsylvania congressman. "And we got stuck with the bill."

The campaign comes at a pivotal moment for Cheney. His influence within the administration is widely perceived to be waning as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's star rises. The president in his second term has adopted a more diplomatic approach to problems such as Iran and North Korea than insiders believe would be to Cheney's liking. And as the 2008 presidential sweepstakes heat up, he will be the first vice president in a generation not to be seeking a promotion, leaving him on the sidelines of the most important national discussion.

But White House aides said it would be a mistake to underestimate Cheney even now. Although he is viewed favorably by just 34 percent of the public in the most recent Wall Street Journal-NBC poll, he remains a champion of conservatives at a time when the right has been angry at Bush over issues such as deficit spending and immigration. So Cheney's mission is to bring home core Republican voters when they are needed most.

"He's a good carrier of the Republican message," said Michigan GOP Chairman Saul Anuzis, noting that a Cheney visit to Grand Rapids last month raised between $750,000 and $1 million, a record for western Michigan. "He exudes a confidence. He makes you feel good and comfortable that he's vice president of the country."

Cheney's job is "a lot of volume, a lot of what we call McFundraisers," GOP lobbyist Ed Rogers said. Cheney has headlined 111 fundraisers so far in this two-year cycle, bringing in more than $39 million and already surpassing his total of 106 events for the entire 2002 cycle. Cheney is also regularly dispatched to conservative radio shows hosted by Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity and Laura Ingraham. He takes the shots the White House does not want Bush to take or wants to test out first. When Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) was defeated by antiwar challenger Ned Lamont in a primary, Cheney called reporters to say the result would encourage "al-Qaeda types" who want "to break the will of the American people."

Out here on the hustings, Cheney does not come across as the most natural campaigner. A Cheney speech does not draw its audience to its feet. It plods through an argument that is more sobering than inspiring. He delivers even red-meat lines in a flat monotone, sounding more like a chief executive reporting to shareholders than a politician issuing a call to action.

The vice president, though, goes after Democrats by name in a way Bush rarely does, including Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.), Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) and party Chairman Howard Dean. At a fundraiser in Sarasota, Fla., last week, he also singled out Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.) and Reps. John Conyers (Mich.), Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and Barney Frank (Mass.).

He talks mainly about terrorism and Iraq, arguing that U.S. withdrawals from Lebanon after the Marine barracks bombing in 1983 and from Somalia after the "Black Hawk Down" ambush in 1993 emboldened terrorists. "If we follow Congressman Murtha's advice and withdraw from Iraq the same way we withdrew from Beirut in 1983 and Somalia in 1993, all we will do is validate the al-Qaeda strategy and invite even more terrorist attacks," Cheney said in Milwaukee. In Houston last week, he accused Democrats of "apparently having lost their perspective concerning the nature of the enemy."

The crux of his pitch is what he calls the continuing "danger to civilization." Cheney, who warned in 2004 that the United States would be hit by terrorists if Democrat John F. Kerry was elected president, has not gone that far this time but does say that it "is not an accident" that the country has not suffered another attack since Sept. 11, 2001, giving Bush credit.

Democrats regularly punch back, suggesting Cheney is out of touch and desperate. "At a time when the Bush Administration finds itself increasingly isolated on Iraq, Vice President Cheney today went on the attack," Senate Democrats said in a statement last week. "Instead of ranting and raving on the campaign trail, Bush and Cheney should spend their time on the trail of Osama bin Laden."

Five years after Sept. 11, Cheney's message may be wearing. Some find it too limited. "To tell you the truth, I was a little disappointed," David Huibregtse, head of Wisconsin's Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay party members, said after a speech. "Too much on how great President Bush is doing and very little on why we should vote for the Republicans."

Yet it still resonates in certain quarters. Between fundraisers, Cheney addressed a Michigan National Guard rally, an ostensibly nonpartisan event that nonetheless provided helpful photos of him surrounded by soldiers in uniform.

Dick Szymanski, a manufacturing executive whose son serves in the Marines, applauded the vice president's message. "We respect him," Szymanski said. "It's a very, very hard job that he and the president have, that they've had handed to them. You can belittle people for the things they should or should not have done. But they're there trying to take care of the public."

Iraq Is A Loser For Dems, Too (WP)

By Vic Fingerhut

The deepening controversy over Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld must seem like a dream come true for Democrats campaigning for the midterm elections. What better foil than a troubled president supporting an embattled defense secretary waging an increasingly unpopular war? Little surprise that the Democrats are pressing the debate on Rumsfeld, engaging the Republicans on terrorism-related matters and issuing a continual flow of press releases on Iraq.

But it's a losing strategy. For nearly 50 years, poll after poll has shown that the Democrats have very limited credibility with the American public on foreign policy issues -- particularly among the swing voters who have a disproportionate say in the outcome of U.S. elections.

The Democratic Party seems certain to make serious gains in November's off-year elections, especially given the fallout from the House page scandal involving former congressman Mark Foley (R-Fla.). But focusing on foreign policy matters -- and the war in Iraq in particular -- during the final weeks of the campaign could cost the Democrats close contests they might otherwise win.

Americans may be unhappy with how the Iraq war is going, but history makes it clear that an antiwar platform will not help the Democrats in 2006, any more than it did in 2004 -- or in 1972, for that matter.

It may seem unjust that the party of victory in World War II, of the Marshall Plan and of NATO does not enjoy much credibility on foreign policy. But that's the way it is -- and has been for quite some time.

President Bush certainly gets this. His recent speeches on the War on Terror and 9/11 sparked a rebound in his public approval rating, and his negatives are barely worse than the percentage who voted against him in 2004.

How could this be, given the constant bad news out of Iraq? Haven't polls over the past two years shown deep unhappiness with the war?

The answer is yes, but the published surveys often miss two critical follow-up questions. First: Do those who are unhappy with the war perceive the Democrats as better at handling the situation than the Republicans are? And second: Which party do swing voters trust the most to handle things in Iraq?

And here the numbers change dramatically.

A recent poll by my firm in five critical states (four of which barely went to the Democrats in 2004) showed that, by significant margins, swing voters and late deciders trust Republicans more to handle foreign policy issues in general -- not just terrorism, but Iraq as well. These are the voters who often determine the outcome of elections, but many Democrats are not paying attention to this fact.

By 20- to 30-point margins, these critical swing voters indicate that they trust the Republicans more than the Democrats to handle foreign policy (46 to 23 percent) and the fight against terrorism (48 to 19 percent). On Iraq, Republicans were seen as better at handling the war by an 18-point (45 to 27 percent) margin.

For students of polling, there is a history to these results that the Democrats ignore at their peril. In the 1960 contest between John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon, for instance, voters who made their decisions primarily on foreign policy issues chose Nixon by a 5 to 1 margin. Pundits point to the famous 1964 "Daisy Girl" television spot, and Lyndon B. Johnson's 60 to 40 victory over Republican Barry Goldwater as validation that the Democrats can gain from foreign policy issues. But Johnson's lead declined after the ad, which suggested that Goldwater would be dangerously trigger-happy, was aired.

McGovern's huge failure in 1972 to capitalize on widespread unhappiness with the Vietnam War should have taught the Democrats something. Indeed, among swing voters, the Republicans gained votes both as critics of the war in 1968 and as defenders of it four years later.

Democrats' failures to reverse the string of GOP victories in Congress in 2002 and 2004, as well as Sen. John F. Kerry's inability in the 2004 presidential campaign to move swing voters on the war issue, should be more contemporary warning flags.

What, then, should the Democrats do? If they want to change U.S. foreign policy -- or policy on anything else -- they must win elections. And there is a way.

The same swing voters who indicate such overwhelming faith in Republicans on terrorism, Iraq and foreign policy simultaneously express strong Democratic preferences when it comes to basic economic and pocketbook issues. They think that Democrats are more concerned about issues affecting Americans in the workplace, would better control the costs of health insurance by a comfortable 46 to 24 percent margin, and would better protect American workers from the loss of jobs to outsourcing and foreign imports.

Given these findings, it is no surprise that millions of dollars in Democratic candidates' television ads on Iraq and party leaders' statements on the war have only helped Bush's approval ratings -- and, prior to the Foley scandal, reduced a substantial Democratic lead in congressional vote intentions to a near dead heat.

Some Democrats have understood these critical swing voters. In the "Loneliest Campaign," author Irwin Ross describes how in 1948 Harry S. Truman, who led the nation during arguably the most creative and innovative foreign policy period in U.S. history, told his speechwriters to stay away from foreign policy in favor of domestic economic issues, the more populist the better. "Gluttons of privilege," he called Republicans.

Truman's strategy is still right on target.

The Foley scandal has momentarily eclipsed the attention to foreign policy so assiduously nourished by the president's recent terrorism speeches and visits by foreign dignitaries. However, if a victory in these off-year elections leads Democrats to the same false conclusion of failed presidential candidates from George McGovern to Kerry that the road to the White House can be found in foreign policy issues, then the Foley episode may turn out to have an unanticipated and ironic political consequence.

Democrats Aim To Regain Edge In Getting Voters To The Polls (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

ST. PAUL, Minn. -- It may seem like a distant memory now, but Democrats not so long ago dominated the battle between the parties to get their voters to the polls.

Over the past half-dozen years, Republicans reinvented the system, using sophisticated computer modeling and vast amounts of consumer data. In 2002 and 2004, they demonstrated their newfound superiority -- to the dismay of Democratic Party officials and their allies.

"It's no secret that the other side figured this out a little sooner," said Josh Syrjamaki, the state director of America Votes, an umbrella organization of labor and liberal interest groups. "They've had four to six years' jump on us on this stuff . . . but we feel like we can start to catch up. I guess we'll find out in about a month and a half how much we've caught up."

On a blustery afternoon in their third-floor office suite, Syrjamaki and Ed Coleman, the technology director for the Minnesota chapter of America Votes, were hunched over a laptop computer, teasing out information that Democrats hope will begin to narrow the sizable gap with the GOP.

The laptop linked them to a huge new database that holds the names, addresses, voting histories and consumer preferences of every Minnesota resident eligible -- though not necessarily registered -- to vote. That's a weapon that allows them to identify, locate, contact and turn out likely Democratic voters who have been largely invisible to them.

Campaigns and candidates once used blunt instruments to mobilize voters, targeting geographic areas where there were concentrations of Democratic or Republican voters. Those techniques remain an essential part of the turnout wars that can decide a close election, which is why campaigns, political parties and their ideological allies will put legions of volunteers on the streets in the final days before Nov. 7.

Increasingly, however, campaigns have begun identifying potential voters literally one by one, even if they live in areas dominated by the opposition party. Using surveys and modeling and consumer and political data, the parties convert the electorate into subgroups that turnout specialists call by names like "Flag and Family Republicans," "Education-Focused Democrats" and "Older Suburban Newshounds."

This is known as microtargeting, and it turns traditional political mobilizing on its head by giving campaigns the opportunity to create virtual precincts of voters and poach on the opponent's turf.

With the click of a mouse, a Democratic campaign operative can call up a list (and accompanying map) identifying by name and address voters who may live in a Republican precinct or county but who, by virtue of ideology, party identification, religion, favorite drink or television show, or make of car, are more likely to vote Democratic.

In 2004, the biggest jump in GOP votes came in non-GOP precincts, according to former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie. "The biggest boost came from cities where Republican registration is like 20 or 25 percent," he said.

These voters are often difficult to motivate, but both parties see them as critically important additions to the reliable voters they have concentrated on in the past. "It's a heavier lift, but we're now going to find them, whereas before we never even talked to them," said Karen White, national political director for Emily's List, which backs Democratic women who support abortion rights. "Now we're in the game."

The Republicans have attracted attention to their microtargeting skills by emphasizing the importance of consumer information in predicting voting patterns -- Republicans prefer bourbon, for instance, while Democrats prefer gin. Such lifestyle information is most helpful in tailoring messages for voters, though other information such as party identification or frequency of church attendance remains a more reliable predictor of how someone is likely to vote.

Republicans pioneered these techniques, building on data gathered for years and stored and managed through the Republican National Committee. Democrats acknowledge that they have been far sloppier in their collection and retention of data -- voter files were often lost or tossed out between elections. Even now there is competition between the Democratic National Committee and outside groups, which are essentially building duplicate versions of the same system.

Harold Ickes, a driving force behind outside efforts to put Democrats back in the game, said Republicans have two clear advantages over the Democrats. First is a deeper and richer database, which improves the GOP's ability to "model the electorate" -- the term for identifying and classifying voter blocs -- and to tailor messages to individual voters. Second is a trained cadre of people who know how to make use of the databases.

"We are still behind the eight ball on that, and it will take us a handful of years to catch up," Ickes said.

Ickes is president of a for-profit firm called Catalist, which is creating a national voter file that will be available for purchase by an array of special interest groups, "527" organizations and political campaigns, including those of 2008 presidential candidates. Laura Quinn, a veteran Democratic strategist who helped create a voter file for the DNC when Terence R. McAuliffe was chairman, serves as chief executive.

The firm's budget for the year, Ickes said, is "in the low $9 million range," and so far Catalist has produced voter files for about half of the states, including the important 2006 battlegrounds. Ickes said the firm has 19 customers, including the AFL-CIO, the Service Employees International Union and Emily's List.

The private-sector Democratic effort appears cumbersome compared with the centralized operation organized under the RNC. Catalist produces the voter file, but from there the subscribers must manipulate the data to make microtargeting possible. Progressive groups are running experiments in a handful of states, including Minnesota, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Colorado.

Emily's List, with help from the service employees union, took the lead, surveying 10,000 people in Michigan and 9,300 in Minnesota. Respondents were asked how they used their free time, what kinds of volunteer work they did, and other lifestyle or values-oriented questions, as well as their voting intentions.

The next step was to build clusters of voters based on political and lifestyle characteristics. The results were then applied to the entire voter file in the states -- more than 7 million in Michigan and more than 4 million in Minnesota.

In Michigan, the process produced 14 clusters -- three strongly Democratic, one weak Democratic, six in the middle, two strongly Republican and two weak Republican. The modeling cost about $250,000. In Minnesota, the process produced 13 clusters, including the Older Suburban Newshounds and Rural Religious Moralists. The highly informed newshounds make up the largest of the 13, while the rural moralists are one of the smallest ones.

Armed with the new database, America Votes coordinates efforts for dozens of interest groups on the left. In Minnesota, Syrjamaki and Coleman provided a demonstration of the new database by pinpointing two heavily Republican counties in the state, rural Otter Tail and exurban Chisago.

With a few clicks, Coleman reduced the vast file to a list of the clusters in Chisago County and with minimal effort was able to show a list of potential Democratic voters surrounded by tens of thousands of Republicans.

"We have a nice chunk of people that we would not normally have known about," Coleman said. "We would not have blindly gone in and called people there, but now we've found a universe, and if we want to we can go call."

Just as important, America Votes tries to assure that the array of Democratic interest groups avoid duplication in contacting voters while reaching out to irregular voters who have been ignored or simply missed in the past. With the help of America Votes, Democratic groups can divide up individual voters, and, based on their profiles, these voters can be targeted with messages that conform to their particular interests and issue preferences.

The Democratic National Committee has spent about $8 million building its own national voter file and is running modeling experiments in six states this fall, although officials there will not name the states. "We've invested a huge amount of money and time to improve the quality of the data in the voter file," said Ben Self, a veteran of DNC Chairman Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign who is directing the technology effort for the party.

Republicans retain advantages in this turnout battle. The RNC has successfully used microtargeting to identify potential Republicans who are not registered to vote and have systematically sought to get them to register. That helped changed the balance between Republicans and Democrats in the 2004 election to the GOP's advantage.

The experiments of 2006 are seen as a prelude to the 2008 presidential campaign, when Democrats hope to be closer to parity with Republicans in finding those hard-to-get voters registered and to the polls.

"We had huge voter turnout in our heaviest base areas," Coleman said. "But we cannot count on that turnout to carry the day. We're going to have to do better in these fast-growing counties outside the metro area, and this is one tool we're going to use to try to do that."

Labor Goes Door To Door To Rally Suburban Voters (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

DOJ_NMG_0078092

COLUMBUS, Ohio — After being outhustled by Republicans in voter turnout drives in recent years, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. plans to spend $40 million nationwide on voter education and turnout, emphasizing swing states like Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

In addition, just as conservatives used referendums on same-sex marriage to mobilize voters in 2004, labor has helped put measures to raise the state minimum wage on the ballot in Ohio and three other states, an effort that union officials hope will draw low-income voters.

Unions may not feel the economic wind at their back, but they feel good about this year's campaign as they tap into worker discontent over stagnant wages, shuttered factories, shrinking pensions and the soaring trade deficit.

"What we're seeing is dozens of races that are so close that they're really going to be decided on the ground," said the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., John J. Sweeney, "and I think that's where we're going to make the difference."

With Democrats trying to win control of the House, unions are focusing on 56 House races, including five in Ohio. Labor is also working hard on the Senate race here, backing Representative Sherrod Brown, a critic of free-trade pacts, in his bid to unseat Mike DeWine, a Republican.

Despite labor's stepped-up efforts, Republicans voice confidence about Nov. 7.

"In 2004, Ken Mehlman and the George Bush turnout operation showed they are better than labor, and they've only improved things since then," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Yet, Republicans acknowledge that unions are a formidable force.

"Democrats outsource a lot of their turnout efforts to labor," said Mike DuHaime, political director of the Republican National Committee. "For a long time, labor did a better job than we did. But for the last two or three election cycles, we've been able to compete with them and do a better job."

Not long ago, Republicans began borrowing many a page from labor, but now unions are borrowing from the Republicans' playbook.

Traditionally strongest in urban areas, unions are devoting more energy than ever to workers in suburbs and even exurbs. Labor is focusing on the "drop-off voter," making sure that union members who vote in presidential elections but not in midterm elections go to the polls.

In another initiative, unions are campaigning among a group that has largely been off limits to them under federal law, nonunion workers. The federation has figured out a way to reach those workers, sending canvassers door to door to sign up 1.5 million nonunion workers, including 700,000 Ohioans, to join a new A.F.L. affiliate, Working America, with an eye to having them vote for labor-endorsed candidates.

"There are more than 1.5 million labor voters in Ohio," said Karen Ackerman, political director of the federation, pointing to union members, union retirees, members of union households and members of Working America. "Organized labor is single-handedly the largest voting bloc in Ohio."

Ms. Ackerman predicted that these labor voters would represent 35 percent of Ohio voters this year, though just 15 percent of Ohio workers belong to unions.

Thanks to the explosive growth of Working America here, some Democrats say their party will receive a bigger boost from labor in Ohio than in any other state.

Mabel Sorrell, a $6-an-hour supermarket worker in Columbus, joined Working America — it is free — saying it helped her learn about issues like the minimum wage. When Jesse Kloth, one of labor's many foot soldiers here, knocked on her door, Ms. Sorrell initially voiced support for Representative Deborah Pryce, a Republican facing her toughest re-election race in a decade. By the time Mr. Kloth finished his five-minute visit, Ms. Sorrell seemed to be leaning against Ms. Pryce.

"I now mainly see political commercials that don't tell you much," Ms. Sorrell, a widowed mother of four, said. "It's good to have people explain things to you in person."

Labor is focusing on Ohio, union leaders say, because it has many union members, because factory closings have unsettled workers and because Ohio could hold the key to the 2008 presidential election, just as it did in 2004. Adding to labor's confidence is a corruption scandal that has rocked Republicans in state government. "I think the majority of people are ready for a change," John Russo, president of a steelworkers local in Canton, said. "They're fed up. They see the way the economy is going. They see too many manufacturing jobs being lost."

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, praised labor's member-to-member communication.

"They're spending $40 million," Mr. Emanuel said, "and if it's spent strategically and smart, which labor knows how to do, I think it will be significant."

The get-out-the-vote drive faces problems. Many union presidents in Ohio prefer to focus on the governor's race, eager to put a Democrat in the statehouse. Parent unions in Washington want the foot soldiers to focus on House and Senate races.

Some union leaders are frustrated that there are more undecided union members and fewer volunteers than they would like, partly because this is a midterm election.

"Every family is stretched so thin, you have two people working in just about every household, so it's not easy for people to find time to volunteer," said Mike McNichol, a union official at the Hoover vacuum cleaner plant in North Canton.

Moreover, the schism in labor, with seven unions quitting the A.F.L.-C.I.O., has complicated efforts. Several breakaway unions, most notably the Teamsters, are not letting the federation send political mailings to its members or knock on their doors.

Still, there is cooperation. The federation telephone bank in Cleveland was run from the local headquarters of the United Food and Commercial Workers, which quit the federation in 2005.

When Bob Harper, a steelworker at a giant Timken steel mill in Canton, handed out union-produced fliers shortly after sunup, he encountered some workers who were receptive but others who were not.

Scott Harding, an electrician at the mill, did not seem ready to be swayed when he took a flier praising Ted Strickland, the Democratic candidate for governor.

"I make my own decisions," Mr. Harding said. "I don't know where Strickland is on the Second Amendment," a reference to the right to bear arms.

Labor's strategy is to urge workers to focus on pocketbook issues like employment, health care and pensions, and not same-sex marriage and gun rights, issues they call Republican distractions.

Mr. McNichol, the union official at Hoover, hardly sounded optimistic. "We shouldn't underestimate the Republican Party's ability to get their core members out to vote," he said.

Democrats In Accord (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

After months of negotiating, the leaders of the Democratic National Committee and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee have struck a deal on the national party's spending strategy in its quest to capture control of the Senate in November.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean has agreed to put what one Democratic aide said was roughly $5 million into Senate races. Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee chairman, welcomed the agreement, saying: "The DNC is helping us at a time we need it very much, and we appreciate Chairman Dean's efforts."

A few weeks ago, Dean struck a similar deal with Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) to spend $12 million on voter-mobilization efforts this fall, with $2.4 million allotted to the most competitive House races.

The deals bring a measure of closure to a heated debate this year among Dean, Schumer and Emanuel over the party's spending strategy. Emanuel and Schumer have advocated spending resources on this year's races, when the national political climate favors substantial Democratic gains in both chambers. But Dean has said that the party's long-term health relies on spending money to develop party infrastructure across the country.

The DNC also intends to increase its contribution to the most competitive fall House campaigns by $2 million -- to a total of $4.4 million. "In this important election, as with every election, we can't take any vote for granted," said DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney.Clinton Donates $2 Million

Another prominent Democrat is boosting the Senate campaign committee's bank account this fall. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), cementing her reputation as her party's fundraiser in chief, recently gave $2 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee .

Clinton cut a $1 million check from her campaign kitty late last month -- a sum matched by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) and Dianne Feinstein (Calif.). Clinton then gave another $1 million Wednesday, establishing herself as the single largest contributor to the DSCC this election cycle.

"This is very generous and couldn't come at a better time," Schumer said of the contribution.

The money comes from Clinton's massive stash of cash -- more than $22 million in late August. Since coming to the Senate in 2001, Clinton has raised $46 million for her reelection bid, hoping to scare away a big-name Republican challenger.

It worked. Former Yonkers mayor John Spencer is the GOP's sacrificial lamb this fall. An independent poll conducted last month showed Clinton ahead 58 percent to 29 percent.

But the fat bank account also allows her to lavish campaign funds on Democrats hoping to join her in the Senate in January -- a necessary move if she hopes to run for president in 2008. Clinton has also been making campaign stops, including in Virginia last week to support former Navy secretary James Webb's Senate bid. She is expected to visit Pennsylvania, Ohio and Florida before Election Day.

"Senator Clinton is committed to doing all she can to help Democrats win back control of Congress," said Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Clinton.Primary Turnout Low

For all the talk of energized voters evicting incumbents in this year's congressional primaries, voter turnout reached a record low, according to a new study, which said that 15 percent of eligible voters went to the polls on primary day this year.

"People are becoming increasingly disaffected with both parties, on one level," said Curtis Gans, the director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate, which issued the report. "And on another level, we have eroded the religion of civic duty in this country."

Only two races produced record high turnouts -- 12 percent in the Democratic Senate primary in Connecticut and 9 percent in Rhode Island's Republican Senate primary. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) was defeated by antiwar businessman Ned Lamont, though he is still in the race as an independent, and Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) headed off a tough challenge from conservative Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey.

Despite the low turnout in the primaries, Gans said the election on Nov. 7 could see substantial numbers of voters going to the polls.

"The general election is being driven by the emotional feelings about the presidency of George Bush," he said. "People turn out when they're angry mostly on a temporary basis."

As examples, he cited the 1966 midterm election, when voters punished Democrats for then-President Lyndon B. Johnson's stewardship of the Vietnam War; in 1982, when Republicans were slapped for economic recession; and in 1994, when Democrats were thwarted from their control of the House and Senate after the failure of President Bill Clinton's health-care initiative.

Too Soon For Obama (LAT)

By Ezra Klein op-ed

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

His rhetoric soars and inspires, but the Illinois senator has yet to show leadership in Congress.

AS MUCH AS political junkies love the presidential horse race, their deepest affection is reserved for fantasy campaigns. Your average Democratic poll watcher or precinct walker will happily expound on his or her thoughts about the 2008 crop of candidates, but their eyes will really light up when they slip the surly bonds of reality and begin drafting titans and bigfoots, movie stars and war heroes. Oprah! Tom Hanks! Al Gore! A constitutionally incapable Bill Clinton! A resurrected FDR! A progressive shape-shifter from the Alpha Centauri quadrant!

It's perhaps predictable that this affliction, at least for now, is most prominent among Democrats, who are understandably insecure about their party's capability to draft winners. Surveying the field, many see a lineup of has-beens and never-wills. Charisma-challenged moderates such as Mark Warner mingle with establishment blowhards such as Joe Biden; disgraced nominees such as John Kerry threaten to drown out promising newcomers such as Russ Feingold. And who-oh-who will stop Hillary?

The latest name rippling through the Democratic ranks is Barack Obama. The half-Kenyan, Harvard-educated, hyper-charismatic senator from Illinois burst onto the national scene in 2004 when, still a state senator with higher-office hopes, he stole the Democratic convention with a soaring, heart-quickening keynote address. Since then, he's been a rare, hyper-eloquent spot of hope in a party desperately searching for cheer.

And although he routinely reminds that he's but a junior senator, his attributes only loom larger when transposed onto the 2008 race. In a crowd of old faces, Obama offers movie star good looks and a dazzling smile. Among a crew of (mostly) stale speakers, his rhetoric soars and excites. And in a particularly polarizing moment, he is preternaturally skilled at swelling the soul with calls for unity and national purpose. Noam Scheiber, a senior editor at the New Republic, gushes that "Obama is easily more intelligent, sophisticated and charismatic than 99% of the politicians I've come across," and, just for good measure, notes that "Bill Clinton is the only one I can think of who combines all three talents in similar proportions." Adding to the Obama mystique, Oprah Winfrey advised those seeking to draft her into the race to "take [that] energy and put it in Barack Obama."

If Obama isn't overtly preparing for a presidential run, he's certainly testing the waters. Recent weeks have seen him headlining Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's steak fry, a legendary stop on the presidential aspirant road tour. While there, he had Steve Hildebrand, Al Gore's former Iowa director, introduce him to the state's activists. And the attention was only enhanced when Illinois state Comptroller Dan Hynes, who challenged Obama in the 2004 Democratic primary, released an open letter urging the young senator to run for president in 2008.

OK Democrats, deep breath. Despite Obama's undeniable magnetism and star power, he's not your guy. Not yet.

For now, Obama is a cipher, an easy repository for the hopes and dreams of liberals everywhere. He had the good fortune to run his first statewide (and nationally noticed) election against Chicago investment banker Jack Ryan, who dropped out because of a sex scandal, and then the brilliant performance artist (c'mon — you don't really believe that guy's serious, do you?) Alan Keyes. It's easy to focus on lofty ideals and shining rhetoric if you don't have an opponent and need never enter the muck of a competitive campaign.

But if Obama avoided being battle-tested in 2004 by the grace of God, it's his own timidity that has kept his name clean since.

Given his national profile and formidable political talents, he could have been a potent spokesman for Democratic causes in the Senate. Instead, he has refused to expend his political or personal capital on a single controversial issue, preferring to offer anodyne pieces of legislation and sign on to the popular efforts of others.

The closest he came to a showdown was when he sought to ignore John McCain's bipartisan group and decided instead to draft strong new ethics rules for the Senate. McCain flew into a public rage, and Obama backed down; no powerful bill was ever passed.

Indeed, Obama is that oddest of all creatures: a leader who's never led. There are no courageous, lonely crusades to his name, or supremely unlikely electoral battles beneath his belt. He won election running basically unopposed, and then refused to open himself to attack by making a controversial but correct issue his own.

Is that evidence of youth, or timidity? Does he hold no unpopular opinions, or does he simply avoid conflict? How would he react to fusillades launched by able opponents?

For now, nobody knows. But given the smear campaign launched against every recent Democratic nominee, grace and strength under fire should be proven qualities before Democrats even consider a potential candidate.

There are, to be sure, ways Obama could prove his mettle, not to mention his priorities. He could, say, make universal healthcare coverage his public obsession or demand an end to the war in Iraq. He could fight for full public financing of all campaigns, or seek a national living wage.

But until then, if Obama gleams, Democrats have no way of knowing if it's because he's truly an action hero or because he's refused to step out of his packaging. And until that question is answered, the hardened fighters they know are preferable to the attractive cipher they don't.

It's The Agenda, Stupid (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez column

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Gregory Rodriguez: A Mormon President? Why Not?

IN A RADIO INTERVIEW last week, prominent evangelical activist James Dobson said that Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's Mormon faith "could pose a serious obstacle" if he decided to run for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. Dobson said he thought that conservative Christians wouldn't feel comfortable casting a ballot for a Mormon. Chances are, he's wrong.

Sure, plenty of evangelical Protestants refuse to consider Mormonism a branch of Christianity. A Pentecostal missionary recently referred to the heavily Mormon state of Utah as the "last frontier" for Christian proselytizing in the United States.

While Protestants and Catholics accept two books of Scripture, Mormons have three. Mormons believe that church founder Joseph Smith was a prophet of God; other Christians don't consider him anything except the founder of, at best, an unusual sect. Perhaps most troubling to many evangelicals, Mormons believe that the Almighty has a physical body. In other words, theologically speaking, Mormonism is much further away from Christian evangelicalism than, say, Catholicism or any mainline Protestant denomination.

But when it comes to American politics, it seems clear that cultural affinity and a shared political agenda can trump theology. Evangelical activists, for instance, have joined forces with conservative Jews and Tibetan Buddhists on human rights issues such as sex trafficking and North Korean gulags.

Since the earliest days of their religion in the early 19th century, when they were openly persecuted, Mormons have cultivated both their distinctiveness and a greater acceptance by society at large. Indeed, the church's decision to ban polygamy in the late 19th century was tied to its desire to have the Utah Territory accepted as a state. Once keen on establishing their own Zion in the West, over time Mormons became increasingly eager to integrate.

By the late 20th century, Mormons had developed a reputation for being as American as apple pie, even if their beliefs were way out of the mainstream. They also became loyal Republicans. As recently as this summer, Utah voters — two-thirds of whom are Mormon — gave President Bush the highest job-approval rating of any state.

Joseph Cannon, chairman of the Utah Republican Party, calls Mormons the African Americans of the GOP because about 70% vote Republican. He says their affinity for Bush and his party derives from shared values. Of course, the same could be said about evangelicals, who at 40% make up the single biggest demographic bloc in the Republican coalition.

The conservative "values" agenda — anti-abortion, anti-gay marriage, a shared vision of what constitutes America's moral fiber — that connects each group to the GOP also links them to each other, at least politically.

"Some evangelicals may think that Mormons are going to hell," says Notre Dame sociologist Christian Smith, "but at the same time, they might think that it wouldn't be too bad to have one in elected office."

In other words, for all the talk of faith being central to the political behavior of religious conservatives, it can take a back seat to their social and political agendas.

Evangelicals are probably the least ecumenical of the major Christian groups in the county. They believe in evangelization, bringing the Gospel to new peoples, and in the inerrancy of Scripture. They are highly invested in their version of religious truth and less willing to find theological compromise with other denominations and religions.

It was the secularism of the late 1960s and early 1970s that pushed the once otherworldly evangelicals into the political arena. Feeling put upon by modernity, evangelical activism was fueled by indignation and the belief that they received little respect in an increasingly plural nation.

But the political and cultural successes of recent years, and their unprecedented influence on the Bush administration, have begun to change that equation. "It's harder to keep seeing yourself as an embattled minority when, in fact, your values are becoming increasingly accepted," says Baylor University religion scholar Rodney Stark. "Fifteen years ago, nobody made Hollywood movies to appeal to evangelical Christians. Things have changed."

And while some overly confident evangelical activists may feel their numbers mean they don't need to build bridges with those with whom they disagree, a growing number of evangelicals have begun to feel what Stark calls a "confidence and calmness." Now that their sense of exclusion has diminished, they are more willing to find common cause with non-evangelicals.

Christian evangelicals may think Mormons are dead wrong on fundamental issues of faith, but they share a conservative social vision. Despite Dobson's true-believer (and anti-Mormon) stance, U.S. politics will no doubt — in its time-honored way — once again make strange bedfellows. And Romney, who has called himself an "evangelical Mormon," could reap the benefits.

Allen Rallies Conservative Supporters (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 8, 2006

MAIDENS, Va. -- Sen. George Allen last night rallied with his most reliable conservative friends, saying he is the only choice for them come Election Day, while Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. accused the Republican of running dishonest attack ads.

Mr. Allen, elected to the Senate in 2000, told attendees at his annual "Hoe Down" that Mr. Webb would increase taxes.

Mr. Allen echoed the theme of his latest campaign ad, saying that the national Democrats who support Mr. Webb want to let President Bush's tax cuts expire.

"You know what that means?" he asked. "Tax increases."

"You can count on me to make sure those tax cuts ... stay permanent. My friends, raising taxes would hurt our competitiveness and would cost us jobs and you ought to keep more of what you earn anyway."

The Webb campaign called on the senator to stop running the ads.

One ad says Mr. Webb would increase taxes because he is supported by liberal national Democrats. The other features a woman who accused Mr. Webb of misquoting her in a 1979 article, though she was not quoted in the piece after he interviewed her.

The campaign also said Mr. Allen violated a promise to voters that he would "get back on the issues."

"He must pull these ads and apologize to the people of Virginia for sinking Virginia politics to a new low," the Webb campaign wrote in a memo to reporters.

Mr. Allen yesterday promised he would stay on the issues and his record as a governor and a senator. He promised to be tough on national security and to fight for energy independence, themes that are sure to arise tomorrow at his final debate with Mr. Webb.

When Mr. Allen linked Mr. Webb to "Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton," the crowd booed and hissed.

Conservative talk show host Laura Ingraham spoke at the fundraising event, at a private ranch where attendees dined on barbecued chicken and kept out of the rain under a large tent.

Miss Ingraham threw the 500 attendees some political red meat, saying Virginia voters are smarter than the "dinosaur media."

She asked the crowd what Mrs. Clinton, Howard Dean, Sens. John Kerry and Charles E. Schumer, Barbra Streisand and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez had in common. "They've all endorsed Webb," she said, adding a "just kidding."

A few minutes later, she told Allen supporters: "When I see the politics of smear and fear versus the politics of substance and focus, I worry for our country."

Mr. Webb, secretary of the Navy under President Reagan, was forced to cancel several appearances scheduled for the Richmond area yesterday afternoon because of the sloppy weather.

He was scheduled to speak at a Norfolk reception of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and at an event in Portsmouth.

At the "Hoe Down," Mr. Allen and his supporters insisted his campaign ads were not negative.

Donors at the event were named "buckaroos," "cow bosses," "ranch hands" and "el ranchero grandes," depending on their gift, from a $50 minimum to $10,000.

Mr. Allen, sporting a bolo tie and a cream-colored cowboy hat along with his everyday footwear, thick-heeled boots, stood on the stage with his family: wife Susan, son Forrest and daughters Tyler and Brooke Victoria.

"We're all cowboys today," said Lt. Gov. William T. Bolling, a Republican.

Will Sen. Allen's Cowboy Boots Fit Virginia Voters? (WP)

By Michael D. Shear, Washington Post Staff Writer

Detractors Call Cowboy Image a Shtick

RICHMOND -- Like many kids, George Allen grew up idolizing television cowboys with shiny six-shooters at their hips. But his love affair with the imagery of the Old West endured into adulthood and became a motif of his political career.

He donned the boots, the flannel shirts and the ten-gallon hat as he rose from state lawmaker to congressman, governor and, finally, U.S. senator. The rustic image resonated in Virginia even though the state is far from cowboy country.

Now, as Virginia's junior senator battles for a second term and considers a run for the presidency in 2008, Allen hopes the cowboy persona still gives him the political benefit it gave his hero -- President Ronald Reagan -- and others such as President Lyndon B. Johnson and the current President Bush.

Last night, at a supporter's home near this city of the Old South, Allen held a Western-themed fundraiser called a "hoedown." Those who gave $50 were dubbed "Ranch Hands." Those who gave more than $1,000 earned titles such as "Buckaroo," "Cow Boss" or "Ranch Boss." Those who gave $10,000 or more to the Republican cause earned the title "El Ranchero Grande." In Allen's worldview, there is no greater compliment.

Critics say the would-be cowboy hasn't quite earned his spurs. They call it the tired political shtick of a 54-year-old Republican senator whose reelection is in jeopardy.

But former Allen chief of staff Jay Timmons said the image is genuine, born of a fascination Allen developed early in his childhood and even well into his teenage years in the 1960s.

"That was an age of long hair and the Beatles and wayward souls. Everybody was anti-establishment," said Timmons, a Washington lobbyist who is one of Allen's closest friends. "He was not somebody who was part of a pack. He did his own thing. He was clearly searching for an identity that he could connect with."

For Allen, who uses Copenhagen and wears leather cowboy boots with his blue suits, being a cowboy means dressing and acting the part.

"He connected with that at an early age," Timmons said. "It's because of that self-reliant mentality of the Old West, the pioneering spirit. That all appeals to him."

At the soggy hoedown, about 500 folks gathered under tents at the home in Goochland County along the James River. Many wore the requisite cowboy hats. A 10-foot-tall pair of brown cowboy boots greeted them as they arrived. A four-man old-time band played as the crowd munched on barbecue chicken, coleslaw, baked beans and chocolate-chip cookies.

"As far as I'm concerned, cowboy values are the best values," said Elliott Curzon, 51, a lawyer from Alexandria who called himself a huge Allen fan. "They're American values. They're gentle, but they're tough when they need to be."

The evening's featured speaker was conservative author Laura Ingraham. But the donors were there to see Allen and help him get reelected. Dressed in a white shirt, black bolo tie and tan cowboy hat, Allen promised victory.

"Are y'all ready to win one month from today? This is victory weather!" Allen roared. If voters choose based on issues, he vowed, "we will win."

On Nov. 7, Allen will follow his custom and wear cowboy boots when he goes to the polls to vote. This time, he is in a tight race against a candidate who has his own meaningful footwear. Democratic nominee James Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, wears combat boots in recognition of his son's deployment to Iraq with the Marines and to symbolize his own opposition to the war there.

Allen's detractors mock the cowboy image as an act dreamed up by an ambitious surfer boy from California to appeal to rural voters in Virginia. To them, it screams phony.

"With all due respect, I know cowboys," said Steve Jarding, who was raised in South Dakota and is now a senior Webb adviser. "I grew up with cowboys. I have nephews who bull ride. I'm sorry, George, you're not a cowboy."

To Jarding, Allen's penchant for cowboy boots and a wad of snuff is as contrived as Billy Crystal's character in the faux-cowboy movie "City Slickers."

"I put on a Superman outfit for Halloween," Jarding said. "It didn't make me a superhero."

Allen declined to be interviewed for this article. But people who know him well say he came under the spell of TV westerns while growing up in a fancy Southern California suburb. His sister, Jennifer, wrote in a memoir that Allen often dressed "like a character on 'Hee Haw' -- cowboy hat, flannel shirt, blue jeans and boots."

His favorite series, according to friends, was the shoot-'em-up classic "Gunsmoke." His brothers nicknamed him "Festus" after a character on the show who was an illiterate deputy marshal in Dodge City.

As a law student, Allen summered twice at a cattle ranch in Winnemucca, Nev., while many of his peers clerked for judges or toiled over briefs at law firms. He roped cattle for a cow boss named Joe Brown. Later, he tried to invite Brown to his gubernatorial inauguration, only to learn he had died.

His law office in Charlottesville was festooned with Western paraphernalia: a saloon sign, lassos, a saddle, a stuffed armadillo and a cowhide rug. One of the items he displayed -- a hangman's noose -- later caused him trouble. Adversaries accused him of displaying a symbol of lynching as part of a pattern of insensitivity toward minorities.

Even today, one room in his Fairfax County house is dedicated to Western memorabilia.

"He's been that way for years. He's been enamored with that since he was a kid," said Chris LaCivita, a consultant who managed Allen's 2000 Senate campaign. "This is not new to a lot of people. What's being done, it's being repackaged in a negative light to assault the guy's character."

In 1979, during his first run for the House of Delegates, consultants told Allen to wear wingtips. He did, and he lost. Thereafter, he vowed to ditch the executive-style footwear.

In 1982, wearing boots and riding in a battered pickup truck, he ran again and won. He hasn't lost since.

Allen held his first hoedown in 1994 when he took office as governor. The next year, it became one of his featured fundraisers. Buttoned-down donors would shed their neckties, open their collars and arrive in stiff blue jeans and recently purchased cowboy hats and boots.

The event has remained an Allen staple even as Virginia has become more urbane, more ethnically diverse and -- some say -- less hospitable to a senator who styles himself a cowboy. In Fairfax, the state's largest jurisdiction, a quarter of the population is foreign-born. Loudoun County is diversifying, with white residents now accounting for 74 percent of the population, down from nearly 83 percent in 2000. The Latino population in Prince William County has more than doubled in the past six years, census figures show.

The Allen campaign says he has garnered plenty of minority support. For example, a group called the Latino Coalition endorsed him Monday. But some minority voters panned the image of Allen on horseback at the Buena Vista Labor Day parade.

Jarding, who last summer mocked Allen's time in Nevada at "a dude ranch," said he thinks voters will put Allen out to pasture.

"He may have wanted to be a cowboy, but there weren't a lot of cowboys on Santa Monica Boulevard," he said.

Allen's advisers say the senator is unlikely to alter his persona.

"He's the kind of person who relates to the old Western way of doing things, where you have a lot of self-responsibility and you have to do things on your own and you can't rely on others." Timmons said. "He is not somebody who is going to change who he is to suit some fad."

Senate Hopefuls In Tenn. Square Off (AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) -- Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker on Saturday called his Democratic opponent, Harold Ford Jr., a member of a family engaged in "machine-type politics," while Ford accused Corker of doing nothing about illegal immigrants working on his job site years ago.

Ford, a Memphis congressman who would be the first black U.S. senator from the South since Reconstruction, and Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, are vying to replace Bill Frist, the Republican Senate majority leader, who is retiring. The Nov. 7 election's outcome could determine whether Democrats can take control of the Senate.

In the first of three scheduled debates, Corker said it is unusual that a Ford has held the 9th District congressional seat for more than three decades and noted that the Ford family has long been active in area politics.

"Let me be clear: I love them," Ford said of his family. But he urged Corker to stick to the debate.

Corker has previously shied away from bringing up the Ford family history. Over the years, members of Ford's family have won numerous local elections in Memphis and won seats in Congress and the state Legislature.

Ford's uncle is awaiting trial on federal bribery charges, and his father once was indicted in a federal bank fraud case but was acquitted.

"I'm making an observation that it's pretty much a family business, and I think it's something we all see and know ... that there's a sort of machine-type politics that takes place," Corker said.

Ford responded: "There's too much joy in my heart to respond to that, so I'll let it go."

After the debate Ford said Corker's comments about his family show a desperate campaign "grasping" for issues to bring up against him.

Both candidates said they want to control government spending, clamp down on illegal immigration and reduce the country's dependence on foreign oil.

But Ford charged that Corker -- who ran a construction company before becoming mayor -- did nothing after illegal immigrants were found to be working on a Memphis construction site he was developing in 1988.

"My question is, when you learned there were illegals on the site, why didn't you fire the subcontractor?" Ford asked Corker, who did not have an opportunity to respond during the debate.

Corker noted afterward that his company cooperated with federal immigration officials.

During the debate, Corker criticized Ford's votes against a ban on a type of late-term abortion, a position that Ford said he has since changed.

"You flipped-flopped on abortion also," Ford said to Corker. "You were for abortion before you ran the last time, and now you're against it."

During an earlier run for Senate in 1994, Corker said government shouldn't be involved in the issue.

"I was wrong in 1994," Corker said Saturday. "I didn't understand the issue in a proper way. It was the first time I ran for public office."

Ford has said he backs upholding the "law of the land" that grants a woman the right to an abortion.

Democrat Ford Wages A Conservative Campaign In His Senate Bid (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

CAMDEN, Tenn. - No one knows if God is paying much attention to the U.S. Senate race in Tennessee. But the Senate race is paying a lot of attention to God.

The latest and perhaps most revealing battle in the clash for control of the Senate seat here hinges on a campaign commercial shot in a church by Rep. Harold Ford Jr., the Democrat seeking the Republican-held seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Bill Frist.

"Here," Ford says in the ad, walking down a church aisle before sitting in a pew and ripping into his opponent, "I learned the difference between right and wrong."

Not well enough, counter the Republicans.

"What kind of man parties with Playboy Playmates in lingerie, then films political ads in a church pew?" asks an ad aired by the National Republican Senatorial Committee, referring to Ford's attendance at a Playboy magazine Super Bowl party.

The skirmish over Ford's place in church underscores a central theme in the campaign: whether Ford is culturally and politically conservative enough to win over rural white voters and become the first Democrat elected from the state in 16 years - and the first black ever popularly elected from the South.

If Ford can win the Republican seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, he would help his party along the way to the six-seat gain it needs to win control. More than that, a Ford victory would signal that Democrats could win again in the South, where it has been losing both Senate seats and presidential elections.

"We're 33 days away and I can taste it," Ford said during a campaign stop in Camden.

Polls show the race a tossup between Ford and Republican Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga. Ford has the support of more than 90 percent of the state's blacks, and solid support around his Memphis base. But he trails among whites, and polls often miss hidden bias against black candidates that could mean he trails among whites by a larger margin.

To be elected, he needs to win and hold the center.

"They say I don't look like you, but I share your values," he said to applause from more than 200 rural white voters crowded into a Camden restaurant called the Catfish Place.

He lauded Ronald Reagan, bragged of his support for gun rights, balanced budgets, the Patriot Act and the war in Iraq, and constantly illustrated political points with references to church, the Bible and God. His cowboy boots, farm co-op baseball hat and generous use of "y'all" belie his East Coast, prep school upbringing.

As if to underscore which audience he's trying to reach, Ford brushed aside a reporter from National Public Radio to give an extended interview after his Camden events to the Christian Broadcasting Network.

In a later interview, Ford said his biggest challenge is the image of the national Democratic Party.

"There is a national perception of the Democratic Party that they are out of touch on moral and cultural issues, they're unable to protect and defend the country," he said. "I think that perception is wrong, and clearly we are making progress in overcoming it."

But he never stops working at it.

He even acknowledged supporting President Bush on some issues.

"When he said let's go take down the terrorists in Afghanistan, I sided with him," he tell crowds. "When he said it was right to give our intelligence officers more tools to make sure they can find those who are doing harm to us in this country, I said, Yes, sir. And when he said I want to remove Saddam Hussein, I wish he had a plan, but I said, Yes, sir, I'll go with you."

Of his attendance at Playboy magazine's Super Bowl Party, the bachelor tells audiences to laughter, "I got to admit, I do like girls."

Said Buck Carter, a county highway superintendent in Camden: "In this part of the world, that's not a negative. Guys around here would rather have gone with him."

He also raises the potentially troubling subject of his family. His father, a former congressman, was acquitted of corruption charges in 1993. His uncle, a state senator, faces trial this fall on corruption charges.

"I love my family," Ford told supporters. "There is nothing anybody can say or do that will bring any distance between any member of my family and me."

Ford accuses Republicans of trying to use "code words" to remind voters that he is black.

"They talk abut how different I am from you. And they got all these mail pieces going out all over the state, saying Harold Ford's not one of you," he said. "I know what he's really trying to say, and you do, too."

He also accused Republicans of altering a photo of him to make him appear darker. Ford is fair skinned.

Corker did not respond to repeated requests for an interview. But Chris Devaney, executive director of the Tennessee Republican Party, said the photograph of Ford was not altered.

He also said that Ford has a more liberal voting record than he admits. The National Journal last year gave him a rating of 58 percent, with 0 being the most conservative and 100 being the most liberal.

"To get elected in this state, you have to have conservative values," he said. "When you look at his record, he clearly isn't."

Senate Debate In New Jersey: War Of Words (NYT)

By David W. Chen

Each accused the other of being a liar, their voices often rising. They interrupted each other constantly, making it almost impossible at times to hear what was being said. The tone was so combative that it almost seemed as if the two men, who appeared uncomfortable standing only inches apart, might have been one personal insult away from a World Cup-style head butt.

For anyone who has missed the campaign commercials or news media coverage about the race for the United States Senate in New Jersey, the fractious debate yesterday between Senator Robert Menendez and State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. may have come across as a piece of shockingly raw theater. But in both tone and substance, the one-hour session provided a concise summary of the campaign.

There was Mr. Kean, a 38-year-old Republican who is the scion of a storied political family, managing to turn every question, whether about health care or personal foibles, into an opportunity to invoke the key theme of his candidacy: that Mr. Menendez, a veteran of the Darwinian world of Hudson County politics, is a political boss without a moral compass who is saddled with corrupt associates.

"I'm saying that when people look at Bob Menendez's background, all too frequently they need to go to jail," Mr. Kean said. "That's where 37 of Bob Menendez's friends and contributors are."

And there was Mr. Menendez, the 52-year-old Democrat and veteran of Congress who was appointed to serve the last year of Gov. Jon S. Corzine's term, reciprocating by repeating, time and again, one of his key contentions: that Mr. Kean is a partisan Republican who supports the policies, and is beholden to the fund-raising machine of President Bush, whose approval ratings are in the low 30's in the state.

"I think that my opponent basically supports the president across the board," Mr. Menendez said. "He has been relatively supportive and silent for six years. You can't change that in six weeks."

With just a few quiet exceptions, overshadowing it all was the vitriolic way the two men delivered their messages, reinforcing the reasons why the race is considered one of the tightest, nastiest and most closely scrutinized in the country this year.

"It's hard to be lectured on ethics by an individual who's under federal criminal investigation," Mr. Kean said early in the debate.

"That's an absolute lie on your part," Mr. Menendez fired back.

The one-hour debate, sponsored by the CBS affiliates in Manhattan and Philadelphia and The New York Times, was taped yesterday at the studios of WCBS in Manhattan, and was to be broadcast at 8 this morning in New York and Philadelphia.

It was not the candidates' first sparring match; they debated twice in June, shortly after each won his primary. But it may be the last televised one, considering that Mr. Kean last week pulled out of a debate scheduled for next weekend. (There is also a live radio debate scheduled for Oct. 17 on WKXW, 101.5 FM.)

With the election one month away, both sides acknowledged that the stakes were particularly high, as whoever wins in New Jersey could play a major role in determining which party controls the Senate.

Even though New Jersey has been solidly Democratic in recent statewide elections, and has not elected a Republican to the United States Senate since 1972, Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean have been in a virtual dead heat for months. In the most recent poll last week, from Fairleigh Dickinson University, Mr. Menendez had a lead of 5 percentage points, 42 to 37, in a survey of 514 probable voters, with a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

During the debate, there were no obvious gaffes, no moments of embarrassment. But there were plenty of memorable exchanges.

At one point, the candidates were asked to grade Mr. Bush.

Mr. Menendez rated the administration between a D and an F, he said, for its handling of the war in Iraq and its amassing of trillions of dollars in debt.

Mr. Kean — who on Friday became the first major Republican candidate to call for the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, to resign in the aftermath of the Mark Foley scandal — first expressed frustration with Mr. Bush on the war and stem cell research, but then awarded him a B-minus.

The two candidates also jousted with each other, and with the panel of three journalists, over the tone of their television commercials.

When asked whether they regretted the negative nature of the commercials — including one for Mr. Menendez that linked Mr. Kean to a jailed Hudson County Democrat whom Mr. Kean's campaign had contacted in hopes of sullying Mr. Menendez's image — neither man disavowed his tactics.

"I'm proud of my campaign," Mr. Kean said on two occasions.

Mr. Menendez said his first three commercials were substantive, touching on issues like port security and his record in fighting corruption in Union City and opposing the war in Iraq. He added: "I regret that I have to respond to Tom Kean's vicious attacks."

One of the testier moments came when Mr. Menendez was asked about reports that a longtime friend, Donald Scarinci, had been overheard asking a psychiatrist who had $1 million in Hudson County contracts to hire one of Mr. Menendez's political patrons or risk losing the contracts.

Mr. Menendez distanced himself from Mr. Scarinci, saying he was no longer involved in the campaign. He then repeated his contention that Mr. Kean had tried to "shake down" corporations, receiving tens of thousands of dollars in contributions from members of corporate boards on which his father, former Gov. Thomas H. Kean Sr., served.

"I am tired of Bob Menendez attacking my family," said Mr. Kean, whose father, twin brother, wife and two daughters were with him yesterday. "That's what you're doing, Bob."

"I'm not attacking your family," responded Mr. Menendez, whose two grown children attended the event. "I'm talking about you."

"No, you're not, Bob," Mr. Kean retorted.

"I'm talking about you," Mr. Menendez continued. "Your judgment and your ethics."

"How would I — how in the world would I shake somebody down, Bob?" Mr. Kean said. "That is absurd!"

As the two were trying to talk over each other, Mr. Menendez accused Mr. Kean of rebuffing a request that he meet with families of soldiers fighting in Iraq. "You didn't even have the dignity of answering" the families, Mr. Menendez said.

"Oh, come on, Bob," Mr. Kean responded. "Let's be real."

To end the debate, the moderator, Jim Rosenfield of WCBS-TV in New York, asked the most personal question of the session: what each candidate saw as his biggest mistake.

Mr. Menendez said his biggest mistake had been voting for Mr. Bush's No Child Left Behind education law, which he said he had supported because he trusted that the president would back it up with financing.

Mr. Kean began by saying that he did not spend as much time with his wife and daughters as he would like, but then talked about the importance of rooting out corruption in government.

In a sign of the debate's importance, leading figures in each party showed up in the studios. For the Democrats, it was Mr. Corzine and Representative Robert E. Andrews of Camden County. For the Republicans, it was Mr. Kean's father.

An hour before the debate, as Mr. Corzine was leaving an elevator, he bumped into the elder Mr. Kean. The two exchanged pleasantries, and Mr. Corzine said he looked forward to the conclusion of the debates — and, presumably, to an end to the nastiness of the campaign.

Mr. Kean did not disagree.

A Show Of Hostility For Menendez And Kean (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

For weeks now State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. has claimed that his opponent Senator Robert Menendez is under federal investigation. So it was no surprise that he said it again in his very first response during the candidates' third debate yesterday.

Asked about the House scandal involving former Representative Mark Foley, Mr. Kean said Congress's ethics committees need to be revamped, then sneaked in the aside: "I mean, I've got an opponent who is under federal criminal investigation."

"That is absolutely untrue," a finger-wagging Mr. Menendez cut in.

So began a debate marked as much by unproven accusations and overstatement as by hostility. A close look shows how each candidate yesterday used small factual kernels to make sweeping claims that are hard to prove or disprove.

Most notable among the arguable claims was the question of a federal probe into an anti-poverty agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, and Senator Menendez's role in it.

While it is true that Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, did subpoena records from the nonprofit agency last month, there have been no reports or statements from federal prosecutors indicating that Mr. Menendez is under criminal investigation, as Mr. Kean claimed repeatedly yesterday.

The nonprofit agency paid more than $320,000 to lease a building in Union City from Mr. Menendez for nearly a decade while he helped it secure millions in federal grants as a member of Congress. Mr. Menendez has said the rent, starting at $3,100 a month and ending at $3,400 a month, was comparable to market rates at the time, a claim supported by a real estate broker quoted in a 1996 Jersey Journal article examining the lease deal.

In that same article, Mr. Menendez said the lease deal was verbally approved by Ellen Weintraub, a lawyer at the time for the House Ethics Committee. Ms. Weintraub, who now serves on the Federal Election Commission, told The New York Times recently that she did not remember Mr. Menendez asking her about the deal but did not dispute that she might have cleared it.

"I'm not aware of any rule in effect then or now that would have prohibited a member of Congress from renting his property to an entity that receives federal funding," she said.

When news of the subpoenas broke last month, Mr. Menendez told ABC's George Stephanopoulos that he welcomed the investigation, "and we look forward to its successful conclusion." Mr. Menendez has also said the timing of Mr. Christie's subpoena appeared politically motivated.

Mr. Kean pointed to those statements yesterday as evidence of an investigation. But since his Sept. 24 appearance on ABC News' "This Week," Mr. Menendez repeatedly has said that he is not under investigation, and that none of his personal banking or financial records have been requested. He told reporters yesterday that his comments to Mr. Stephanopoulos were made "off the top of my mind."

Asked about the North Hudson subpoenas after the debate, Mr. Menendez responded:

"There is constantly an effort to subpoena documents to get information, and then you make a conclusion of whether or not an investigation is even worth pursuing. It's far less than a criminal investigation, come on."

Throughout the frenzied debate, during which the candidates frequently cut each other off and strayed from the questions, both men continued to hurl questionable allegations of ethical lapses at each other.

"On the same day that you received thousands of dollars of contributions from one of the state's largest insurance companies, you gave them a vote that gave them a $40 million tax loophole," Mr. Menendez said, referring to a 2005 vote Mr. Kean made to maintain a tax exemption for the Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield health insurance companies after he received thousands in contributions from company executives and their families.

But Mr. Kean's vote was hardly pivotal; he voted with his party, and the exemption was killed in the Democratic-controlled Senate. Company officials and Kean's campaign have said that the contributions had no influence on Mr. Kean's vote.

Mr. Menendez went on to criticize Mr. Kean based on an article published yesterday in the Star-Ledger that said the state senator had accepted $213,025 in donations, both in his state and federal campaigns, from employees of firms who do business with the state government. Mr. Kean has proposed legislation that would have banned such contributions to candidates for state office.

"First and foremost," Mr. Kean responded. "It's hard to be lectured on ethics by an individual who's under federal criminal investigation — — "

"I'm not, Tom, stop saying that," Mr. Menendez replied.

Mr. Kean told reporters after the debate that until the law is changed, it is perfectly legal to accept such contributions.

Mr. Menendez also accused Mr. Kean of trying to "shake down" a corporation for contributions. He was referring to a report in the Wall Street Journal of a fund-raiser Mr. Kean held in Minnesota with executives of UnitedHealth Group on the same day his father, former Gov. Tom Kean Sr., who sat on the board of directors, was meeting with other directors to discuss possible irregularities with stock options given to top executives.

The company is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the implication was that the donations could be seen as an attempt to influence a witness because the elder Mr. Kean sat on the board's compensation committee.

Mr. Kean accused Mr. Menendez of attacking his father and added, "How in the world would I shake somebody down, Bob? That is absurd."

On the topic of stem-cell research, which both candidates say they support, Mr. Kean said he voted for research financing in the state assembly. Mr. Menendez quickly responded that his opponent voted against it six times. But three of the votes involved research money that was embedded in omnibus state budget bills that Mr. Kean and most of his fellow Republicans voted against. He said he did not like how the other three bills, which involved research facilities, were being financed. Mr. Kean has also gone further than most Republicans in saying that he supports embryonic stem-cell research.

Mr. Menendez also accused Mr. Kean of quitting the powerful State Senate budget committee earlier this year to avoid controversial votes that could haunt him in his bid for United States Senate. Mr. Kean's campaign has said that he left the committee solely to devote more time to the campaign.

Senate Hopefuls Debate Bush Ties, Federal Inquiry (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 8, 2006

NEW YORK -- Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez denied he is under federal investigation, while Republican challenger Thomas H. Kean Jr. rated the Bush administration a "B-minus" during a combative debate yesterday between New Jersey's two U.S. Senate candidates.

The hourlong debate, in which the two men often spoke over each other so loudly that it was difficult to hear what either was saying, showcased an intense contest marked by corruption charges.

Democrats usually win easily in New Jersey, but corruption charges against Mr. Menendez have the party fighting to keep the Senate seat.

"There is no such federal criminal investigation," Mr. Menendez said when asked to respond to an ad by Mr. Kean's camp.

Mr. Menendez said repeatedly that Mr. Kean is in agreement with President Bush and out of touch with state voters.

"When you're wrong on the war in Iraq, when you're wrong on privatizing Social Security ... then you have to play the politics of smear and personal destruction," he said.

Federal investigators are examining a rental deal in which a nonprofit group received millions of dollars in federal funding while Mr. Menendez was a House member, the Star-Ledger reported last month.

"The voters of the state deserve to know that they've got a senator under federal criminal investigation," Mr. Kean said during the debate, which was sponsored by New York and New Jersey CBS affiliates and the New York Times.

Mr. Kean pledged to bring a higher ethical standard to state politics. "We've had our state be the butt of jokes on David Letterman and Jay Leno," he said.

Mr. Menendez told reporters after the debate that a subpoena for records doesn't mean federal authorities are investigating him.

DOJ_NMG_0078106

A Menendez ad says the Kean campaign consulted with a convicted felon, and the Democrat yesterday referenced a report in the Star-Ledger article that said Mr. Kean accepted thousands of dollars in contributions from state contractors even though, as a state senator, he introduced a bill two years ago to ban political candidates from receiving such donations.

Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean have been at a virtual tie in the race, but two recent polls gave Mr. Menendez a slight edge.

When asked yesterday to rate the Bush administration, Mr. Kean answered "B-minus." The Republican has distanced himself from the president throughout his campaign.

He made headlines last week by calling for the resignation House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert over the Illinois Republican's handling of the scandal involving lurid messages sent by former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, to a male teenager who was a former page.

"There's things I've been frustrated by," Mr. Kean said. He said he disagrees with Mr. Bush on stem-cell research, energy policy, the environment and spending but supports Mr. Bush's approach to tax cuts and fighting terrorism.

Democrats said Mr. Kean's B-minus rating proves he supports the president.

"B-minus makes the honor roll," said Rep. Robert E. Andrews, a New Jersey Democrat who attended the debate. "I think that Tom Kean made our case for us today, convincingly."

N.J. Senate Hopefuls Face Off In Debate (AP)

By Angela Delli Santi, Associated Press Writer

The Associated Press, October 7, 2006

New Jersey's two Senate hopefuls faced off Saturday in an hourlong exchange characterized more by a lack of civility than the dialogue on issues they had said they wanted.

Sen. Robert Menendez and state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. repeatedly attacked each other during their first meeting of the fall, with Menendez frequently waving his index finger for emphasis and Kean cutting off his opponent in mid-sentence.

Both men relied on familiar lines of attack in the increasingly contentious and closely watched contest for a full six-year Senate term. The race could affect whether Democrats can take control of the U.S. Senate.

Kean, a Republican, has made ethics a centerpiece of his campaign and has tried to tie Menendez to the Democratic machine politics of rough-and-tumble Hudson County, N.J.

Menendez has sought from the beginning to link Kean to the unpopular policies of the Bush administration, most notably the war in Iraq.

When asked to grade the Bush administration, Kean gave the president a B-minus. But he said he disagreed with Bush on several issues, including environmental and energy policies. Kean said he also supports stem cell research.

Kean has said he supported the president's decision to wage war in Iraq, though he believes mistakes have been made and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld should be fired.

Menendez, who voted against the resolution authorizing the Iraq invasion, said he would give Bush a grade of D or F.

Kean Jr. hammered away at Menendez's supposed ethical lapses, repeatedly saying he is under federal criminal investigation on suspicion of renting a building he owned to an anti-poverty organization that receives federal funds.

Menendez acknowledges that federal investigators have issued subpoenas in the lease deal but denies that he is under investigation.

Asked to defend a similarly themed campaign commercial, Kean said he had an obligation to tell voters about his opponent's character.

Menendez was also asked to defend a negative commercial for his campaign, in which he portrays a Kean campaign researcher as befriending a convicted felon in order to dig up dirt on him. Menendez said he made the commercial to dispel the accusations against him and pointed out that he made three positive ads before going negative.

Moderator Jim Rosenfield told both candidates that media reports have accused them of engaging in a smear campaign. Kean said, "I'm proud of my campaign," and Menendez said, "I regret that I have to respond to Tom Kean Jr.'s vicious attacks."

Menendez is considered the incumbent, having been appointed by Gov. Jon S. Corzine to fill the remainder of his term last year. Kean hopes to be New Jersey's first Republican senator in 30 years.

A Fairleigh Dickinson-Public Mind survey out Thursday showed Menendez with a slight edge. There are more Democrats than Republicans in New Jersey, but independent voters far outnumber those registered with either party. Menendez had raised $7.39 million for his campaign, according to the latest filings, while Kean had $2.25 million.

The candidates next meet on Oct. 17 for a one-hour live radio debate.

Saturday's taped debate will be broadcast in New Jersey, New York and Philadelphia on CBS stations at 8 a.m. Sunday.

Democrat Poised To Become First Muslim In Congress (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar

MINNEAPOLIS — Keith Ellison, the Democratic candidate for Congress here, strode among the stalls of exotically printed fabric, telephone cards and sweet tea at a Somali mall, shaking hands with his fellow Muslims.

"The community showed up big!" Mr. Ellison, 43, said, dispensing hugs as he thanked the many immigrant Somalis whose votes had helped him beat six other candidates in a primary race in September.

Mr. Ellison, a stocky criminal defense lawyer who converted to Islam in college, is expected by experts to make history on Election Day by becoming the first Muslim elected to Congress, as well as the first black representative from Minnesota.

"If he wins, he will take the oath of office on a Koran," Ali Ahmed, a social services worker, said as he wandered through the Karmel Square mall, a popular shopping and social destination for Somali immigrants.

"Our main concern is that Muslims are treated differently from Christians," Mr. Ahmed said. "So he can show that we are all the same people."

The Fifth Congressional District is a Democratic citadel. The last Republican to represent it lost re-election in 1962.

Mr. Ellison's Republican opponent, Alan Fine, has made a concerted effort to discredit him for previous ties to the Nation of Islam, the radical group founded by Louis Farrakhan, but experts do not expect Mr. Fine to pose a serious challenge.

Though Mr. Ellison usually mentions his faith on the campaign trail only when asked, his candidacy has amounted to something of a political awakening among Muslims tired of being vilified since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

"They were resistant to voting because a lot of them thought it wouldn't make a difference," said Abdisalam Adam, the director of a Somali cultural center who helped send scores of volunteers door to door to bring out voters in the primary. "This is the first time we saw people get excited and identify with the issues."

Mr. Ellison's progressive positions, including support for universal health coverage, raising the minimum wage and withdrawing the troops from Iraq, cemented his appeal among a broad swath of Democrats in this liberal district.

But political analysts and community organizers say African-Americans and Muslim immigrants here secured Mr. Ellison's 7,000-vote margin on Sept. 12.

"This is the way we build political power," Mr. Ellison told supporters. "They can't ignore us anymore when we show up to vote."

There are far larger communities of Muslims in the United States, with the overall population estimates ranging from three million to more than six million American Muslims. But few other Congressional districts have such a high concentration.

Somalis started arriving here in 1993 as refugees fleeing the civil war in their country. Their number has grown to 120,000, with one-fourth in the Fifth District, Mr. Adam said. He estimated that 80 percent of the Somalis who voted in the primary cast ballots for the first time. "The Somali community is probably the least educated and the least organized in terms of having any experience with democracy," he said.

Mr. Ellison brushes off the idea that he was motivated to run for Congress to become the first Muslim or first black from Minnesota. Rather it was to change policy, he said, to fight in the manner of the beloved Senator Paul Wellstone against a Republican administration that marginalized the poor and minorities.

Energizing black Muslims or immigrants, Mr. Ellison said, is a side benefit. "I've never sat down and said, 'Gee I'm going to be the first,' " he said, "It holds no magic for me."

He does concede a certain element of breaking ground.

"Any ethnic or religious group that is new to American politics is going to go through trouble," he said, reaching next to his office desk to open a book called "Jews in American Politics."

He read aloud a passage about how Jews were vilified and blocked from political office until their expertise in various fields proved crucial to the New Deal.

"It's going to be the same way for Muslims," he said. "It is just going to take a while."

The campaign has been an indication of the hurdles ahead. The primary turned nasty in May, after Mr. Ellison won the endorsement from the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party, as the Democrats are known here.

The press and Republican blogs like MinnesotaDemocratsExposed.com unearthed problems from Mr. Ellison's past. They included late filings of income taxes and campaign finance reports, plus a raft of unpaid moving violations and parking tickets that led to a suspended driver's license.

Most damaging were newspaper columns that he wrote under the pen name Keith E. Hakim in 1989 and 1990, when Mr. Ellison was a law student at the University of Minnesota. One explosive column defended Mr. Farrakhan against accusations of racism. Conservatives accused Mr. Ellison of having been a local leader for the radical group.

Mr. Ellison quickly apologized for past mistakes. He said repeatedly, including in a local synagogue, that he was distantly affiliated with the Nation of Islam for 18 months while helping to organize the Minnesota delegation to the Million Man March in Washington in 1995.

He said he saw the march as a way to promote personal responsibility and economic development but said he later found it pointless.

He also sent a letter to the Jewish Community Relations Council in Minneapolis, repudiating Mr. Farrakhan and his supporters as anti-Semitic.

Mr. Ellison prevailed in the primary despite the controversy because "he had intense, loyal supporters who are not going to be chased off," said Lawrence Jacobs, director of the Center for the Study of Politics and Governance at the Humphrey Institute at the University of Minnesota.

Mr. Fine, the Republican candidate, has reignited the fight.

"I'm extremely concerned about Keith Ellison, Keith Hakim, Keith X Ellison, Keith Ellison Muhammad," Mr. Fine said at a news conference after Mr. Ellison's victory in the primary, mocking pseudonyms that Mr. Ellison used in college.

Mr. Fine has repeatedly accused Mr. Ellison of being a follower of Mr. Farrakhan and of being backed by a Muslim lobbying organization that Mr. Fine said supported terrorism.

"I'm personally offended as a Jew that we have a candidate like this running for U.S. Congress," Mr. Fine said at the news conference.

Some Jews applauded Mr. Fine. Others said they were appalled by what they heard as inflammatory remarks. An older brother of Mr. Fine, Robert Fine, a lawyer, called Mr. Ellison to disassociate himself from the attack.

The Republican, a 44-year-old management lecturer at the Carleton School of Management, has been trying to clarify his remarks.

"This has nothing to do with his being a Muslim, this has nothing to do with his being black," Mr. Fine said in an interview in a coffee shop that serves as his campaign headquarters. "This is about someone who supports people who hate. That is why he is unqualified for Congress."

Mr. Ellison was raised a Roman Catholic in Detroit, converting to Islam as a 19-year-old sophomore at Wayne State University. He refuses to discuss publicly his reasons, stating in snippets of interviews between campaign stops: "I don't remember any grand epiphany. I saw no vision, no lightning on the road to Damascus."

He lives in north Minneapolis, one of the highest crime areas in the city, with his wife, Kim, a high school mathematics teacher, and their four children.

He said he had never met Mr. Farrakhan, but conceded that as a young man he was more taken with the message of social empowerment and figured that the accusations of anti-Semitism were just the usual slur against any black leader.

"It's amazing," Mr. Ellison said, "that people naturally assume that there would not be a measure of anger and frustration in the black community" over their history of exploitation here.

Control Of The Governors' Mansions In Play (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Democrats need to gain four seats to achieve a national majority. Fewer than a dozen appear truly up for grabs in November, experts say.

For the first time since the 1994 Republican landslide, Democrats are poised to attain a majority of the nation's governorships, an important political toehold regardless of who wins the battle to control Congress.

Election handicappers forecast Democratic gains of four to eight seats out of the 36 on the Nov. 7 ballot, with the Republican-held governor's chairs in New York and Ohio considered most likely to switch parties. The Democrats need to gain four governorships for a national majority.

Massachusetts, Arkansas, Colorado and Maryland also look promising for Democratic candidates, according to campaign analysts. In Massachusetts — the land of Kennedys — a win would put a Democratic governor under the gold Capitol dome for the first time in more than a dozen years.

Four seats appear to be tossups: Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa and Michigan, all states that could prove vital in the 2008 presidential campaign. All but Minnesota have Democratic governors now.

Overall, "I think the Democrats have to be more optimistic about their chances," said elections analyst Tim Storey of the National Conference of State Legislatures. "The way polls show it, Democrats are definitely going to make gains."

As with the state-by-state congressional struggle, factors shaping individual gubernatorial contests vary. In Michigan, it is the state's sagging economy. In Wisconsin, it is government ethics. In Minnesota, it is education and healthcare. In Iowa, it is a grab bag of issues, including immigration.

But more broadly, the voter pessimism that has Republicans fighting to keep control of the House and Senate is hurting the GOP at a time it has to defend far more governors' seats than Democrats do.

"Because Republicans have all this exposure, you've got to draw some connections to what is going on nationally," said Jennifer Duffy, who analyzes gubernatorial contests for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Another problem facing the GOP is longevity: Republicans have been governor for eight or more years in several of the states with midterm elections, and voters often show an inclination to switch party control after such a period.

"It's hard to run a state," said Stuart Rothenberg, an independent election analyst in Washington. "You have to make some tough calls. You're going to make enemies. So there's kind of a normal rotation we don't see in the House and Senate."

Democrats have one other factor going their way: Nine Republican-held seats are open — meaning no incumbent is running, so the seat is more competitive — as opposed to just one open Democratic seat, in Iowa.

There are bright spots for the GOP. Three of the four most populous states — Texas; Florida; and California, where Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides is challenging Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger — seem likely to stay in Republican hands, according to opinion polls and political experts.

Each party has its election-day wish list. Democrats talk of the chance to pick up an open seat in Nevada; to stage an upset in Florida, where Republican Jeb Bush is stepping down; and to knock off the GOP incumbent in Democratic-leaning Rhode Island, where a hot U.S. Senate race could turn out loyalists. Republicans are talking about possible pickups in Oregon, where Gov. Ted Kulongoski finished with a less-than-impressive 54% in May's Democratic primary; and Illinois, where Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich seeks reelection but has been dogged by ethics allegations.

But most analysts say that, barring surprises, fewer than a dozen seats appear truly up for grabs.

According to Republican Governors Assn. Executive Director Phil Musser: "There's no question we're facing a bit of a head wind. The national mood ain't great."

Although the scandal surrounding recently resigned Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has complicated GOP efforts, the party's strategists are counting on a superior get-out-the-vote operation, like the efforts that boosted Republican turnout in the last several elections, to stem midterm losses.

More is at stake in the governor's races than mere bragging rights.

With Washington twisted in partisan knots, governors have taken the lead on welfare, healthcare, immigration and the environment, among other issues. Statehouse initiatives have offered blueprints for national legislation, such as federal welfare changes during the Clinton administration.

"That's where the policy innovation is going on: with the governors and legislatures," Storey said.

Statehouses have also been an important presidential proving ground; four of the last five White House occupants had been governors. Bill Clinton was in his fifth term as Arkansas governor when he was elected president in 1992, and George W. Bush won the White House in 2000 during his second term as Texas governor.

For 2008, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Iowa's outgoing Gov. Tom Vilsack and former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner are all exploring bids for the Democratic presidential nomination. Among Republicans, outgoing Govs. George E. Pataki of New York, Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Mike Huckabee of Arkansas are considering running.

And governors who aren't themselves aspirants can boost presidential campaigns — using their clout to help raise money and muster volunteers, serving as state surrogates for the party nominee and amplifying a campaign's message with the gubernatorial megaphone. (Many Democrats are convinced that Bush would never have won the decisive states of Florida in 2000 or Ohio in 2004 if Republican governors hadn't been overseeing those states' elections.)

As Democratic advisor Mark Mellman puts it: Although "there's far from a perfect correlation between holding the governorship and winning a state" in a presidential campaign, nonetheless, "as my grandmother would have said, it certainly can't hurt and in a lot of ways it can help." Mellman is advising the governors of Michigan and Wisconsin in their reelection bids and was a strategist for the 2004 presidential campaign of Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

Governors elected this November also will have a leg up on reelection in 2010, putting them at the center of the political line-drawing that will take place after the next census. That, in turn, could go a long way toward shaping the partisan makeup of Congress for years to come.

Hot races

Fewer than a dozen of the 36 gubernatorial races across the country are truly competitive at this point, election analysts say. Here is a look at six of the hardest-fought contests.

Race

Iowa: State Secretary of State Chet Culver (D) faces Rep. Jim Nussle (R) in a race for an open seat that is viewed as a toss-up.

Background

Culver, son of a former U.S. senator, has a homegrown brand name and is portraying Nussle as a Washington insider. But Culver has been a less-than-nimble campaigner in a race heated up by the abortion and immigration issues.

Race

Massachusetts: Deval Patrick (D) faces

Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey (R) and Christy Mihos (I) for an open seat in a state that leans Democratic.

Background

Patrick, deputy U.S. attorney general under President Clinton, is vying to become the second elected black governor in the nation's history. Healey has the tough task of distancing herself from, but not alienating, outgoing Republican Gov. Mitt Romney.

Race

Michigan: Gov. Jennifer Granholm (D) is in a tight race against Dick DeVos (R).

Background

Michigan's woeful economy has made Granholm, once hailed as a rising national star, highly vulnerable. DeVos, drawing millions from his inherited Amway fortune, has been sharply criticizing her on the TV airwaves since February.

DOJ_NMG_0078111

Race

Minnesota: Race between Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R) and Atty. Gen. Mike Hatch (D) is a toss-up.

Background

Voters like Pawlenty, but not his handling of education, healthcare and transportation. Hatch's pugnacious personality may be too much for voters in this famously polite state.

Race

Nevada: In a state that leans Republican, Rep. Jim Gibbons (R) faces state Senate Minority Leader Dina Titus (D) for an open seat.

Background

Gibbons started out as a favorite, but Nevada has been trending Democratic, thanks to its growing Latino population and union muscle. Titus is also benefiting from tensions between Gibbons and outgoing GOP Gov. Kenny Guinn.

Race

Wisconsin: Gov. James Doyle (D) is trying to hold off a challenge from U.S. Rep. Mark Green (R).

Background

Doyle has been plagued by ethics issues. Green is campaigning on the time-for-a-change message that Democrats are using elsewhere. But his Washington return address doesn't help.

The Big-Sky Dem (NYT)

By Mark Sundeen

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

It's fun being governor of Montana. Just watch Brian Schweitzer bouncing around the streets of Helena in the passenger seat of the state's official S.U.V., fumbling with wires, trying to stick the flashing police light on the roof. When he spots some legislators on the sidewalk, he blasts them with the siren, then summons them by name on the loudspeaker. The men jump, and the governor tumbles out of the car, doubled in laughter, giving everyone a bear hug or a high-five or a soft slap on the cheek. Schweitzer, a Democrat in his first term, marches into a barroom in blue jeans and cowboy boots and a beaded bolo tie, and his border collie, Jag, leaps out of the vehicle and follows him in. The governor throws back a few pints of the local brew and introduces himself to everyone in the place, down to the servers and a small girl stuck there with her parents. He takes time from the backslapping to poach cubes of cheese from the snack platter and sneak them to the girl, who is now chasing his dog around the bar. "This is how you make friends with Jag," he advises her. "Just hold it in your hand and let him take it."

As soon as Schweitzer was elected in 2004 — the same night that George W. Bush carried Montana by 20 percentage points — pundits began declaring him the future of the Democratic Party. Never mind that it was his first elected office: the 51-year-old farmer and irrigation contractor had folksy charm and true-grit swagger. He shot guns, rode horses, took his dog to work and decimated his opponents with off-the-cuff one-liners heavy on the bull-and-horse metaphors. He didn't act like a Democrat, in other words, and to many Democrats, reeling from consecutive losses to Bush, that seemed like a pretty good thing.

Schweitzer's grandparents were homesteaders who immigrated to Montana from Ireland and Germany. His parents were ranchers who never completed high school. And until 2000, Schweitzer and his wife, Nancy, were farming in Whitefish and raising their three children. And then, despite the fact that he was a virtual unknown in politics, Schweitzer began a quixotic bid to oust Conrad Burns, a two-term incumbent Republican senator. To the surprise of Montana's political class, he came within four percentage points of succeeding. Almost immediately, he began campaigning for what would be an open governor's seat. Even after choosing a Republican as his running mate, he thumped his primary opponent by a 52-point margin, then won the general election by four points.

Within months of his election, bloggers were clamoring for a presidential run, and his popularity transcended the wonk journals to include coronation as "Hot Governor" by Rolling Stone magazine, while "60 Minutes" called him the Coal Cowboy. On camera he persuaded Lesley Stahl to take a whiff from a vial of diesel fuel synthesized from coal — a product that Schweitzer claims will not only fill Montana's coffers but also help end the nation's dependence on foreign oil peddled by "sheiks, rats, crooks, dictators."

Schweitzer's "Montana miracle," in which Democrats took back the governor's seat after 16 years and ended 12 years of Republican majorities in both state chambers, has been cited as evidence that the Republican bastions in the Western states are losing ground to a new, Democratic brand of libertarian-tinged prairie populism. No fewer than four recent books by Democratic strategists have mentioned Schweitzer as the kind of guy Democrats need to win back rural America. A fifth book, Tom Schaller's "Whistling Past Dixie," published earlier this month, also singles out Schweitzer and makes the previously heretical claim that the Democrats' future lies in ignoring the South and embracing the West and Midwest, where voters are less evangelical and more independent.

"He's one of the new stars in the party," Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association, told me recently. "We're highlighting him wherever we can." Indeed, just 54 days into his term, Schweitzer was chosen to deliver the Democrats' weekly radio address, and he has been attracting notice from the party faithful ever since — like when he compared the president to a shifty cattle auctioneer hawking lousy bulls to dubious ranchers.

Six-foot-two and a beefy 205 pounds, Schweitzer has seized the heartland imagery generally monopolized by Republicans. "Schweitzer is the antithesis of the Democrat stereotype," Markos Moulitsas Zuniga, of dailykos.com, the partisan Democratic blog, told me. "Too many Democrats look like targets for the school bully. Schweitzer is a tough guy. And people like guys who will bar-fight their way across a state."

Schweitzer veers right on many economic and social issues: he opposes gun control, favors the death penalty and preaches about lowering taxes and balancing budgets. At the same time, he leans left on some issues that matter to progressives: championing energy conservation and environmental regulation, opposing governmental restrictions on abortion and criticizing free-trade deals. "He's as much a prairie centrist as he is a prairie populist," Bruce Reed of the Democratic Leadership Council told me. Schweitzer has the ability to reduce a complicated issue to a few sharp lines, reframing it with themes of patriotism and underdog know-how. "I was a critic of Nafta, I was a critic of Cafta and I'll be a critic of Shafta," he says of free-trade agreements, long the hobgoblin of even the most articulate liberal politicians. "Why is it that America supposedly creates the best businessmen in the world, but when we go to the table with the third world, we come away losers?"

The Democrats' enthusiasm for their new hero seemed to overlook the fact that the governor of a state as sparsely populated as Montana simply does not wield a lot of national clout. Schweitzer governs fewer than a million people, in a state with a single Congressional representative, only three electoral votes and a Legislature that meets for just 90 days, every other year. Indeed, Schweitzer's national celebrity has less to do with the way he has governed and more to do with Democrats' perception — or their hope — that he is leading a Western resurgence.

The elections next month will test that theory. Schweitzer has been campaigning for the two Western Democrats best poised to replace powerful Republicans. In Montana, a populist farmer named Jon Tester is posing a serious challenge to Senator Conrad Burns, whose close ties to the lobbyist Jack Abramoff have made him an attractive target for Democrats trying to paint the Republicans as corrupt insiders. A Tester victory would solidify Montana as a Democratic stronghold, marking the first time since 1989 that the state's two senators and governor were all Democrats. (Montana's other senator, Max Baucus, a Democrat, has held his seat since 1978.) In Colorado, meanwhile, Schweitzer has been stumping for Bill Ritter, the former Denver district attorney, who grew up on a farm with 11 brothers and sisters, began working construction at age 14 and is now running for governor. A Ritter win would complete what Schweitzer calls a "blue bridge from Alberta to Mexico," a string of Democratic governorships stretching across Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona — states that all broke for Bush in 2004.

Some of this has to do with demographics. In the last three decades, professional and service jobs have boomed in the Rocky Mountain states, and farming and mining jobs have not; those two sectors, once the mainstay of the region, now make up just 5 percent of all jobs. In Nevada, Arizona and Colorado, a sharp rise in the Hispanic population in the last decade may also have helped tilt the voting base to the left. But Governor Schweitzer says he believes that his success points to something more significant. “Is it that the population in the West is trending toward the traditional Democratic Party?” Schweitzer asked. “Or is it possible that some leaders in the Rocky Mountains are on the vanguard of realigning what the Democrats stand for?”

The Interior West has long been seen by Democrats on election night as simply a disheartening wall of big red blocks. Idaho, Utah and Wyoming haven’t voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since Lyndon Johnson in 1964, and Montana, Colorado and Arizona have all gone Republican in 9 of the last 10 presidential elections. But below the surface, the map of the West is slowly becoming a little less red and a little more blue. In 2000, Democrats had not a single governor in the interior West states; now they have four. Democrats have gradually been picking up House seats, too. In 1996, they won 4 of 24 House seats in the region. But they’ve managed to pick up 1 or 2 seats in each of the last four elections and have now clawed their way up to 8 of 28. In 2004, the party’s only bright spot besides Montana was Colorado, where Ken Salazar won a Republican Senate seat; his brother, John, picked up a House seat; and the Democrats took control of both state chambers.

“The pan-Western states — in an arc from Ohio, west to Montana and south to Arizona — are where the low-hanging and most-ripe-for-the-plucking electoral fruit for Democrats is to be found,” writes Tom Schaller in “Whistling Past Dixie.” The midterm election outlook seems to support Schaller’s thesis. None of the region’s eight Democratic representatives — the so-called Coyote Caucus — are considered at serious risk in 2006. But 10 of the 20 Republican-held seats are included in the list of 56 potential Democratic pickups compiled by Larry Sabato at the University of Virginia’s Center for Politics. The Democratic Senate candidate in Arizona is putting up a surprising fight against the Republican incumbent, and the race for Nevada governor, an open seat vacated by a Republican, is listed by the Cook Report, an influential Washington political newsletter, as a toss up.

Local Democrats portray this trend as a grass-roots, homegrown phenomenon. “These advances were not the results of any national organization,” Jim Farrell, executive director of the Montana Democratic Party, told me, “but of the emergence of great local leadership like Schweitzer and Salazar. The D.S.C.C.” — the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, led by Charles Schumer of New York — “and other national groups have recognized the potential for gain, but they’re chasing after a train that began rolling in the last two cycles here in the West.”

It would seem to be true that Democrats in Washington long ignored the mountain states. As Pat Williams, a Montana Democrat who served in the House from 1979 to 1996, told me, “In 2000 you literally couldn’t get an Al Gore button in Montana.” But in recent years, the national Democratic Party has made some small but significant organizational shifts to increase the West’s political brawn. In August, the Democratic National Committee inserted a Nevada caucus into the 2008 presidential primary schedule, between Iowa and New Hampshire, in recognition that the Southwest is the nation’s fastest-growing region. The West has also gained influence through the elevation of Senator

Harry Reid, a pro-gun, pro-life Nevada Mormon, to Senate minority leader. Democrats have chosen Denver as one of two finalists to be host of their 2008 convention (the other is New York). If Denver is selected, it will mark the first time in a century that Democrats have held a convention in the interior West. The D.N.C. has hired as its Northwest political director Brad Martin, who as executive director of the Montana Democratic Party oversaw its 2004 gains, and

Howard Dean has dispatched more than 30 staff members to the Western states as part of his “50-state strategy.”

Still, Democrats hasten to assure the region’s notoriously prickly and independent voters that the national party’s new Western focus doesn’t mean that Washington will exercise any control over candidates in the region. “We’re not trying to be a top-down organization like the Republicans,” says Karen Finney, spokeswoman of the D.N.C. In the West, of course, being seen as refusing to take orders is a way to demonstrate your frontier spirit. Williams offers this advice to any Western candidate wondering whether to employ a regional strategy: “If it doesn’t exist, create it. And then be against it.”

As fertile as the West may seem for Democrats, some in the party remain skeptical that it matters much. “The problem with the Democrats is that they can’t count,” Dave (Mudcat) Saunders, a Democratic campaign strategist, told me. Saunders’s book, “Foxes in the Henhouse,” argues that the party would be wrong to focus on the West and ignore the South. He notes that 30 percent of the country’s electoral votes come from the South, and that by 2025 that percentage will be 40. “Georgia and Florida have as many votes as all the West put together,” Saunders points out.

Montana Republicans don’t concede that the 2004 results show a Democratic trend in Montana — much less the rest of the West. Roy Brown, the leader of the Republican caucus in the statehouse, says that the Democrats’ pickup of seats in the Legislature was not due to a sea change in the electorate but a result of gerrymandering perpetrated by a Montana Supreme Court that is "in bed with the Democrats." Although Montana does not require voters to identify party affiliation, Brown estimates that 40 percent are Republicans, 35 percent are Democrats and 25 percent are independents. He concedes that in recent years the independents have been leaning toward the Democrats, but he says that's not a consequence of a true shift in voter attitudes but a result of a "filter-down" effect from unpopular Republican candidates at the top of the ticket. (Schweitzer's Republican predecessor famously declared herself a "lap dog of industry.") In any event, the Democrats' success in 2004 was not an aberration; the party had been steadily gaining seats in the state chambers for the previous three elections.

Schweitzer agrees that Democrats should be careful about trying to extrapolate Montana's political trends to other states. "Montana ought not serve as a metaphor for the entire West," he told me. Indeed, Montana is the West's answer to New Hampshire: independent, contrary and unpredictable. Its demographic trends do not match that of the Southwest. The state's population is growing, but not skyrocketing the way it is in Arizona and Nevada, and with no city larger than 100,000 residents, Montana essentially does not have suburbs or exurbs like those spreading around Phoenix, Las Vegas and Denver. Hispanics account for less than 3 percent of the population; Montana's most sizable ethnic minority is Native American, at 6 percent of the population. And the state's voters have always been less conservative than their neighbors in Idaho, Utah and Wyoming. While it's true that Montanans voted for a Democratic president only twice in the past 50 years, they've often elected Democrats to the House and Senate. In fact, Max Baucus's Senate seat has been held by a Democrat since 1913. The meaning of the 2004 race is further complicated by the fact that Schweitzer chose a Republican — albeit a moderate of the Jim Jeffords variety — as his running mate.

Within the state, politics have historically been split between east and west. Western Montana, with two college towns, Missoula and Bozeman; the unionized mining town Butte; and the capital, Helena, tends to vote more like the liberal Pacific Northwest. The east is more like the Great Plains, with vast ranches, farms, strip mines and oil fields. When the state had two Congressional districts (they were folded into one in 1993), the western one was consistently held by a Democrat and the eastern one by a Republican. According to David Sirota, who was a strategist for Schweitzer in both 2000 and 2004 and who now lives in Helena, the swing vote in the state is in and around Billings, the state's largest city. ("It is Yellowstone County that is Montana's own Ohio," he says, "and Billings the state's Columbus.") But unlike the rest of the nation, where swing voters are generally characterized as socially conservative suburbanites, Sirota says that many Montana swing voters are rural and libertarian.

Marc Racicot, who served two terms as Montana's governor before he went on to be chairman of the Republican National Committee and President Bush's 2004 campaign committee, says his fellow Montanans are unpredictable voters. "You simply can't classify them," he told me, pointing out that in 2004 they simultaneously voted to ban gay marriage and to legalize medical marijuana. "They are conservative in some ways, but ruggedly independent and populist in others. Party affiliation isn't necessarily the dominant characteristic they consider." Montanans are more mistrustful of large institutions like government and corporations than their counterparts on the coasts, while less religious than the South. Fifty-three percent of Montanans say they are pro-abortion rights. In foreign policy they can be rather isolationist: a poll in September showed that Montanans break with the national trend and rank the economy as more important than national security or the Iraq war. They take a libertarian approach to homeland security that is rarely heard nationally; Jon Tester, in a recent debate, said, "With things like the Patriot Act, we'd damn well better keep our guns." And, contrary to the myth that Westerners are opposed to all environmental regulation, they tend to be conservationists. About 60 percent of Montanans favored the Roadless Area Conservation Rule, which protected land from logging; it was signed by Bill Clinton and overturned by George W. Bush. Bush's recent plan to auction off public lands was so unpopular in Montana that even Conrad Burns opposed it.

Montana's populist streak dates back more than a century to the mining labor movement, and it surfaced again in 1992, when Ross Perot captured more than a quarter of the vote, allowing Clinton to win the state. As the Republicans honed their populist message in the 1990's, their fortunes improved in Montana. Now, some say, the tide is turning. "The appeal of populism never changed," Sirota says. "The parties changed. The Republicans were the populists. Now the Democrats have learned that they can be populists, too."

It was a sunny day in June, and Brian Schweitzer and Max Baucus were flanked by Cessnas and helicopters, rallying with Jon Tester. Political rallies in other states might take place in hotel ballrooms; here in Montana everyone was gathered in an aircraft hangar outside Missoula. The place smelled like jet fuel. Corralling the top-ticket Montana Democrats in one place can resemble a "Bonanza" cast reunion, albeit with two Hosses and no Little Joe. Tester is a third-generation wheat farmer, president of the State Senate and a lumbering tank of a guy with a big gut and a flattop haircut. You want prairie authenticity? Have Tester show you his hand with just a thumb and a pinkie; the other three fingers were chopped off in a meat grinder when he was a boy. Tester, a progressive type, ran in the primary against a better-financed centrist, a career politician supported by the Democratic Leadership Council, and as soon as he won, Schweitzer leapt in to claim him as a brother. Onstage at the airport, Schweitzer played the down-home card. "Jon's grandparents homesteaded just 20 miles from my grandparents," he hollered, to a roar of approval from the hangar. "He and I were born in the same tiny hospital, up in Havre!"

Other than the fact that they grew up on farms, it's not immediately clear what unites Schweitzer and Tester, Ritter and the Salazars. With his outspoken criticism of the war in Iraq — "I was very public before we went in that it was a bad idea, and history has borne that out," he told me — Schweitzer has become a hero to progressives, while Ken Salazar has infuriated liberals with his support of Alberto Gonzalez's nomination for attorney general and his endorsement of Joe Lieberman's independent re-election bid. Governor Richardson of New Mexico suggests that such differences are evidence that the movement has no overarching strategy. "It's happening from the bottom up," he told me. "This is a natural evolution. It's no grand design." Or maybe it's that the region's Democrats simply don't have many core beliefs in common. Schweitzer remains an iconoclast; he says he supported

John McCain's presidential bid in 2000, though he has since soured on McCain because of the way he has courted the religious right, and he says he is now intrigued by the possibility of a presidential run by

Mitt Romney, the Republican governor of Massachusetts, in 2008. "If he gets the nomination, I might support him," Schweitzer told me.

Much of Schweitzer's attraction to voters lies in the fact that he doesn't seem like a politician. "I'm just a rancher who ended up governor of Montana," he likes to say. But Schweitzer is not a politician only in the sense that the young Cassius Clay was not a boxer; by the time his opponent realized he'd been hit, he was already on the mat. And since it's accepted in the West that politicians are generally not to be trusted, Schweitzer's greatest talent may be his endless insistence that he's not one, all the while winning your vote and changing your opinion to agree with his. Which is, of course, what a politician does. His success is not the happy accident of a novice or a rube or a cowpoke who happened to ride his donkey into the halls of power — but rather the work of an expert, a virtuoso or, perhaps, a natural.

Besides getting elected and getting on television, what has Schweitzer actually accomplished? Much of the attention he has received came from positions he has taken on national issues: writing an Op-Ed for The Times about the miracle of coal-to-gas liquefaction, or requesting that President Bush return the Montana National Guardsmen from Iraq to fight summer forest fires. His agenda for his first legislative session was hardly radical: it included an increase in education financing, setting a goal to produce more wind power and a tax-reform bill that favored small business over big by eliminating the tax on business equipment valued at less than $20,000, while withdrawing a pending cut on more expensive equipment. He introduced an ultimately unsuccessful plan to prevent government officials from moving directly into lobbying jobs. Still, Schweitzer bristles at the suggestion that he was not sufficiently tested by his first session. "I had 90 days to pass my agenda," he told me. "It was my first day on the job, and I was working with lobbyists and legislators who'd been there for years. We had a State Assembly that was deadlocked. But I pushed through the most progressive legislative agenda in the country. It was not easy. I took on the lobbyists. I wrestled them to the ground, and now I'm kicking them in the ribs."

Despite the boots and bluster, at his core Brian Schweitzer is something of a policy wonk and a science whiz. He says he sleeps no more than five hours a night, and he is at his computer well before dawn, consuming a host of newspapers and a string of political blogs. His true passion is energy independence. On his desk is a contraption of tubes and coils that, as he enthusiastically explains, convert sunlight into hydrogen. In addition to his horsemanship and riflery, Schweitzer likes to tinker with gadgets, and he holds degrees in both soil science and agronomy. He will preach to anyone who will listen about the Fischer-Tropsch process of coal liquefaction, or about his recent switch from a Tahoe S.U.V. to a biodiesel Volkswagen Jetta.

Schweitzer fancies that he will solve the energy crisis the Montana way, which is to say, with ethanol and syn-fuels and wind power, all readily available in a state that has more grain, coal and wind than it does people. He says he believes that he is setting an example for the rest of the world, and that tends to infuse even the most mundane details of his legislative work with a certain fervor.

When I was visiting with Schweitzer one day during the legislative session, an aide rushed into his office with news that a group of Democratic state representatives from the Great Falls area were threatening to withdraw their support from the governor's ethanol bill. Schweitzer was leaning back in his chair, beneath an oil painting of a Native American woman playing a flute, beside a window opening onto a view of snow-covered mountains. If Schweitzer is, as his critics contend, mostly a showman, he has chosen the perfect stage. Helena's domed State Capitol is a transcendent gallery of marble columns and stained-glass atria, a temple so sincere in its exultation of frontier democracy that, for the cynical, it may resemble a Frank Capra movie version of government more than it resembles the real thing. Citizens wander freely in the corridors of power and, from the Senate gallery, can observe their lawmakers beneath frescoes of Lewis and Clark meeting Sacagawea, and of General Custer about to take a dagger to the gut at Little Bighorn.

The Great Falls representatives refused to come meet Schweitzer in the governor's office — located about 800 steps from their chamber — because they were upset that the governor canceled a meeting with them earlier that day. "That's it," Schweitzer said, leaping up. "I'm taking 'em to the woodshed." In an instant he was stomping down the corridor to the rotunda, his dog at his heels, and charging up the staircase to the House chamber. The governor corralled the Great Falls representatives in a meeting room and listened to their grievances. He leaned forward intently, his head bobbing almost imperceptibly, his eyes wide open and blinking in a strict cadence, receiving and processing data as if it were an electrical current. He clutched the edge of the table, and I suspected that if he let go, the rotors spinning in his skull would have broken the pull of gravity and sent him spiraling into orbit.

Sufficiently charged, the governor whirred into action. His monologue combined pep talk and sales pitch, threats and promises, science lecture and economic briefing. He spoke at length on the difference between malt barley and high-protein wheat, and on the profit margin of ethanol refineries, pounding his finger on the tabletop for emphasis. He went on uninterrupted for seven minutes, and when the fusillade was over, one of the representatives voiced a small objection from an industry lobbyist that Montana wheat would make for low-grade ethanol.

"Now that," said the governor, slapping the table in triumph, almost evangelically, as if the Republic itself depended on this vote, "that sounds like somebody who didn't take a single class in agronomy!"

Later that day, everyone at the meeting voted yes on ethanol, and in the evenly split House, the bill passed 52-48.

Hungry and emboldened, Democrats are already looking past 2006. A few stalwart Western Republicans who have been in the Senate since the Nixon years are rumored to be contemplating retirement in 2008. Pete Domenici of New Mexico will be 76, and

Ted Stevens of Alaska will be 84. In Colorado, Democrats are so eager to oust Senator Wayne Allard that Representative Mark Udall has declared his candidacy a full three years before the election. Udall comes from the political dynasty that has spawned an Arizona Supreme Court justice and a handful of Democratic congressmen, and as a world-class mountaineer who says he is the only member of Congress to have made an attempt on Mount Everest, he fits the bill of an iconic Westerner.

As Democrats look to Montana to try to figure out how to replicate Governor Schweitzer's success, they can't help noticing one recent poll number: in August, 66 percent of Montana Republicans said they approved of Schweitzer, the same portion who said they approved of Conrad Burns, their own party's incumbent senator. It may be that this sort of popularity comes only to a larger-than-life personality like Schweitzer.

Democrats will be wise not to try to replicate Schweitzer himself. When non-Schweitzers try to act like Schweitzer, it usually doesn't work. In his book, Schaller recalls "campaign images of Al Gore wearing cowboy boots with his belt-clipped Blackberry, or a barn-jacket-clad John Kerry buying a goose-hunting license." Schaller goes on to write that these gestures force "liberals to avert their eyes in horror, while conservatives look on from afar with a mixture of disdain and disbelief."

As for Schweitzer's own future plans, he dismisses questions about further political ambitions with one of his trademark similes — something about having spent more days in a saddle than having been governor. Nonetheless, the scope of his battle is larger than Montana. In addition to campaigning for Jon Tester in Montana and Bill Ritter in Colorado, he also stumped recently at a fund-raiser in Jackson Hole, Wyo., for a singularly non-Western candidate: Eliot Spitzer of New York.

Debate In Texas Race Focuses On Border, Crime And Cigars (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

HOUSTON, Oct. 7 — Competing with the Friday night lights of a big Texas football weekend, Gov. Rick Perry and three challengers faced off in a Dallas television studio for their only debate in the free-for-all that is the governor's race.

But if the long-awaited one-hour showdown had its moments — Kinky Friedman, the comic songster and independent, pledged allegiance to his cigar; former Representative Chris Bell, the Democrat, remembered the Alamo; and Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn, a Republican running as an independent, forgot the name of the president-elect of Mexico — it hardly resolved the uncertainties, some political experts said.

With Mr. Perry, a Republican, leading in the polls a month before Election Day and positioned to become the longest-serving governor of Texas despite being opposed by about two out of three voters, the high-profile race in President Bush's home state is still fluid.

"There was no standout winner," said Harvey Kronberg, who publishes The Quorum Report, an online Texas political journal. In the night's version of "Survivor," he said, "we still have to see who gets thrown off the island."

Yet it was Mr. Perry's debate to lose, and he did not, said Cal Jillson, a professor of political science at Southern Methodist University who monitored the debate for its sponsor, the Belo Corporation, which owns WFAA-TV and The Dallas Morning News. "If he had fallen off the stage or fainted dead away, or fumbled badly, but he didn't do that," Dr. Jillson said.

Answering questions from reporters, viewers and each other with no studio audience, Mr. Friedman and Mr. Bell accused Mr. Perry of picking a date for the event to minimize attention and of ducking additional debates. Mr. Friedman laid it to politics: " 'Poly' means 'more than one,' and 'ticks' are blood-sucking parasites," he said.

Mr. Perry did not respond directly but recently told Texas Monthly that a crowded debate would not yield much substance.

The four candidates — a fifth, James Werner, a Libertarian, was excluded by Belo — squabbled over immigration and crime. Mr. Perry defended his dispatch of National Guard troops to secure the border against illegal crossers but faulted the federal government's actions as inadequate and said he would seek $100 million from the legislature for more enforcement.

Ms. Strayhorn, who goes by the moniker of Grandma, said, "I want the Texas Rangers in charge."

Mr. Friedman, in his black cowboy garb and waving his ever-present unlit cigar, called for taxpayer ID cards for immigrant workers and $25,000 fines for employing illegal immigrants.

Mr. Bell said he would also crack down on employers but asked, "Does anyone believe we could deport 12 million people if we couldn't even evacuate New Orleans?"

Mr. Perry said he would support the death penalty for repeat sexual predators. Ms. Strayhorn said she favored mandatory life terms.

Mr. Friedman, laying a 20 percent upsurge in crime in Houston to evacuees from Hurricane Katrina, called for spending $100 million on more police officers. But he was condemned by the others for remarks that some called racially offensive and that he defended as parody.

"Words matter," Mr. Perry chided.

Mr. Friedman was unrepentant. "Sure, everyone's ganging up on me," he said. "Tackle the guy carrying the ball."

He was also asked if, as governor, "will you have a cigar in your mouth so children will see you?"

Mr. Friedman said, "Yeah, I'll definitely smoke cigars."

Mr. Perry was assailed over a new business tax to remedy a school-financing crisis and lower property levies, and for a planned toll road complex that Ms. Strayhorn called "the Trans-Texas Catastrophe."

Mr. Bell accused Ms. Strayhorn as comptroller of giving half a billion dollars in tax breaks to clients of contributors. She denied it, vowing to install a "government in sunshine."

In a barrage of tricky questions, Mr. Perry was asked if he knew the going rate for a 30-year mortgage. He said 5.9 percent — it was actually 6.3 percent.

Ms. Strayhorn blanked on the name of the new president of Mexico (Felipe Calderón). “He won by a narrow margin,” she ventured.

But Mr. Bell scored on a perilous question: when was the battle of the Alamo? (1836)

In his summation, Mr. Perry turned on Mr. Bell, saying Democrats were weak on national security, suggesting that the governor may now see the former congressman as his prime threat.

Spinmeisters from various camps immediately unleashed a flurry of e-mail messages dissecting the rivals’ answers. As to who won, Ms. Strayhorn’s campaign said, “Texans won this debate,” but could not resist adding “and learned the truth about Gov. Perry’s false tax cut.” The Perry campaign countered with, “Strayhorn can’t be trusted to keep her ethics pledges.”

Beyond who won was another question: who watched? Fall Friday nights in Texas are famously devoted to the high school gridiron, and football fans are in a special froth over Saturday’s annual Red River Rivalry between the University of Texas and University of Oklahoma in the Cotton Bowl in Dallas.

Still, Amy Powell, 41, a nutritionist, joined Perry supporters to see the debate at County Line Bar-B-Q in north Houston. She left less than enlightened. “I saw a lot of talking,” she said, “typical political stuff.”

California Candidates Spar Over Economy (AP)

By The Associated Press

The Associated Press, October 8, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides sparred over the direction of the state's economy Saturday in their only debate planned for the gubernatorial campaign.

In a series of sharp exchanges, Schwarzenegger and Angelides differed over higher education fees, taxes and the state of the middle class.

Angelides said fees at the California State University and University of California systems have risen by thousands of dollars under Schwarzenegger, a Republican. Schwarzenegger noted that college fees rose dramatically under his predecessor, former Democratic Gov. Gray Davis, and that he has capped them this year.

He also attacked Angelides as wanting to raise billions in taxes if he is elected Nov. 7.

"I can tell by the joy I see in your eyes that you love to raise taxes," the governor said to Angelides. "Why don't you just say right now, 'I love increasing your taxes.'"

Angelides said his plan was to raise taxes on the wealthy and close corporate tax loopholes, in part to help California balance its budget and fully fund education.

"Who can you trust to do the right thing by middle-class families in this state?" Angelides said.

Angelides contrasted the California in which he grew up with the one he sees now, where middle-class families struggle to pay health care, college and other costs. He vowed to provide "a different vision" from Schwarzenegger and "put the government back on the side of working people."

The governor noted the difference between California's economic situation today and three years ago, when Davis was ousted amid a record budget deficit.

Schwarzenegger said he has worked to reduce the deficit, strengthen the state's credit rating, improve the business climate and "make us shine again."

The debate, coming on the third anniversary of the historic recall election that swept Schwarzenegger into office, provided the campaign's first direct exchange between Schwarzenegger and Angelides, allowing a format in which the candidates could question each other. Those exchanges provided periodic fireworks.

After Angelides spoke on array of issues -- against the Iraq war, accusing Schwarzenegger of failing to secure sufficient homeland security funding, criticizing the governor for plans to overhaul state pensions -- Schwarzenegger shot back with a family reference.

"I feel a little bit like I'm having dinner with Uncle Teddy at Thanksgiving," the governor quipped, referring to Sen. Ted Kennedy, the uncle of his wife, Maria Shriver.

"He's a great man," Angelides shot back. "If my grandmother could hear me being compared to a Kennedy...."

The candidates did not differ sharply on immigration, with both calling for some kind of path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who already are in the United States.

Angelides rejected the idea of a fence along the border, instead saying he would lobby the Bush administration to provide more border guards. Schwarzenegger said the country needed a way for companies to "legally hire people from outside the United States."

The state treasurer has been the underdog since emerging from a bruising Democratic primary fight against state Controller Steve Westly. The race drained his campaign funds.

He has battled ever since to redefine himself, in part by trying to fashion himself as a champion of the middle class.

Schwarzenegger spent much of September highlighting bipartisan agreements with bill signings throughout the state. He has also shown a huge fundraising advantage.

Recent polls have given Schwarzenegger leads of 10 and 17 percentage points.

The debate at Sacramento State University was sponsored by the California Broadcasters Association.

Taxes Take Center Stage In Gov. Debate (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Schwarzenegger depicts his foe as a big spender. Angelides compares his rival to Bush, Hastert.

SACRAMENTO — Trailing badly in polls, Democrat Phil Angelides on Saturday used the first and only debate of the governor's race to question Arnold Schwarzenegger's integrity and try to yoke him to President Bush and embattled Republicans in Congress.

A jocular Schwarzenegger parried with one-liners and invoked major bipartisan agreements with state lawmakers, portraying Angelides as a big-spending liberal who was eager to hike taxes on those who could least afford it.

The issue of taxes, the governor's preferred ground, dominated the debate. Schwarzenegger mocked state Treasurer Angelides for proposing tax cuts for middle-income families, saying the idea was inconsistent with his support for a $4-billion car-tax hike under former Gov. Gray Davis. Schwarzenegger reeled off billions of dollars in other tax increases that Angelides has supported over the years, including a tractor levy that would have hit "the poor farmers."

"You have been so far for every single tax increase since you have been in public office," Schwarzenegger told Angelides.

At one point, smiling across the stage at his rival, the governor taunted: "I can tell by the joy you see in your eyes when you talk about taxes, you just love to increase taxes…. Look out there right now and just say, 'I love increasing your taxes.' "

Angelides told Schwarzenegger he would not allow him to deceive viewers by repeating "what you've done in those $35 million of TV ads attacking me." Then he invoked a trio of Republican leaders, past and present.

"The fact is, when you speak like this you sound just like Newt Gingrich," Angelides said. "You sound like Speaker Hastert. You sound like George Bush attacking me on taxes."

While Angelides repeatedly linked Schwarzenegger with Bush and other prominent Republicans, the governor sought to lump his Democratic opponent with Davis, who was defeated in the 2003 recall exactly three years ago Saturday. The result was perhaps the liveliest exchange of the evening.

"During the most incredible decline of our economy, just a few years ago, you were part of that," Schwarzenegger said.

"Well, you know, your policies are the Bush policies, and I prefer [former President] Clinton to Bush any day," Angelides shot back.

"No, no, don't talk about Bush, because if you want to do that, go to Iowa," Schwarzenegger said, alluding to the site of the first presidential nominating contest.

"You went to Ohio, governor; I didn't," Angelides said, referring to Schwarzenegger's appearance alongside Bush late in the 2004 campaign. "You stood with President Bush and you helped him get reelected. And we didn't even get a T-shirt!"

The two then talked past each other for several seconds, the governor suggesting that Angelides was ready "to promise the people everything, and then increase the taxes."

"No, I've been clear, governor," Angelides retorted, "I'm going to close those corporate tax loopholes."

"Oh, sure. Of course," Schwarzenegger said, laughing sarcastically. "Very good. Exactly, yeah."

At various times Angelides sought to turn the tax issue on his opponent, reminding viewers that college and university fees had risen under Schwarzenegger. The governor, in turn, recalled student protests against similar moves by Davis.

"They marched in Sacramento, right by your office, treasurer," Schwarzenegger said, squinting his eyes at his opponent. "You were inside that office, and you looked out, and you didn't join them protesting…. Where were you?"

Angelides has proposed raising taxes by $5 billion a year for corporations and Californians who make more than $250,000 a year. In August, he offset that proposal with a plan for $1.4 billion in tax cuts, mainly for middle-income Californians and small businesses.

But over the years, Angelides has called for a variety of other tax increases that he no longer supports, and Schwarzenegger puts the total cost of them at more than $18 billion a year.

The joint appearance at Sacramento State University offered a crucial opportunity for Angelides to improve his standing in a contest that so far has tilted heavily in the Republican governor's favor. But with no moment of high drama or surprising revelations, the 55-minute session appeared unlikely to change the central dynamics of the race, now in its final weeks.

The two candidates, wearing similar dark suits, sat facing each other at separate tables, with the moderator, Stan Statham of the California Broadcasters Assn., seated between them.

Showing what he learned in Hollywood, the governor was careful to look directly into the camera as he spoke. Angelides spent much of his time addressing the studio audience, presenting a less flattering profile for the majority of those watching at home on television.

The debate, sponsored by the broadcasters association, was aired live on radio and television stations statewide. But the timing — a Saturday night, opposite major league baseball playoffs and college football — limited the size of the audience.

Angelides had hoped to debate Schwarzenegger as many as 10 times, but the governor had nothing to gain by offering his challenger such high-profile exposure on television and declined all other offers. As a result, the debate's terms were essentially the governor's. Statham, a former Republican assemblyman, is a registered lobbyist for the broadcasters.

Schwarzenegger, as the front-runner, spent much of the evening avoiding confrontation, allowing many of Angelides' accusations to go unanswered and breaking the tension with several apparently well-rehearsed quips.

In keeping with his political move to the middle, Schwarzenegger also stressed the bipartisan approach he has taken this year to working with the Democrats, who control the Legislature, on issues such as the infrastructure bonds on the November ballot.

Asked which decision in public office he most regrets, Schwarzenegger cited last year's disastrous special election, in which voters overwhelming rejected his four initiatives after he went over the heads of lawmakers.

"I pushed too fast," he said, again sounding the note of contrition he struck in the days after the debacle. "I did not bring all the legislators on board. I did not bring people together enough.

"The people sent a message loud and clear," he added. "And that message was, 'Don't come to us for every little thing. Go to the legislators. You guys work it out.' And that's exactly what we've done since then."

Angelides responded that it was not a good idea "to attack working men and women" and cut school money, as he characterized Schwarzenegger's past efforts. "The one thing I want to say tonight is: Who can you trust next year to do the right thing? For three years, Arnold Schwarzenegger was very consistent. Only in the last 60 days, as he sought to save his own job, has he tried to move to the middle, so to speak."

At another point, Angelides returned to that theme, saying the election "comes back to who can you really trust?"

Given one chance to question each other directly, Schwarzenegger opted for a gentle approach, asking Angelides about the funniest moment he had experienced during the campaign.

"Every day is just a hoot — I can't tell you how much fun," Angelides joked. More seriously, Angelides expressed joy at the time he has spent with his family.

He then hit back hard, asking Schwarzenegger how he could justify a proposal — eventually withdrawn — that could have endangered the benefits of police widows and orphans.

The governor responded with his sharpest rejoinder of the evening: "I did not try to take anything away from any police officer or firefighter…. I will never take away the pension, or the disability or the death benefit from anyone, the firefighters, the police officers or anyone else as far as that goes. So you can stop that hype right there."

But more often, when things grew tense, Schwarzenegger tried to lighten the mood with a smile and clever aside.

After Angelides assailed his record on protecting the state from terrorism and criticized his treatment of the state's law enforcement officers, the governor drew a big laugh from the studio crowd — and a smile from Angelides — by suggesting, "I feel a little like I'm having Thanksgiving dinner with Uncle Teddy."

"Thank you so much," Angelides replied, delighted to be compared to U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the uncle of Schwarzenegger's wife, Maria Shriver.

O'Malley's Reach Sends Ehrlich To D.C. Suburbs (WP)

By John Wagner And Matthew Mosk, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

The road map that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. hopes will guide him to reelection has sent the Republican to an unlikely place in search of votes: the heavily Democratic Washington suburbs.

A month before the Nov. 7 election, Ehrlich has stepped up his efforts in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, a tacit recognition that the strategy he rode to victory in 2002 cannot be fully replicated this year against Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D).

Four years ago, in edging Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend to become the state's first Republican governor in a generation, Ehrlich piled up unprecedented vote totals in the suburban counties that ring Baltimore. That region is home to significant numbers of registered Republicans as well as blue-collar Democrats who were willing to give an affable local congressman a shot at the governor's mansion.

With O'Malley, however, Ehrlich faces an opponent whose popularity extends beyond the borders of his own heavily Democratic city into parts of the surrounding suburbs. So the governor has turned toward Washington to help make up the difference.

In the past week, Ehrlich has conducted a half-dozen interviews with news outlets in the Washington market, attended several fundraisers and picked up the Montgomery County Chamber of Commerce's backing.

"Last time, I was a complete stranger" to the D.C. suburbs, Ehrlich said in an interview. "We tried, but we got beaten there. Badly. This time, it's a different story. . . . This time we're looking for a major uptick in support."

In 2002, Ehrlich won statewide by 66,170 votes in a race in which 1.7 million ballots were cast. To win reelection, he is seeking to offset gains the Democratic nominee could make in the Baltimore suburbs by improving his performance elsewhere. The voter-rich Washington suburbs provide the most enticing target, despite their decidedly Democratic tilt.

"It's really a matter of numbers," said John Willis, a former Maryland secretary of state. "If my opponent is eating into the margin in my base, I've got to go eat into the margin in his base."

Last week, O'Malley and his top aides expressed confidence that the mayor, who grew up in Montgomery, was not losing ground to Ehrlich in the Washington area. To the contrary, as he becomes better known in the region, his support among Democrats is firming up, O'Malley said.

"We are picking up strength all over the state, most notably in the last few weeks in the Washington suburbs," he said. "We're going to continue to gain strength there."

Tomorrow, Democrats will hold a unity rally in Prince George's, the state's most heavily Democratic jurisdiction, to build interest in O'Malley and other candidates on the ballot.

When he ran for governor in 2002, Ehrlich said, he arrived in the Washington suburbs as a largely unknown Republican congressman from Baltimore County. Since then, he said, he has worked hard to build trust and political support.

"I think we'll see a substantial increase from Prince George's as a function of our performance and our record," Ehrlich said. "It's very different than four years ago."

Ehrlich said his support for economic expansion projects -- including National Harbor, the $2 billion waterfront development -- and his efforts to expand minority business opportunities have helped him with voters in Prince George's. He also cited efforts to forge a relationship with County Executive Jack B. Johnson, a Democrat. The two played golf together over the summer to discuss the possibility of attracting the national NAACP headquarters to the county.

State Sen. Ulysses Currie (D-Prince George's), whom Ehrlich identified as someone who has warmed to him, said he has noticed the governor's attempts at courtship. "I think he has tried," Currie said. "But I don't think at the end of the day it's going to necessarily help him."

Currie said he believes that Prince George's residents are not going to be willing to cross party lines in a year when, nationally, Republicans are on the ropes.

"With what's going on at the national level now, I don't see him doing significantly better than what he did in 2002," Currie said. "People know he's a Republican."

Four years ago, Ehrlich attracted more votes than the GOP's 1998 gubernatorial nominee, Ellen R. Sauerbrey, in every Maryland jurisdiction save one: Prince George's. Despite his historic selection of a black running mate from the county, Michael S. Steele, Ehrlich drew 6,178 fewer votes there than Sauerbrey did in 1998.

Townsend wound up outpolling him in Prince George's nearly 77 percent to 23 percent.

O'Malley aides point out the significant growth in the county's Democratic voter base since 2002. The number of Democrats has increased by nearly 50,000 in Prince George's since Ehrlich's election; the Republican side has gained 200.

If he is not able to persuade Prince George's residents to vote for him, Ehrlich may be able to sour them enough on O'Malley that they stay home. That, Democrats say, is the aim of a radio ad Ehrlich has been airing in the county that accuses the Baltimore police department of unlawfully arresting thousands of African Americans a year.

The ad is narrated by William H. Murphy, a prominent black criminal defense lawyer in Baltimore and a longtime friend of Ehrlich's.

"He sanctions and directs the arrests of thousands of Baltimore City people, predominantly black, without ever charging them with a crime," Murphy says in the ad, referring to a policy of stepped-up enforcement of "quality of life" offenses, such as loitering, under O'Malley.

Police say the strategy helps break up drug corners and deter serious crimes. But it has generated some outspoken critics, including members of Baltimore's legislative delegation.

"He's trying to play the politics of division and fear," O'Malley said when asked about Ehrlich's ads last week.

In Montgomery, Ehrlich won 38.3 percent of the vote in 2002 -- not significantly better than other recent GOP nominees for governor. He predicted improvement this year. "I'm not going to say it's a sea change, but it's significantly different."

Ehrlich said Montgomery's Jewish community will be part of that difference. In the 2002 election, Ehrlich said, he was successful in forging ties with Baltimore's Jewish community. As governor, he has reached out to Montgomery's large Jewish population, in part by helping alter homeland security regulations to enable Jewish schools and facilities to get federal grants for security upgrades.

State Del. Luiz R.S. Simmons (D-Montgomery), who used to be a Republican, called the governor's suggestion that he can win broad support in the Jewish community "fanciful."

"He would be exaggerating his connection with the Jewish community to believe that he is going to somehow roll up large numbers," said Simmons, who is Jewish. "There's no basis for that."

Simmons said that if Jewish voters shy away from Ehrlich, it will be because of his approach to issues Jewish voters consider important: higher-education funding and stem cell research.

"If you look at the tuition rises at the University of Maryland, this is not something that's going to sit well," Simmons said. "Not only that, but Jewish voters are disproportionately committed to support for stem cell research, and Ehrlich has waffled on the issue."

While Ehrlich is hoping to make inroads into the Washington suburbs, O'Malley aides point to polls suggesting that he is making strides in Ehrlich strongholds.

Their confidence is born of O'Malley's popularity in the Baltimore region, which has been bolstered by his constant presence on the local news the past seven years. The expansive Baltimore media market reaches more than half the state. Ehrlich has sought to counter O'Malley there with a series of television ads highlighting the low performance of Baltimore's schools and its continuing struggles with crime.

O'Malley aides are banking on the ads having limited impact, given how much people in the region know about the mayor and governor.

"It's not possible to know two candidates in a region better than people know Ehrlich and O'Malley," said O'Malley spokesman Steve Kearney.

Pay For Good Behavior? (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

Ten years ago, when he signed the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, thus "ending welfare as we know it," President Bill Clinton blunted a debate over poverty that had been increasingly harmful to the Democratic Party. In fact, welfare reform proved so successful at both shrinking caseloads and reducing poverty levels that the issue lost its urgency. And for the last five years, of course, American politics has been focused on very different threats than the threat of destitution.

About 37 million Americans continue to live below the poverty line. No one living in a big city can be blind to the plight of the poor. In his second inaugural speech, in 2005, New York's mayor, Michael Bloomberg, vowed to focus on poverty reduction, and last month he announced the findings of his blue-ribbon Commission for Economic Opportunity. The panel — not surprisingly, perhaps, given its carefully chosen name — offered a post-ideological blueprint likely to require relatively modest increases in spending by the city as well as the federal and state governments. The report described many ways the city could more effectively spend existing funds, including apprenticeships and training for the working poor and school-based programs for students at risk of dropping out.

Mayor Bloomberg embraced many of the proposals and offered several more daring ones of his own. He proposed that New York become the first city in the country to offer a child-care tax credit, limited to low-income families with children under age 3. And more controversially, he vowed to raise $24 million in private donations to finance "conditional cash transfers" to give poor New Yorkers an incentive "to stay in school, stay at work and stay on track to rise out of poverty." A mayoral aide later explained that this behaviorist approach to fighting poverty has become popular in the developing world and has had a "phenomenal" effect on school attendance in Mexico. (The Bloomberg administration has not stipulated how much it will pay or which behaviors it will reward.)

The mayor's own plan drew a good deal more attention than the commission report did, perhaps because it seemed to be at odds with the report's slightly-left-of-center ethos. Heather Mac Donald, a fellow at the conservative Manhattan Institute for Policy Research, welcomed Bloomberg's implicit acceptance of the view that "it is the underclass poor who need to change more than society or capitalism." At the same time, she argued that he had undermined the case for self-reliance by establishing "an expectation among the underclass that they have a right to cash for simply conforming to the norms of civil society." Bloomberg responded by noting that if you could use a tax credit to "encourage people to do certain types of economic activity," you could use cash just as well.

The mayor's idea has a conservative as well a third-world pedigree: Newt Gingrich once proposed paying children for good grades. Market-oriented conservatives proceed from the assumption that people make rational calculations of self-interest; theorists like Charles Murray and Lawrence Mead long argued that welfare payments encouraged recipients to stay on welfare rather than to work. Welfare reform eliminated that perverse incentive. Why, then, not offer affirmative incentives to engage in healthy behavior? Is there some reason you learn a lesson better from a stick than from a carrot? Or does it just offend our sense of justice to pay people to do what others do for nothing?

The liberal objection to paying for good behavior is that it assumes that behavior lies at the root of poverty. But this argument has steadily lost ground over the last generation, and the goal of policy is now both to encourage good behavior and to connect good behavior with good opportunities.

Moral considerations nothwithstanding, you could argue that Bloomberg's plan takes far too benign a view of the problem of self-destructive habits. "The stress of poverty," the mayor said in announcing the program, "often causes people to make decisions," by which he meant poor decisions. But many scholars would say that the problem runs much deeper, to the cumulative effect of "underclass culture." Lollipops for good behavior will not break those shackles.

The problem is, What will? A conscientious program of lollipop deprivation? Lectures about the dreadful consequences of cutting school or not making child-support payments? Heather Mac Donald would have Bloomberg stop bribing the poor and instead "call on private industry and ad councils to start a massive educational campaign about marriage." But why would we imagine that mere rhetoric could dislodge the deeply entrenched habits that lead to having children out of wedlock? It's true that poor people who adopt "middle-class values" generally succeed, but you can no more change their behavior by telling them so than you can produce democracy in the Middle East merely by preaching its virtues. The transformation of a culture is slow, arduous work, requiring material support as well as moral and intellectual renewal.

The whole thing is reminiscent of a famous maxim coined by Daniel Patrick Moynihan: "The central conservative truth is that it is culture, not politics, that determines the success of a society. The central liberal truth is that politics can change a culture and save it from itself." The central Bloombergian truth may be that in the absence of serious political energy, a modest appeal to self-interest will have to do.

Japan Warns North Korea On Nuclear Tests (AP)

By Hans Greimel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Tensions mounted over North Korea's threat to test its first atomic bomb, with shots ringing out Saturday along the border with South Korea and Japan warning of harsh sanctions if Pyongyang goes nuclear.

With a possible test expected as early as Sunday, the U.N. Security Council issued a stern statement Friday urging the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions and warning of unspecified consequences if the isolated communist regime does not comply.

Jittery nations have warned a test would unravel regional security and possibly trigger an arms race.

A midday incursion Saturday by North Korean troops into the southern side of the no-man's-land separating North and South Korea only stoked the unease.

South Korean soldiers rattled off 40 warning shots at the five communist troops who crossed the center line of the Demilitarized Zone.

It was unclear whether the North Korean advance was intended as a provocation, or was an attempt to go fishing at a nearby stream, an official at South Korea's Joint Chiefs of Staff said on condition of anonymity, citing official policy. No one was hurt, and the North Koreans retreated.

While such border skirmishes are not unheard of, they are relatively rare. Saturday's incursion was only the second this year, the official said.

Meanwhile, world powers were stepping up diplomatic efforts to avert a nuclear test. Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe left for Beijing Sunday for talks with Chinese President Hu Jintao and will then go on to Seoul for talks with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun the following day.

"North Korea must stop its nuclear tests," Abe demanded as he was leaving for his summits. "I will discuss the situation with leaders of both countries to achieve that goal," he said.

"I want to hold summits to clear the sky for the future of our countries," Abe added.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said Saturday the United States was concerned about North Korea's threat to test its first atomic bomb and the department was closely monitoring the high tensions.

DOJ_NMG_0078125

Also Saturday, South Korea's nuclear envoy announced he will visit Beijing on Monday for two days of talks with Chinese officials about the threatened nuclear test.

Japan's Foreign Ministry said it was prepared to push for punitive measures at the United Nations if the North goes ahead with the test.

"If North Korea conducts a nuclear weapons test despite the concerns expressed by international society, the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures," the ministry said.

A top Japanese ruling party official warned of further sanctions if North Korea conducts a nuclear test. Tokyo began stepping up trade restrictions on North Korea in July after it test-fired seven missiles, including a long-range rocket, into the waters between Japan and the Korean Peninsula.

"We have already imposed financial measures ... but we may have to go further, like stopping imports and exports (from North Korea)" if it conducts a nuclear test, Shoichi Nakagawa, the Liberal Democratic Party's policy chief, said on public broadcaster NHK.

The U.N. statement adopted Friday expressed "deep concern" over North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it is planning a test.

The council acted amid speculation that a nuclear test could come on Sunday, the anniversary of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Korean Workers' Party in 1997.

Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shotaro Yachi told Japan's TV Asahi: "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend."

The U.N. statement also urged North Korea to return to six-nation negotiations aimed at persuading the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions in exchange for security guarantees and badly needed economic aid.

Those talks, which involve the United States, China, Japan, Russia and North and South Korea, have been stalled since late last year, when North Korea boycotted the negotiations in response to American economic sanctions.

A North Korea expert in China, the North's closest ally, said only the removal of the sanctions could dissuade the North.

"North Korea has already made a decision to carry out a test," said Li Dunqiu of China's State Council Development Research Center, a Cabinet-level think tank. But "if the U.S. removes sanctions ... then tensions can be eased. Otherwise launching a nuclear test is unavoidable for North Korea."

The United States imposed economic restrictions on North Korea last year to punish it for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

North Korea said Tuesday it decided to act in the face of what it claimed was "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war," but gave no date for the test. Washington has repeatedly said it has no intention of invading North Korea.

Nuclear Test Threat Strains Korea Border (WT/AP)

The Washington Times/AP, October 8, 2006

SEOUL -- Tensions mounted over North Korea's threat to test its first atomic bomb, with shots ringing out yesterday along the border with South Korea and with Japan warning of harsh sanctions if Pyongyang goes nuclear.

With a test expected as early as today, the U.N. Security Council issued a stern statement Friday urging North Korea to abandon its nuclear ambitions and warning of unspecified consequences if the isolated, communist regime doesn't comply.

Jittery nations have warned that a test would unravel regional security and could trigger an arms race.

A midday incursion yesterday by North Korean troops into the southern side of the no man's land separating North and South Korea stoked the unease.

South Korean soldiers rattled off 40 warning shots at the five communist troops who crossed the center line of the demilitarized zone, the inter-Korean buffer.

It was not clear whether the North Korean advance was intended as a provocation or was an attempt to go fishing at a nearby stream, an official at South Korea's Joint Chiefs of Staff said on the condition of anonymity, citing official policy. No one was hurt, and the North Koreans retreated.

Such border skirmishes are rare. The incursion yesterday was the second this year, the official said.

"If North Korea conducts a nuclear weapons test despite the concerns expressed by international society, the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures," the ministry said.

Japan plans to step up economic sanctions against North Korea, tighten trade restrictions and freeze additional North Korea-linked bank accounts if a nuclear test occurs, Japan's Nihon Keizai newspaper reported.

North Korea's nuclear weapon would kill up to 200,000 people if used against a city such as Seoul or Tokyo, the London Sunday Telegraph reported in a story filed from Pyongyang, which cited unidentified Russian military specialists.

They say that the weapon, with the same 20-kiloton yield as the bomb dropped on Nagasaki, is about 10 feet long and weighs 4 tons. It is too big to fit onto any missile Kim Jong-il's regime possesses, but if detonated above ground, it could destroy everything within five square miles.

The Nagasaki atomic bomb used plutonium, an element now being manufactured by North Korea, as its explosive core.

The U.N. statement adopted Friday urged North Korea to return to six-nation negotiations aimed at persuading the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions in exchange for security guarantees and badly needed economic aid.

Those talks -- which involve the United States, China, Japan, Russia and North and South Korea -- have been stalled since late last year, when North Korea boycotted the negotiations in response to American economic sanctions.

Shots Fired On Korean Border As Tensions Rise (WP/AP)

Seoul's Reconciliation Bid Faces Test (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim

The Associated Press, October 8, 2006

DIAMOND MOUNTAIN, North Korea -- A hollow building frame, idle cranes and no construction workers in sight at this North Korean mountain resort are bitter reminders of dashed hopes for building a permanent reunion center for families separated by the Korean border.

The building's construction at this South Korean-run resort has been on hold since the North launched a barrage of missiles in July over international objections.

With North Korea now pledging to test an atomic bomb, the fate of projects such as these and other attempts to end decades of hostility across the world's last Cold War frontier hang in the balance.

A test "poses a real problem for South Korea because it tried 40-odd years of containment, and now it's committed to engagement," said Michael Breen, author of books about the peninsula and a longtime Korea watcher. "They know if you disengage that things are going to get worse."

South Korea has consistently pursued dialogue with the North since their leaders held their first summit in 2000. That approach has also caused a rift with its longtime ally the United States, which favors a harder line in pressuring the communist regime to give up its nuclear ambitions.

Diamond Mountain is the only place in North Korea that foreigners can easily visit. More than 1 million tourists -- mostly South Koreans -- have come to hike the unspoiled mountains since 1998, but the number of visitors has dropped sharply since the North's missile tests.

North Koreans at the resort are quick to blame the United States for the standoff over their nuclear program. They also complain that South Koreans side with "the U.S. imperialists" rather than their own brethren in the North -- echoing the propaganda issued daily by the country's state press.

"It's all U.S. imperialists' faults," Chae Jung Hae, a North Korean guide, said during a trip to the resort just before the North said it would carry out a nuclear test. "If it weren't for the North's military, we wouldn't have been able to defend the Korean Peninsula from the U.S. imperialists who constantly try to devour the North and the South."

Another North Korean guide, Paek Soon Hee, said: "If North and South join forces and stand up against the U.S., there is no way the U.S. can tell us to do this and that on our own matters."

South Korea has warned the North against conducting a nuclear test, while stressing that it won't abandon its engagement policy toward the North.

The current South Korean government -- which follows a so-called "sunshine policy" that won former President Kim Dae-jung a Nobel Peace Prize -- has also faced growing domestic calls to take a tougher line.

North Korea's Nuclear Intentions, Out There For All To See (NYT)

By William J. Broad

FOR much of the nuclear age, nations that sought the ultimate weapon kept their intentions and test sites veiled in secrecy, hidden from public view and foreign governments. The first detonations by the United States and the Soviet Union were top secrets and India's test in 1998 caught American intelligence agencies by surprise.

No more, or so it seems. North Korea all but yelled "look at me" in announcing that it plans to conduct its first nuclear test, which experts say might come at any time or perhaps never. "Shouting from the rooftops is new," said Robert S. Norris, author of "Racing for the Bomb" (Steerforth Press, 2002). "It's an unusual way to go about asserting your status as a member of the nuclear club."

What lies behind this outbreak of atomic exhibitionism? While deciphering the intentions of one of the world's most cryptic regimes seems next to impossible, analysts say likely factors include North Korea's taste for bold propaganda as well as its awareness that new classes of satellite technology are making it increasingly hard to hide nuclear sites anyway.

In the bad old days of the cold war, nations that aspired to nuclear fearsomeness wrestled with a fundamental conflict. While seeking to project a terrifying image, they also wanted to keep many test details secret so adversaries would face greater difficulty in crafting potential countermeasures and knowing the exact dimensions of the threat.

"If it was a dud, you didn't want to announce that it was a dud," recalled Philip E. Coyle III, a former head of weapons testing at the Pentagon and former director of nuclear testing for the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, a weapon design center in California.

Nuclear powers hid vast industrial complexes in the middle of nowhere and often tried to keep their tests secret. In 1949, it took weeks for Washington to find out that Moscow had detonated a bomb that ended the American atomic monopoly.

The United States responded with a costly array of instruments meant to pull back the veil — everything from high-flying planes that could sniff out whiffs of stray radioactivity to giant microphones that listened for the distant nuclear rumbles. Jeffrey T. Richelson, who profiles the era in "Spying on the Bomb" (Norton, 2006), said the gargantuan effort cost billions.

Today, a new factor is opening the secretive art to the public: a generation of commercial satellites that can peer down from the heavens to see objects on the ground as small as two or three feet wide, enough to distinguish between a car and a truck. The orbiting eyes can ogle hot tubs and backyard trampolines as well as troop movements and dictators' lairs, undermining what was once a government monopoly on such reconnaissance.

Last week, CNN broadcast satellite images of what it called a potential test site located in a valley in North Korea not far from its northeastern coast. Pentagon sources, CNN reported, confirmed suspicious movements there of people, equipment and vehicles that tended to buttress North Korea's claim that it could detonate a bomb.

GeoEye, a provider of commercial satellite pictures based in Dulles, Va., made available to The New York Times images of the same military complex, but focusing on a rocky site farther up the rugged valley. On July 31, the company's satellite looked down from a height of nearly 300 miles, its camera and telescope zooming in on what appears to be a tunnel entrance dug into the flank of a high mountain and, nearby, buildings that could store mining equipment.

"We provide customers with a map-accurate view of the ground they can't get any other way," said Mark E. Brender, a company spokesman. "Eyes in the sky are good for governments in the region who are concerned about this, and good for customers who need to know as much as they can about what may be going on in North Korea."

American officials say government spy satellites monitor about a half-dozen suspicious sites in North Korea but have also focused on the military base.

The much-scrutinized base would be an ideal spot for North Korea to set off an underground nuclear blast if it wanted to make a splash. A senior American intelligence official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of federal secrecy rules, noted that the mountainous redoubt "is a place they know we're looking at."

Along with lots of civilians. Google Earth, on the Web at earth.google.com, features some of the best public snooping on the isolated base, its software combining close-up images and altitude data so the surrounding mountains rise up in three dimensions. A viewer can zoom overhead like a spy plane. The images come from DigitalGlobe, a satellite company in Longmont, Colo.

Google views of the tunneling area, near 41.279 degrees north latitude and 129.087 east longitude, show a set of industrial buildings and what appears to be a mine entrance.

For North Korea, the emergence of the commercial spies would seem to cut two ways, either reinforcing its propaganda effort or threatening to undermine it by exposing a ruse.

And paradoxically, the best monitor of its actions, the world's largest and most sensitive network meant to detect nuclear blasts, run out of Vienna by the United Nations, is powerless to judge the North's real intentions until there is a test. This network, with its global arrays of hundreds of sensors, is meant to police a shaky global ban on the explosive tests, mainly by listening for the faint reverberations of shock waves.

If North Korea decides to go ahead and press the button, this network will help discern exactly what North Korea has succeeded in developing by way of nuclear arms — or not.

"Until they do, people can argue about their capability," said Dr. Coyle, the weapons expert. "But once they test, there's no question. The world will know."

A US `invasion' Of Korea (BOS)

By Catherine Lutz

The Boston Globe, October 8, 2006

AS WORLD attention is drawn to North Korea's missile launches and nuclear program, many South Koreans are attuned to a threat much closer to home. They have watched a group of rice farmers in the small village of Daechuri near the city of Pyongtaek attempt to defend themselves against invasion by the US military. The farmers' struggle against expansion of a nearby US military base has become a rallying point for Koreans who see their country being further militarized and their security and chances for reunification put at risk.

In May, South Korean police and soldiers descended on a schoolhouse where rice farmers and their supporters were resisting eviction. The police bloodied heads, destroyed the school, and backhoed rice fields and irrigation systems to prevent spring planting. They were sent by the Korean Ministry of Defense, at the behest of the US government, to claim a large swath of land to expand Camp Humphrey. Already covering 2 square miles, the base is slated to swallow an additional 2,851 acres.

Part of a grand plan of global military base restructuring announced by US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in 2003, the Pyongtaek base is meant to take in soldiers and equipment from closing military installations near the demilitarized zone and in Seoul. However, the bases' relocation to Pyongtaek is part of a plan to use the bases to strike at will anywhere in Asia and to contain China. It is this ``expeditionary'' or aggressive role of the bases that is behind concurrent US negotiations with South Korea, seeking ``strategic flexibility'' to use the forces based there throughout Asia. Such an agreement would change the original defensive purpose of the base. So it concerns people across the region, who see remilitarization, arms races, and intensified danger where the United States simply claims realignment. Recent US and allied military exercises off Guam, itself targeted for a massive US military buildup, were of unprecedented size, and North Korea's missile launch might be seen as a response to that provocation.

While the arguments for this restructuring suggest the United States and Korea are mutual and equal allies, Korea in fact remains a semi sovereign state under US control in many respects. Most strikingly, Korean troops come under the command of an American officer in wartime. US military plans in Asia, then, necessarily implicate the Koreans and draw them into conflict with their neighbors. Imagining China as the new national enemy is a process well underway in Washington, and the Koreans know all too well that their surgical twinning to US strategic plans will make them China's enemy as well.

All of this is playing out within the context of a difficult relationship between the more than 30,000 US soldiers based around Korea and the local citizens who see them as a source of prostitution, crime, and pollution. Koreans can point to two young girls crushed by US tanks in 2002, multiple rapes and rape-murders of Korean women, and a recent leaked report showing stratospheric levels of soil and water contamination at closing US bases.

In Daechuri, the farmers have been holding a candlelight vigil every night for the last two years in a Quonset hut on the school grounds, under the thunderous thut-thut-thut of US helicopters passing in and out of Camp Humphrey. Supporters have come in from around the country by the thousands, members of groups from across a wide range of Korea's civil society, still vibrant with an enthusiasm for the democracy they achieved only in 1987 after years of brutal dictatorship (armed and supported by the United States). While a majority of Koreans want to see the US military leave, powerful business interests, conservative Christians, and an older generation convinced of the value of the US presence continue to support Washington's military plans and Korean annual payments of at least $625 million toward their execution.

The justification for the US military buildup across Asia is the advance of political and economic freedom. The residents of Daechuri might be forgiven for being suspicious of such claims. Some of the village's oldest residents with whom I spoke last fall remember the Japanese evicting their parents for a military base during Korea's pre war annexation. The US Army took over and expanded the base in World War II, and now, for some, their third eviction in the name of a misconstrued vision of military rather than human security is imminent.

Halting the eviction of Daechuri's farmers would be a good first step toward demilitarizing the peninsula and the region. Their homes are being destroyed in the name of America 's citizens, and we have more power than anyone to reverse the escalating rhetoric and reality of arms in Asia by calling on the US government to halt its regarrisoning of Korea, Guam, and Asia-Pacific region.

U.S. Project Could Start Atomic War, Experts Warn (HC/Hearst)

By Eric Rosenberg

Houston Chronicle/Hearst, October 8, 2006

Refitted missiles may sound alarm and prompt nuclear response by Russia

WASHINGTON — A Pentagon project to modify its deadliest nuclear missile for use as a conventional weapon against targets such as North Korea and Iran could unwittingly spark an atomic war, two weapons experts warned Thursday.

Russian military officers might misconstrue a submarine-launched conventional D-5 intercontinental ballistic missile and conclude that Russia is under nuclear attack, said MIT's Ted Postol, a physicist and professor of science, technology and national security policy, and Pavel Podvig, a physicist and weapons specialist at Stanford University.

"Any launch of a long-range non-nuclear armed sea or land ballistic missile will cause an automated alert of the Russian early warning system," Postol told reporters.

The triggering of an alert wouldn't necessarily precipitate a retaliatory hail of Russian nuclear missiles, Postol said. Nevertheless, he said, "there can be no doubt that such an alert will greatly increase the chances of a nuclear accident involving strategic nuclear forces."

Podvig said that launching conventional versions of a missile from a submarine that normally carries nuclear warheads "expands the possibility for a misunderstanding so widely that it is hard to contemplate."

Mixing conventional and nuclear D-5s on a U.S. Trident submarine "would be very dangerous," Podvig said, because the Russians have no way of discriminating between the two types of missiles once they are launched.

Russia, unlike the U.S., lacks sufficient satellites to supplement radar and confirm whether missile launches are false alarms.

Russian President Vladimir Putin warned that the project would increase the danger of accidental nuclear war.

DOJ_NMG_0078131

"The media and expert circles are already discussing plans to use intercontinental ballistic missiles to carry non-nuclear warheads," he said in May. "The launch of such a missile could ... provoke a full-scale counterattack using strategic nuclear forces."

Accidental nuclear war is not so far-fetched.

In 1995, Russia initially interpreted the launch of a Norwegian scientific rocket as the onset of a U.S. nuclear attack. Then-President Boris Yeltsin activated his "nuclear briefcase" in the first stages of a retaliatory strike before the mistake was discovered.

Rice's Tour Of Mideast Yields Little Progress On Key Issues (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

LONDON, Oct. 7 -- It was a tough week for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in the Middle East. On four issues pivotal to the future of the world's most volatile region, U.S. diplomatic efforts made no visible progress or came up against unexpected resistance during her five-day tour, according to Arab and Israeli officials and analysts.

On Iraq, Arab-Israeli peace, democracy promotion and fostering a so-called moderate bloc of Arab states to stand together against militancy, Rice pressed at each of six stops for new energy or more decisive action. Many of the Arab leaders she met share U.S. fears about the region's future, but there is a growing divide even with Washington's closest allies over what needs to be done, at what pace, in what order and by whom, according to Arab officials interviewed at each stop.

Several Arab officials and analysts privately dismissed Rice's tour as a cheerleading trip without substance. Others questioned the viability of the Bush administration's Middle East policy.

"It is obvious to anyone that U.S. policy built after 9/11 -- including Iraq and the 'you're with us or against us' attitude -- has now come to a dead end," said Paul Salem, the U.S.-educated director of the new Beirut center of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and son of Lebanon's former pro-American foreign minister.

The United States and the Arab world are now engaged in a chicken-and-egg argument over what happens next. Arab governments -- including Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and five oil-rich Persian Gulf sheikdoms -- all appealed to Rice to revive U.S. leadership to break deadlocks on several fronts because they have so far been unable to do it alone, Arab officials said. But Rice basically told governments at each stop that they must first take difficult steps to create conditions more conducive to greater U.S. involvement, U.S. officials said.

Rice did make some progress on a fifth issue, Iran, on her last stop in London, where six major powers agreed Friday to pursue sanctions for Tehran's failure to suspend nuclear enrichment, a process that can be used to develop a nuclear weapon. But on that question, too, the road ahead remains rocky for winning agreement at the U.N. Security Council on what punitive measures to take, U.S. officials conceded.

Rice insisted Friday that her exploratory trip to Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel, the West Bank and two Iraqi cities was beneficial as the Bush administration moves toward "intensive" discussions about next steps after the month-long war between Hezbollah and Israel.

"I'm very glad I came out at this time," she told reporters traveling with her. "I've really enjoyed this trip to the Middle East, because I wanted to come out in the post-Lebanon period and get a real sense of what people were thinking. . . . I have a much better sense of how the Lebanese events and this period are affecting people's calculations on what needs to be done."

Rice acknowledged that the Arabs and Israel appealed for new momentum to break the escalating cycle of violence and political division in several strategic countries.

"This is an absolutely crucial time in the Middle East, and I heard in every single place that this isn't a time to stand still," Rice said. "Everyone understands that a lot is changing in the Middle East and that we need to have a positive agenda."

U.S. officials say their goal is to find ways to fill the political vacuum that has developed in the region -- before militants or Islamic radicals fill even more of it. Over the past year, Hamas won parliamentary elections and formed a government in the Palestinian territories, the Muslim Brotherhood became the largest legal opposition force in Egypt, and Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah emerged as a hero in the Muslim world for challenging Israel and surviving. Also, Iranian President Mahmoud

Ahmadinejad has taken some of the most defiant positions adopted by his country's leadership since the early days after the 1979 revolution.

Rice's trip, U.S. officials said, was partly intended to signal that the Bush administration is still fully engaged and interested, despite the growing unpopularity of the Iraq war at home and election season questions about its broader Middle East policy. But Rice's talks with nine Arab governments and Israel contrasted starkly with her earlier visits in the lack of specific initiatives. A senior Egyptian official called U.S. policy "increasingly unrealistic."

A wide range of senior Arab officials, who all spoke on background because of sensitive diplomacy with Washington, asserted that the administration's brick-by-brick approach to transforming the Middle East is so minimalist that it is unlikely to make significant progress during President Bush's remaining time in office. They also complained that Bush's personal role in the Middle East is nonexistent when compared with his early hands-on involvement in bringing Arabs and Israelis together or his public promises to ensure an end to more than six decades of war through a two-state solution.

The greatest pressure put on Rice at every stop was to do something to jump-start the moribund Arab-Israeli peace process, which Arab leaders almost unanimously described as the key to addressing other flash points as well. Yet Rice found herself negotiating some of the same issues she was engaged in last November, such as movement of people and trade in and out of the Gaza Strip. And Israeli withdrawal from parts of the West Bank, which had been promised by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, is even further away after the Lebanon war undermined his leverage and popularity.

After Rice met with Iraqi officials in Baghdad, some privately expressed concern about new tensions with Washington over the pace and sequence of handling the major challenges facing the government there, such as reconciliation and disarming militias. They complained that the Bush administration was working on its own schedule and not taking into account the potential for backlash among Iraqis if their leaders took controversial steps precipitously.

Senior Arab officials and analysts also said U.S. efforts to promote democracy and foster an anti-militant bloc were contradictory, because the moderates the United States is trying to rally against radical Islamic groups are some of region's most autocratic governments.

In Arab countries, said Salem, "the United States now looks more afraid of elections than some of the governments themselves."

Rice Wraps Up Snag-filled Trip To Middle East And London (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, October 8, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice wrapped up a six-day visit to the Middle East and London that was marked by multiple snags, both in terms of results and images.

Trouble began even before she left Washington Sunday night: A run of tell-all books on US President George W. Bush's handling of Iraq and the war on terror cast a harsh light on Rice, once the diva of the administration.

So an angry Rice began her tour with denials that she had ignored an urgent warning from George Tenet, who was CIA director, about the risk of an Al-Qaeda attack against the United States, two months before September 11, 2001.

Then she traveled to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia and Cairo to try to rally a front of eight moderate Arab governments to vigorously fight extremism and terrorism in the Middle East.

However, what she obtained was a unified message from Washington's Arab allies: the US government must engage seriously in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, or the new Middle East that she wants will never emerge.

The message was apparently received.

"I'm going to go back for extensive discussions with the president ... and with the national security principals because this is an absolutely crucial time in the Middle East," Rice said.

"And I heard in every single place this isn't a time to stand still in terms of a policy in the Middle East," Rice said.

She then traveled to Jerusalem and the West Bank town of Ramallah to support the moderate president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmud Abbas, while his Fatah faction and the Hamas Islamist movement that heads the government are locked in clashes that have left dozens dead.

However, she obtained only limited commitments from the Israelis to ease the humanitarian plight of the Palestinians.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said that the Karni crossing for goods and people between Israel and the Gaza Strip would be re-opened soon, without giving a date.

The Jewish state made no concession on an eventual exchange of prisoners and made no specific commitment to unfreeze funds owed the Palestinian Authority.

Then Rice traveled to Iraq to back the national reconciliation plan of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, but the snags piled up for the secretary of state, who is normally used to carrying out her foreign tours briskly.

While she never stops speaking of progress in Iraq, her plane had to circulate above Baghdad airport for nearly 45 minutes to wait for the end of a rocket attack in order to land.

She left a day later for Arbil, in Iraqi Kurdistan, but what should have appeared in the media as a virtuous effort to convince the Kurds to share their oil wealth with other Iraqis was beset by more difficulties.

The military plane loaned to the secretary of state suffered technical problems, forcing one of the world's most powerful women to wait for more than two hours for another plane.

The trouble caused her to miss the start of a crucial meeting of six world powers on tackling the Iran nuclear crisis, her top priority. In the end, she managed to make the meeting for 45 minutes.

However, she and her counterparts from Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia had to pass up the group photograph, traditionally used to mark a display of unity, because some of them had appointments to keep.

Rice's Baffling Mideast Trip (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Dodging bullets while hyping progress is not a convincing performance by the secretary of state.

AFTER CIRCLING THE BAGHDAD airport for 40 minutes because of mortar and rocket fire, traveling by helicopter to the Green Zone to avoid the deadly bomb-strewn highway into the city and holding a meeting with President Jalal Talabani in darkness because the power was suddenly cut off, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held a news conference Thursday to talk about all the progress being made in Iraq.

This kind of clueless happy talk in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary might produce great material for political satirists, but it's not very encouraging for those looking for signs of hope in the Middle East. Rice's recently completed six-day trip to the region, which included her sixth visit as secretary of State to Israel and the Palestinian territories, probably ranks as her least productive. She spent most of her time talking with leaders who don't trust her about issues they'd rather not discuss.

In Egypt and Saudi Arabia on Tuesday, Rice met with leaders of eight moderate Arab governments whom she had hoped to persuade to join U.S. efforts to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions. Instead, they were more interested in pushing for a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. President Bush has said the United States will not impose a settlement; Arab leaders want at least as much focus on Israel as Iran.

The next stop was the West Bank. Last year, Rice was able to broker a deal to open border crossings between the Gaza Strip and Israel, but they have been mostly closed since Palestinian guerrillas captured an Israeli soldier on June 25. It's critical that they be reopened soon because Palestinian crops are nearly ready for harvest, and if they can't be exported, it will result in more suffering than the territories are already enduring in the face of an economic embargo. When Rice talked about the crossings with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, he was noncommittal.

Then onto Iraq. After some fruitless meetings with the Iraqi leadership, which is trying to govern a country in which political parties have devolved into armed camps at war with one another, Rice turned her attention to the comparatively prosperous and peaceful Kurdish north, which is threatening to secede in a dispute over oil. Even as she was meeting with regional President Massoud Barzani on Friday, news was breaking that a Kurdish lawmaker and his driver had been kidnapped and killed, the first legislator from the current parliament to be murdered.

No visit by a U.S. diplomat could begin to ease the discord that has wracked the region for decades. If there were a silver bullet for solving the Israel-Palestinian conflict or the war in Iraq, it would have been fired long ago. As Rice says, "what is necessary is to go step by step on the ground to really improve conditions." The worry now is that every step, including by the administration, is going in the wrong direction.

'He Was Like A Brother To Me' (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 8, 2006

On the 25th anniversary of Anwar Sadat's assassination, Jimmy Carter discusses the Mideast conflict

The Camp David accords that U.S. President Jimmy Carter negotiated in 1978 between Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin were supposed to be the beginning of the end of the Middle East's terrible conflicts. Yet the killing goes on, and the situation in the region continues to deteriorate. In his book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid" (Simon and Schuster), to be published next month, Carter takes a tough look at the reasons why. Last week, on the 25th anniversary of Sadat's assassination, the 82-year-old former president spoke by telephone with NEWSWEEK's Christopher Dickey about the critical turning points in the long struggle to build on the accords, and where the process might go from here.

NEWSWEEK: Do you remember the moment when you heard that Anwar Sadat had been assassinated?

Jimmy Carter: Absolutely. I got a call directly from Cairo. I was at home and they told me at first that Sadat had been attacked but had only been slightly wounded. So I prayed that he would recover. And then they called me back within the hour to say that Sadat had been killed. It was like losing my own brother because Sadat was the closest of all foreign leaders to me. I probably have met more than 100 foreign leaders and he was the boldest and most courageous and most effective leader I've known.

Yet some Egyptians and other Arabs say he moved too far too fast, that his people weren't ready to make peace with Israel.

I don't think he was ahead of the vast majority of Egyptians. Obviously he parted ways with a fringe element of fanatics who later assassinated him. But behind the scenes, some of the other Arab leaders gave me every encouragement for the peace treaty and for the Camp David accords. And that included Saudi Arabia, Jordan and some others who later, because of a desire for unanimity among the Arab League, boycotted Sadat. But I don't think that he was ahead of the vast majority of his people. In fact, they still look upon the Israel-Egyptian treaty as one of the greatest things that ever happened to them.

But it's been a cold peace. Israel calls it a cold peace. There has never been a real mixing of the people, the Israelis and the Egyptians, back and forth, for instance, in serious tourism.

Well, that's not exactly true. When I was over there in the early '80s, I went up the Nile River and I visited the ancient sites and there was a vast array of Israeli tourists there. And I remember once they sang a very wonderful song to me and came over by the busload to thank me for making it possible for them to experience these tourist visits. But I don't think there ever has been a reciprocal visitation among Egyptians into Israel.

Why do you think that is?

Well, I'm not really sure. First of all I don't think that the Egyptian culture is all that highly attuned to visiting the holy places in Israel, with the exception of the Temple Mount. I don't think there was that encouragement to visit, although it was only later, when Israel had invaded Lebanon and was occupying Lebanon that Mubarak tightened down and put out the word that Israel had violated the spirit of the Camp David accords. Still, he didn't disavow the treaty.

Do you think the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon was the real turning point?

Well, they invaded Lebanon in '82 and they stayed there 18 years. As you know, they didn't come out until 2000.

Looking back, you have the accords, the treaty, then Sadat murdered in 1981, a few months later the completion of Israel's withdrawal from the Egyptian Sinai, and then, very quickly, Israel invades Lebanon.

That's true. Israel's withdrawal from Sinai was obviously the high point of the agreement because the Israelis did observe very carefully all the terms of the treaty. In fact, you say 'cold peace' and I wouldn't disagree with that now, but the fact is that not a word of that treaty that was so carefully negotiated has ever been violated.

Why do you think the peace hasn't grown warmer? Do you think both sides are to blame? Or do you think that either the Arabs have refused to make a real peace or Israel's actions have been too provocative?

You have to remember that the Camp David accords made some very substantial demands on Israel: that is, Israel agreed to withdraw its political and military forces from the West Bank and Gaza. And it agreed for the Palestinians to have full autonomy, and so forth. And Begin also agreed at Camp David to forgo the building of further settlements. Those kinds of agreements have obviously not been honored and I think despite those factors, which certainly have aroused consternation in some Arab countries and I would say coolness in Egypt, the treaty between Egypt and Israel has survived.

If you look at milestones since then, another turning point was the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995.

Out of the Camp David accords came the effort to have the Oslo Agreement between Rabin and Shimon Peres on one side and Yasir Arafat on the other. And it was out of that that the Palestine Liberation Organization was recognized by Israel. And there were further promises there for substantial withdrawal of Israel from the occupied territories and also for an agreement that over a five-year period, the full terms of the Camp David accords, including implementation of United Nations Security Council Reslutions 242 and 338 would be honored.

Obviously, at the time the Oslo Accords were consummated there were some prominent Israelis, including Ariel Sharon and Benjamin Netanyahu and others who disavowed the Oslo Accords. Sharon said "the Oslo Accords are national suicide for Israel." Despite that, Rabin went ahead with the early stages of the Oslo Agreement, including the formation of the Palestinian National Authority and permitting Arafat to be elected president and form a governing council or parliament.

I was over there, with Arafat at Arafat's request and with Israel's approval, to help hold that election. And it was an honest and fair and peaceful election and Arafat became the leader of the Palestinian National Authority. Subsequently, with Rabin's assassination and with the election of Netanyahu and later Sharon, of course the Oslo Agreement has not gone anywhere.

Is there a way to move forward now with the peace process?

Yes. We have a series of unequivocal and undeviating standards based on United Nations resolution 242 which Begin accepted without question, every word of it: that is, the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and the pledge to withdraw from occupied territories. That's still the basis of all the agreements. That was the basis of Camp David; that was the basis of Oslo. That is the international law. And that is also the basis for the so-called "Roadmap for Peace." And on several occasions the Israeli government has confirmed that commitment. And it has been approved not only by the Prime Minister at that time, but also ratified by the Knesset.

But the process doesn't actually seem to move forward.

You're right.

I sometimes detect in your writings over the last few years, Mr. President, what really seems to be frustration if not anger with Israel on this score.

Well, I wouldn't say anger. I would say that in the last 30 years or so one of my main commitments in life, certainly in international affairs has been to bring peace to Israel. That has been a major goal and I've supported every move that's been made to bring a peace to Israel and acceptance by all the Arab countries of Israel's right to exist to live in peace. But I am frustrated when terrorist activities cause a serious setback as they have among the Palestinians and earlier by the PLO with cross-border raids, and by Hizbullah, and the reluctance of Israel to withdraw from occupied territories. All those things concern me very much because I see them as a major obstacle to a final peace for Israel with acknowledgement by the Palestinians and all of the Arabs of Israel's right to exist and the right of the Palestinians to have a state side-by-side with Israel.

Yet the title of your new book "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid" suggests that things could be running in an extremely ugly direction.

I use the word "not" to discourage that happening. What I want to see in the future is not apartheid, but I want to see peace.

Do you think it is possible to make peace with an organization like Hamas now running the Palestinian government?

Yes, I think within the bounds of a unity government, which is not beyond the realm of possibility—they have been on the verge of it recently—I think that the acceptance of that could lead to an accommodation among the Palestinian political parties, Fatah and Hamas. The Hamas leaders have stated publicly and often that they would accept any peace agreement negotiated between the Palestinian people and Israel if the Palestinians were permitted to approve it in a referendum. That was one of the premises of the Camp David accords: after any agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, that it should be submitted to the Palestinians for approval. So those things stay below the surface, they are still there.

This is purely speculative, but how different do you think things would have been if Sadat had remained alive?

The treaty has held up. And of course that has removed the preeminent military threat to Israel. There were four wars before that treaty over a period of 25 years. Some of them were quite serious threats to Israel; certainly the 1973 war was. And they were all lead by Egypt. To remove Egypt from the military equation obviously has been a major factor in protecting Israel from existential threat by its neighbors. I think that is still very significant. It is a document that has been binding.

And yet leadership is important in determining the quality of a peace: the question of whether the people on both sides can actually support it.

That's true. I don't think that there is any doubt though that the people on both sides do support that treaty. Although I can't argue with you when you call it a cold peace—it is a peace! And the Israelis have almost full confidence that they are not going to be attacked by Egypt, and I think that if you get any kind of opinion polling in Egypt you'll find an overwhelming portion of the Egyptians support the treaty that prevents Israel and Egypt going to war again.

Nobody, or almost nobody, on either side would seriously like to go back to war.

Right, well that's what the treaty does.

Even though provisions for the Palestinians and on many other fronts have not been observed by Israel.

Remember, that is not in the Egypt-Israel treaty. That was actually in the Camp David accords that were also signed and which included the framework for the treaty.

So, do you think it would have made a big difference if Sadat had lived?

I think it would have, yes. Because Sadat had a lot of influence on the Palestinians and Egypt has always been the preeminent Arab country, at least militarily. But I can't really answer that question, because as you know it wasn't until after Sadat was killed that Israel decided to go into Lebanon. And a big question in my mind is: would Israel have invaded Lebanon in '82 if Sadat had still been alive? I've always had doubts about that, because it could very well have been that if Sadat was living [the Lebanon invasion] would have caused a rejection of the peace treaty by Egypt. But that is just a matter of hypothetical conjecture.

Still, the personalities are important.

Of course Sadat looked on that treaty and the Camp David accords as inseparable. The Camp David accords, with all of Israel's commitment to the Palestinians, and the treaty with Egypt was one unit. And later I don't think that Mubarak had that commitment. He didn't feel that he was an author of and a party to the agreements by Israel concerning the Palestinians. But he did cherish the part of the agreements that I negotiated that related to Egypt.

Looking to the present day, I know you've been very critical of the wall that Israel is building on the West Bank.

Do you see that as a sign of "apartheid" to come?

It's a sign of division, obviously, between the two. I make it clear in my book that when I refer to apartheid I'm not talking about racism. But it is certainly a division and there is no place where the wall separates Palestinians from Israelis—the wall in its entirety separates Palestinians from other Palestinians. It's completely within the West Bank, and sometimes miles and miles within the West Bank. I've got an entire chapter in my forthcoming book describing the wall in detail, and in fact the cover of the book will be a picture of the wall.

Do you see the wall as an insurmountable obstacle to peace?

Yes, as presently located it is an insurmountable obstacle to peace.

Inside Hezbollah, Big Miscalculations (WP)

Militia Leaders Caught Off Guard By Scope of Israel's Response in War

BEIRUT -- The meeting on July 12 was tense, tinged with desperation. A few hours earlier, in a brazen raid, Hezbollah guerrillas had infiltrated across the heavily fortified border and captured two Israeli soldiers. Lebanon's prime minister summoned

Hussein Khalil, an aide to Hezbollah's leader, to his office at the Serail, the palatial four-story government headquarters of red tile and colonnades in Beirut's downtown.

"What have you done?" Prime Minister Fouad Siniora asked him.

Khalil reassured him, according to an account by two officials briefed by Siniora, one of whom later confirmed it with the prime minister. "It will calm down in 24 to 48 hours."

More technocrat than politician, Siniora was skeptical. He pointed to the Gaza Strip, which Israeli forces had stormed after Palestinian militants abducted a soldier less than three weeks earlier. Israeli warplanes had blasted bridges and Gaza's main power station.

Calmly, Khalil looked at him. "Lebanon is not Gaza," he answered.

What followed was a 33-day war, the most devastating chapter in Lebanon's history since the civil war ended in 1990, as Hezbollah unleashed hundreds of missiles on Israel and the Israeli military shattered Lebanon's infrastructure and invaded its south. Nearly three months later, parts of the country remain a shambles and tens of thousands are still homeless as winter approaches.

In speeches and iconography, Hezbollah has cast the war as a "divine victory." But a reconstruction of the period before and soon after the seizure of the soldiers reveals a series of miscalculations on the part of the 24-year-old movement that defies its carefully cultivated reputation for planning and caution. Hezbollah's leadership sometimes waited days to evacuate the poor, densely populated neighborhood in southern Beirut that is its stronghold. Only as Israeli warplanes began reducing the headquarters to rubble did they realize the scope of what the Israeli military intended. Hezbollah fighters were still planning to train in Iran the very month that the soldiers were seized; Hezbollah leaders in Beirut had assured Lebanese officials of a relatively uneventful summer.

"They were prisoners of their assumptions," said Nizar Abdel-Kader, a retired Lebanese general.

The outcome of the war, still a matter of perceptions, reveals both the strengths and weaknesses of Hezbollah, perhaps the world's best-organized guerrilla group. The movement, even by the admission of its leaders, misjudged the Israeli response. But by virtue of its complex infrastructure and preparations -- years spent digging tunnels, positioning weapons, upgrading its arsenal and carrying out surveillance along the border -- Hezbollah survived.

"We were always prepared because we always knew that the day would come when we have to fight this war," said Hussein Hajj Hassan, a Hezbollah member of parliament. "We also knew that God was with us. He was with us."

Timur Goksel, a former spokesman and adviser to the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon, put it more bluntly: "Hezbollah did not expect this response, but they were ready for it."The Militia as Deterrent

On March 2, to great fanfare, leaders from across Lebanon's fractured political landscape began what was hailed as a National Dialogue. It drew together implacable foes: Walid Jumblatt, the chieftain of the Druze sect, sat across from Hasan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader; the two regularly traded thinly veiled insults. Michel Aoun, the most popular Christian leader, sat with Saad Hariri, a political novice who derives clout as the son of a former prime minister slain in a car bombing in 2005. For months, they tackled issues that threatened to tear the country apart: relations with Syria, the presence of armed Palestinians and the future of the isolated, pro-Syrian president.

Last on the agenda were Hezbollah's weapons.

Backed by France and the United States, U.N. Resolution 1559 was passed in September 2004. Under it, all militias in Lebanon -- diplomatic phrasing for Hezbollah -- were supposed to disarm. Five months later, Hariri's father, Rafiq, was assassinated, setting in motion events that forced Syria's withdrawal from Lebanon after a 29-year military presence. Deprived of the cover of one of its two main allies -- Iran is the other --Hezbollah was left relatively isolated, and its weapons became an even more pressing issue in a country whose sectarian tension was as pronounced as at any time since the civil war began.

Virtually no one expected the Lebanese army and its meager, outdated arsenal to disarm Hezbollah, which has cultivated broad support among Shiite Muslims through a variety of social services, political representation and a language of empowerment that resonates with the community's long sense of disenfranchisement. Only consensus could reach a solution short of strife.

On June 8, at the parliament building on place de l'Etoile, amid a security blanket that shut downtown, Nasrallah offered his defense at the National Dialogue. Dressed in clerical robes and a black turban, he spoke for more than an hour, participants recalled. Lebanese often remark on Nasrallah's highly organized speaking style; this speech was no different. Point by point, confident and determined but not arrogant, he explained why the militia -- what Hezbollah calls the Islamic resistance -- should retain its arms, from guns to thousands of missiles.

First, Nasrallah said, it provided a cover to the Lebanese state; in any battle with Israel, Hezbollah would suffer the consequences of Israeli reprisals, not the rest of the country. Second, Hezbollah had created a deterrent -- in the words of one participant, "a balance of fear and terror." Third, he said, the Lebanese army alone was not enough to protect a border that Israeli routinely violates by air and sometimes by sea.

In that session and the next on June 29, Hezbollah's critics at the dialogue questioned, sometimes sharply, the supposed balance of terror.

"I can reach Haifa and beyond Haifa," Nasrallah was quoted as answering them, according to Marwan Hamadeh, the telecommunications minister and a critic of Hezbollah who took part in the dialogue. Israel would not risk a Hezbollah missile attack, Nasrallah added, which could strike its petrochemical industry and the northern third of the country, including some of its most populated regions.

"He considered his potential threat as his deterrent," Hamadeh said, "that Israel would not escalate."

At the time, much of the talk was hypothetical. Participants were put at ease by what they took as Nasrallah's reassurance that nothing would disrupt the crucial tourist season, one of the Mediterranean country's lone patches of economic vitality. "He said this summer would be a quiet summer," Hamadeh recalled. "He said all the actions they would do would be reminders of their presence."

But almost as a footnote in Nasrallah's speech was a reiteration of a promise he had made many times before: the need to capture Israeli soldiers as leverage to win the release of three Lebanese prisoners. Hezbollah had tried before, in November 2005.

"He didn't say it to take approval," said Boutros Harb, a member of parliament, who sat three seats away from Nasrallah. Harb flicked his wrist in a flippant gesture. "He mentioned it like you'd write in the margins of a text."

"It didn't draw the attention of anyone at all."Preparing for Ground War

Goksel, the former spokesman for the U.N. force, has watched Hezbollah's evolution since its incarnation in the wake of Israel's devastating 1982 invasion of Lebanon. He recalled an incident in 2001-02, more than a year after the Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon. In two locales near the border, Khiam in the east and on the road to Naqoura on the coast, Hezbollah brought out excavation equipment and trucks, hauling away dirt. Men hung around, looking suspicious. And over as many as six months, in plain sight, tunnels were dug into the limestone of rugged southern Lebanon.

"We were meant to see these things," he said. "They were not making any effort to stop us looking."

At the time, he said he now believes, Hezbollah, farther from view, was digging other tunnels around Labouna, Aita al-Shaab and Maroun al-Ras, all along the Israeli border, that they employed for ambush and cover in combat to sometimes devastating effect during this summer's war.

"Looking back, they really fooled us on that one," Goksel added.

While Hezbollah's missiles were supposed to deter an all-out Israeli assault, the movement, by its own admission, also began preparing for a ground war almost from the day Israeli forces left in May 2000. Most of the militiamen were drawn from their villages and kept their weapons at home. Abdel-Kader said the town or village became the unit of defense, where other arms were stashed. The towns, in turn, were organized into three or four sectors, with a regional command.

"All the weapons were in the right place," he said. "They didn't need to mobilize."

Elias Hanna, another retired general, said the arsenal was updated over the past two years. In addition to rockets, anti-tank weapons were ferried through Syria; their use required at least some degree of training and their sophistication surprised Israeli forces.

As important to Hezbollah was surveillance. Goksel recalled fighters sometimes sitting for three months on the border "and they would write about everything that moves." He added, "They are the most patient watchers in the world."

On July 11, Goksel and seven students from a university class he was teaching stood on the Qasmiya Bridge, which spans the Litani River, the natural border of southern Lebanon. "I said, 'Look at this bridge. If anything happens, this is the first target.' " He wasn't worried, though. It was summer, and towns were filled with vacationing Shiite expatriates, many of them Hezbollah supporters. "I've never been so wrong in my life," he said.

The cross-border raid was carried out at 9:05 a.m. the next day. Soon after, Israeli warplanes struck the Qasmiya Bridge.

Three months later, Hezbollah's timing remains puzzling.

"They don't attempt adventures. They're not adventurous types," Goksel said. In every operation, they would project "what it means for Shiites, what it means for the party, what it means for Lebanon, what it means for Syria."

He paused. "One wonders if that process collapsed somehow," he said.

Hezbollah officials have hewed to the line Nasrallah delivered that night: They had long telegraphed such an operation, and the opportunity arose. Nasrallah has acknowledged that they did not anticipate the Israeli response, though Hezbollah's officials say they believe the Israelis were planning to carry out such a campaign by this October. In statement after statement, Nasrallah has dismissed charges by critics that Iran and Syria, both under international pressure, encouraged or even ordered the ambush.

Others offer a domestic rationale. The last session of the National Dialogue was set for July 25, nearly two weeks after the war began. Hamadeh suggested that Hezbollah could return to the table "with the proof that the deterrence philosophy would work." But even he admits, "The precipitation has something of a mystery around it."Underrating a Threat

Two hours after the raid, Hassan, a reticent chemistry professor and one of the longest-serving members of parliament from Hezbollah, was sitting in a meeting for the committee on public works. His cellphone rang. "I smiled, hung up the phone and told the members of parliament in the room, 'Congratulations, our hostages will be coming home soon.' " Some smiled with him; others sat expressionless.

In another room, Nawwar Sahli, a Hezbollah representative who sends his children to an American-affiliated high school, sat in a parliamentary meeting on computerizing Lebanon's ministries. He, too, broke the news to colleagues.

"God help us," he recalled one of them responding.

Sahli went on with his day, getting an MRI exam at 3 p.m. for a pain in his neck. (He picked up the results after the war.) He listened to Nasrallah's speech, then went to his office at night to deal with paperwork in the Hezbollah-controlled southern suburbs known as the Dahiya. He ignored warnings by Hezbollah security not to stay late. From Khalifah, a local fast-food restaurant that was later bombed, he ordered a chicken fajita sandwich and Philly steak sandwich, then went for an interview on a Lebanese television station.

"I said that we shouldn't exaggerate, that Israel will just retaliate a bit, bomb a couple of targets and that would be the end of it," he recalled. "When I stayed in the office, I wasn't trying to be a hero. I seriously didn't think there was a threat."

Near the airport, Amin Sherri, another Hezbollah representative, sat with his wife, four children and three grandchildren.

"My family asked me if we should evacuate the house," he remembered. "I told them, 'Absolutely not.' " On that first day and early into the war, Hezbollah's political arm was relatively lax about security. Officials said they at times slept in other homes and changed their cars, but little else. Sherri kept his cellphone on throughout; Sahli said he was only occasionally advised to shut it off and remove its SIM card. Only by the third day, after Israeli forces had struck the airport road, Nasrallah's offices, Hezbollah's television and radio stations and several bridges, was the Dahiya fully evacuated, military officials said.

It was on that day, Sahli said, that he began getting worried.

But, he added, "I kept telling myself that no war lasts forever."A Fighter's Call to Duty

Along the rolling hills of southern Lebanon that face the Israeli border, Shadi Hani Saad was getting ready for breakfast in the village of Aita al-Shaab on July 12. He was the oldest son of Zeinab Hammoud and her favorite. But when he was as young as 8, with southern Lebanon still occupied, she remembered him asking her, "Will Hezbollah still be there when I grow up?"

Tall and broad-shouldered, Saad joined the Hezbollah youth movement in 2000 after the Israeli withdrawal. As a 14-year-old, he bypassed the lower grades of the Mahdi Scouts -- the Blossoms, the Cubs and the Sailors -- and had become Infantry. Within two years, he had achieved the highest rank, a Rover, and then carried out his first operation as a militiaman.

"They didn't tell us where," she said.

He trained once or twice a week. This summer, he was groomed for even more responsibility; his mother said Hezbollah was about to send him for six months of military training in Iran.

The trip never happened. A little after 9 a.m. on July 12, after Saad had gotten out of the shower, another fighter showed up at her door and whispered something to him. Saad grabbed his M-16 rifle, along with ammunition he kept at the house, and walked away in a T-shirt and jeans. "He told me, 'I might return, I might not return,' " his mother recalled.

Years of surveillance had given Hezbollah an idea of where the Israeli forces might cross the border, Goksel said. Of 24 gates, they entered four, and at each, Hezbollah had guessed right with its fortifications and defenses, he said.

Aita al-Shaab was one. "They were waiting for them," he said.

In addition, Lebanese analysts say Israeli hesitation in the early part of the war allowed Hezbollah, caught off guard, time to prepare its defenses. By the time Israeli troops entered in force, more than a week later, Hezbollah's men were in place in villages like Aita al-Shaab. Saad's mother said he called her the first day, then the second, using a land line they deemed more secure. On the third day, he planned to come home to visit and asked her to cook dinner.

That was the last time they spoke. Israeli raids escalated that day, and the Israeli military warned residents of border towns to flee. In a blue 1986 Mercedes, she left with her four other children for Tyre, then north to the Chouf Mountains. After they fled, Saad called an uncle. "Where's my family?" he asked. Nearly three weeks later, on a Thursday night, he was killed in an airstrike.

"What God wants to leave me, he'll leave," his mother said. "What he wants to take, he'll take."

She sat at her home, with a picture of Nasrallah on the wall. A school picture of Saad hung nearby in a black frame. A sprawling poster, with a purple tint, pictured Saad in military uniform and declared him a martyred crusader. Another picture showed all nine of the Hezbollah fighters who died in the village, among the 30 or so who stayed -- by local legend, against Nasrallah's wishes -- to face Israeli troops.

Her blue eyes glimmered with tears, and she recalled a conversation before the war. As they sat at home, Saad had asked that when he died he be buried among martyrs. "What do you mean martyrs?" she shot back, half-joking. "Why do you tell me this kind of stuff?"

She shook her head. "Who knew there would be a war?"

Bush Brings Faith To Foreign Aid As Funding Rises, Christian Groups Deliver Help -- With A Message (BOS)

By Farah Stockman, Michael Kranish, And Peter S. Canellos Of The Globe Staff, And Kevin Baron

The Boston Globe, October 8, 2006

PART 1: CHANGING THE RULES | EXPORTING FAITH

This story is the first of four parts

LAKARTINYA, Kenya -- The herders of this remote mountain village know little about America, but have learned from those who run a US-funded aid program about the American God.

A Christian God.

The US government has given $10.9 million to Food for the Hungry, a faith-based development organization, to reach deep into the arid mountains of northern Kenya to provide training in hygiene, childhood illnesses, and clean water. The group has brought all that, and something else that increasingly accompanies US-funded aid programs: regular church service and prayer.

President Bush has almost doubled the percentage of US foreign-aid dollars going to faith-based groups such as Food for the Hungry, according to a Globe survey of government data. And in seeking to help such groups obtain more contracts, Bush has systematically eliminated or weakened rules designed to enforce the separation of church and state.

In Lakartinya, a simple hut built with funds from the US government is the first in the area to have a tin roof. It serves as a station for weighing babies, distributing food, teaching health classes -- and, until recently, initiating local people into the rites of Christianity, according to Food for the Hungry staff. Classes begin and end with prayers, and in some cases are followed by Christian services.

For decades, US policy has sought to avoid intermingling government programs and religious proselytizing. The aim is both to abide by the Constitution's prohibition against a state religion and to ensure that aid recipients don't forgo assistance because they don't share the religion of the provider.

Since medical programs are aimed at the most serious illnesses -- AIDS, malaria, tuberculosis -- the decision whether to seek treatment can determine life or death.

But many of those restrictions were removed by Bush in a little-noticed series of executive orders -- a policy change that cleared the way for religious groups to obtain hundreds of millions of dollars in additional government funding. It also helped change the message American aid workers bring to many corners of the world, from emphasizing religious neutrality to touting the healing powers of the Christian God.

Bush's orders altered the longstanding practice that groups preach religion in one space and run government programs in another. The administration said religious organizations can conduct services in the same space as they hand out government aid, so long as the services don't take place while the aid is being delivered. But the rule allows groups to schedule prayers immediately before or after dispensing taxpayer-funded aid.

Bush's orders also reversed longstanding rules forbidding the use of government funds to pay for employees who are required to take an oath to one religion. In addition, the president's orders allowed faith-based groups to keep religious symbols in places where they distribute taxpayer-funded aid.

And in implementing the president's orders, the administration rejected efforts to require groups to inform beneficiaries that they don't have to attend religious services to get the help they need. Instead of a requirement, groups are merely encouraged to make clear to recipients that they don't have to participate in religious activities.

Bush made some of the changes by executive order only after failing to get Congress to approve them; the bill faltered in the Senate, where moderate Republicans joined Democrats in raising concerns about breaking down the barrier between government and religion.

``I got a little frustrated in Washington because I couldn't get the bill passed," Bush told a meeting of faith-based groups in March 2004. ``Congress wouldn't act, so I signed an executive order -- that means I did it on my own."

The legality of Bush's moves is being challenged by a group advocating separation of church and state. The lawsuit, claiming both that Bush overstepped his powers and that the orders violate the Constitution, is inching its way through the federal courts.

Faith-based groups have long delivered humanitarian assistance in distant and dangerous places, marshaling an impressive array of volunteers. But Bush's initiative has put government dollars into faith-based providers in unprecedented fashion. A Globe survey of more than 52,000 awards of contracts, grants, and cooperative agreements from the US Agency for International Development -- which distributes taxpayer-funded assistance overseas -- provides the first comprehensive assessment of the impact of Bush's policies on foreign aid.

The survey of prime contractors and grantees, based on records obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, shows a sharp increase in money going to faith-based groups between fiscal 2001, the last budget of the Clinton administration, and fiscal 2005, the last year for which complete figures were available. Faith-based groups accounted for 10.5 percent of USAID dollars to nongovernmental aid organizations in fiscal 2001, and 19.9 percent in 2005.

Boost for Christians The numbers also show that the faith-based initiative overseas is almost exclusively a Christian initiative: Only two Jewish development groups and two Muslim groups of any type got any grants or contracts between fiscal 2001 and fiscal 2005, and Christians received 98.3 percent of all such funds to religious groups from fiscal 2001 to fiscal 2005.

The prime beneficiaries have been large groups including Catholic Relief Services and evangelical organizations such as World Vision -- the former employer of Bush's longtime USAID director Andrew Natsios -- and Samaritan's Purse, which is led by evangelist Franklin Graham, the son of Billy Graham, who guided Bush to his own religious rebirth.

Food for the Hungry, which is also evangelical, received its contract to run USAID programs in Lakartinya in fiscal 1999, during the Clinton administration, and it was renewed under Bush. The group's funding jumped from $7 million in fiscal 2001 to $20 million in fiscal 2005. Bush also appointed the group's president, Benjamin Homan, to chair USAID's advisory board.

Robert Snyder, Food for the Hungry's director for Kenya, said that the group seeks to segregate religious activities from aid programs, but that Kenyans don't usually believe in the concept of church-state separation.

``In Kenya, they don't separate things out,'' he said.

At Food for the Hungry's outpost in Lakartinya, staff members spoke openly of how they preach about Jesus while teaching breast-feeding and nutrition. Over the seven years that the group has been operating there, it has helped convert almost the entire area to Christianity, according to it's own field workers and villagers who participate in the programs.

Sante Dokhe, a 45-year-old mother of five from the Samburu tribe, became one of the health program's first ``contact mothers.'' She said she used to practice a traditional African religion. Then came her US-funded classes, which impressed her by drastically lowering the infant mortality rate in the village.

``The first time that I changed my mind is when we were learning the health education and our teacher was also talking about God,'' Dokhe said. ``We used to go to the rivers and pour milk for the god who stays in the mountain. But I learned through our classes that that is a very tiresome god. Now we have known that you don't need to struggle to please God. Now I have learned through health education that God is everywhere.''

Christian missionaries have crisscrossed the world for generations, seeking to save souls by converting people.

US foreign-aid programs, however, began after World War II for the purely secular aim of winning friends for the United States. Now, aid packages and equipment purchased with government funds are stamped with the words ``From the American People'' so beneficiaries can see the fruits of US generosity.

``The point of foreign assistance is national security,'' said Harriet Babbitt, who was USAID's second-ranking official during the last years of the Clinton administration.

Foreign aid programs have been criticized by some conservatives as unnecessary -- frittering away money that could be used in the United States. But in the late 1990s, evangelical groups began to focus on AIDS in Africa, and conservative Christian leaders became vocal supporters of government-funded programs.

Clinton's last USAID administrator was Brady Anderson, the president's boyhood friend and an evangelical Christian. Relations between USAID and faith-based organizations were strong, according to Babbitt and Anderson.

Nonetheless, after Bush took office in 2001, he surprised many people by declaring that religious groups had been systematically discriminated against in the awarding of government contracts. His administration issued a report called ``Unlevel Playing Field'' that declared that faith-based groups faced too many restrictions. ``Some government rules require faith-based providers to endure something akin to an organizational strip search,'' the report said.

A push for applicants To counter the alleged discrimination against churches, Bush used federal funds to hire outreach workers to hold training sessions and attend religious conferences in hopes of getting groups to apply for funds. The initiative, Bush promised, would ``open up billions of dollars in grant money competition to faith-based charities.''

USAID workers began fanning out to religious events. They tried to convince skeptics that evangelical groups could follow government guidelines while still spreading the word of the Lord.

Clydette Powell, a doctor in USAID's public-health bureau, staged a workshop on public-private partnerships in tuberculosis at an evangelical conference last year in Louisville, Ky., proclaiming, ``There are tremendous opportunities, actually, for Christians -- and for, frankly, evangelistic purposes -- within a public health strategy such as TB.''

She added: ``I think Christians, who are so much more relational in this thing, have a leg up on, you know, just the regular public system because there is interest in developing a relationship -- in fact, hopefully, a relationship that leads them to know Christ as their savior and their lord in their lives.''

When key senators balked at approving Bush's faith-based initiative, he claimed that they, too, were discriminating against churches.

But James Towey, who was director of the White House Office of Faith and Community Based Initiatives from 2002 until June 2006, said the major hang-up was Bush's desire to allow religious groups to reject candidates for government-funded jobs because the workers didn't practice the group's religion.

``The hiring provision gave everybody a lot of indigestion,'' Towey said.

In 1965, President Lyndon Johnson signed Executive Order No. 11246, a landmark directive that required all federal contractors to consider applications ``without regard to race, color, religion, sex or national origin."

Frustrated by Congress's refusal to reconsider Johnson's policy, Bush issued his own order in 2002 specifically allowing faith-based groups to discriminate in hiring for government-funded positions.

Bush explained himself in a speech in New Orleans on Jan. 15, 2004. Standing in front of a huge cross, the president said the federal government used to tell faith-based programs to ``take the cross down from the wall" to get government money.

``The problem is, faith-based programs only conform to one set of rules, and it's bigger than government rules," Bush said.

His rule changes were encouraged by both the Catholic Church, which was already the largest faith-based recipient of government money overseas, and the National Association of Evangelicals, whose leaders say it represents 30 million people.

The Catholic US Conference of Bishops declared, ``It is more important than ever to make sure that all charities, faith-based or secular, have access to the public and private resources they need" to serve the needy.

Robert Cizik, the evangelical association's vice president for governmental affairs, said, ``Without the faith-based service providers, there is no way to begin to stem the tide of AIDS."

He said Bush's rule changes -- including the reversal of Johnson's non-discrimination order -- were needed to give smaller evangelical providers ``an equal shot at the federal pie."

Other churches protest Yet leaders of many large Christian denominations believe it is wrong for religious groups to discriminate based on religion when using government funds. And while Bush has portrayed many restrictions intended to enforce the separation of church and state as hostile to religion, many religious leaders disagree: They say the separation of church and state has allowed religions to flourish.

Many large Protestant denominations say the administration is catering to the religious right -- particularly evangelical groups seeking funding for missions whose ultimate aim is recruiting new members.

Bishop Frank Griswold, the presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church, the faith in which Bush was raised, said he strongly opposed allowing faith-based contractors to discriminate in hiring. But the bishop said he was unable to express his concerns to Bush.

``I must say it has been very difficult for me -- and I think I can speak for the mainline churches as well -- to have any substantial engagement with the president," Griswold said. He said he has been ``shunted to one side" by the White House, which has been more interested in rewarding the religious right.

``I think it has to do with politics and power," Griswold said. ``It has a great deal to do with what Mr. Bush perceives to be his base."

Criticism also comes from representatives of the faith that Bush now observes -- the United Methodist Church.

James Winkler, general secretary of the church's General Board of Church and Society, compared Bush's claim of discrimination against faith-based organizations to his assertion that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

``We heard all the time that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction, and we heard all the time that there has been all this discrimination against faith-based groups," Winkler said. ``We kept on saying we haven't noticed any discrimination. The grants are there. This really came from the religious right as political payback for their support for the president."

The Southern Baptist Convention, which is the largest of several Baptist organizations, also has strong reservations about Bush's faith-based initiative, preferring to maintain a separation of church and state.

Richard Land, president of the convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, advises Southern Baptist churches not to take federal money. Noting how some British colonies in America financially supported the Anglican Church while persecuting Baptists, he said Baptists have in their ``genetic code" a dislike of such government funding.

Most Jewish groups have not aggressively sought foreign-aid contracts, some leaders said, because they do not seek to convert people, and a prime motivation for religious groups to be active overseas is to win new converts.

``Jews are not missionaries," said Ruth Messinger , president of the American Jewish World Service. ``The whole concept of proselytization is alien to us. Not only alien, almost offensive to us. Jews just don't do that."

Many Christian groups, however, acknowledge that they aim to convert new members, while denying that they proselytize.

``We would like for everyone to become a Christian, that is part of our faith as Christians," said Mark Howard, general counsel of World Vision.

Nonetheless, neither Natsios, who headed USAID from May 2001 to this year, nor Kent Hill, the assistant administrator for Global Health Programs, said they have ever received complaints of a religious contractor violating rules against proselytizing. But Natsios, at a conference last spring, acknowledged that USAID does not monitor groups for proselytizing.

Outsiders point out that members of the administration -- including the president -- sometimes seem to endorse the use of government funds for religious objectives. Speaking before religious leaders in Los Angeles on March 2, 2004, Bush discussed the difficulties of faith groups.

``I think if you ask them their biggest problem, they'd say, `Well, we need to expand, there's more souls to be saved, we need a little extra space for our rescue mission,' " he said. He then assured the groups: ``The government has got resources."

Robert Tuttle, a George Washington University law professor who has studied USAID policies, said he was dumbfounded that the agency chose not to require that aid recipients be told that they don't have to attend services: ``It is scandalous in the sense that if you really are interested in protecting the religious liberty of beneficiaries, then why not inform them of their rights?"

The government's General Accountability Office this year examined 13 federally funded faith-based organizations in the United States that offer prayer or worship. The agency concluded that four of the 13 ``did not appear to understand the requirement to separate these activities in time or location from their program services."

K. Hollyn Hollman, general counsel for the Baptist Joint Committee, which represents 14 Baptist organizations, said she is alarmed by the administration's policy that a religious group doesn't have to change its ``religious character" when distributing government aid.

Said Hollman: ``If the religious character of my organization involves evangelizing, changing your life through Christian witness, then I will be tempted to do that in a government-funded program."

The Globe's research found that in the absence of clear standards such as a prohibition on running government programs where services are conducted, religious groups feel free to ask recipients to pray, discuss their spiritual needs, and attend services.

Since many groups combine government and private funds, they feel unrestricted about proselytizing so long as they can say they were using private money. For instance, USAID has paid for tens of millions of dollars in equipment for religious hospitals, where patients learn about the Gospel while receiving care. But since the missionaries themselves are not on the government payroll, no rules apply.

Graham, whose Samaritan's Purse receives USAID funding for medical centers in Sudan and Angola, said in an interview: ``Of course you cannot proselytize with tax dollars, and rightfully so. I agree with that. But it doesn't mean that we can't build buildings, we cannot provide housing and buy bricks and mortar. The proselytizing or the preaching or the giving out of Bibles, people give us funds for those."

More Christian converts In the dusty village of Lakartinya, Lucia Loltome, a 34-year-old nurse employed by Food for the Hungry, says proudly that she begins and ends each health class with a prayer.

Loltome became a Christian when she attended a Catholic high school. Now she is in charge of projects that involve 730 households and 1,300 children. She is proud of how she laces her lessons about typhoid, parasites, and breast-feeding with education about the Christian God.

``Before 1999, these people were not even going to church," she said. Now, all the contact mothers in the program and nearly every family in nearby villages are churchgoers, Loltome said.

A similar story is told three miles away, in an area known as Nkirmat, where Food for the Hungry began a similar project under the same USAID grant. In Nkirmat, contact mothers began learning about health education in 1999 and recently began breeding milk-producing goats. As with Lakartinya, the USAID program here has been accompanied by a wholesale conversion to Christianity, according to Antonella Kupona, the lead mother of the goat project.

``There was a church built here in 1972 but people were not going because of the traditional beliefs," she said. ``But now they are taking it up in great numbers. . . . As we go for the health education, we also learn about God."

Ex-President Bush Seeks More Quake Aid (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Former President George H.W. Bush has appealed for nearly $100 million in aid for survivors of last year's South Asia earthquake, saying tens of thousands face another winter living in tents.

"If they're in tents, that's not good enough," Bush told a news conference Friday to mark the first anniversary of the Oct. 8, 2005 quake that killed more than 80,000 people and left more than 3 million homeless in Pakistan and India. "But it's a heck of a lot better than it was a year ago."

Bush, the U.N. envoy to promote help for survivors of the 7.6-magnitude quake, recalled predictions immediately after the disaster that Pakistanis in rugged mountains would have difficulty getting through the winter. "And it didn't happen," he said.

"Nearly 300,000 people have now returned home safely after living in tents for nearly half a year," he said. "However, full-scale reconstruction and the full resumption of basic services is going to take years."

Bush said snow was already falling in some parts of Pakistan and it was critical to get access to people in remote locations.

"If the upcoming winter were to be harsh, elderly people and young children can face renewed vulnerabilities," he said. Aid agencies expect mountain dwellers to start pouring soon into lowland camps to escape the coming freeze.

Bush said the Pakistani government was determined "that even if the winter might be harsh, people will have protection — so I think they're moving very hard to try to move toward permanent housing."

Reconstruction, however, has moved slowly, constrained by rigorous new quake-proofing rules.

According to the relief agency Oxfam, 1.8 million survivors are still living in tents or makeshift shacks.

At the news conference, Hina Rabbani Khar, Pakistan's minister of state for economic affairs, disputed that figure and insisted that only about 30,000 people were still living in tents — just 5 percent of the original number last year. She said helping such a small number during the coming winter will be "very manageable."

Bush didn't address the discrepancy in the numbers, but he said the early recovery plan for quake-affected areas had received just two-thirds of the $255 million needed.

"We're still missing $94 million which is still critical for bridging the gap from relief to recovery," he said. "The sectors that remain underfunded are water and sanitation, housing and support for vulnerable people."

Pakistan's President Gen. Pervez Musharraf appealed Thursday for $800 million to cover additional reconstruction costs, Khar said.

Bush told reporters he wasn't satisfied with his efforts to get donors to fulfill aid pledges, saying donor fatigue was part of the problem.

"We've made some progress, but heaven knows I've got a long way to go before I can express total satisfaction," he said.

Pakistani Quake Survivors Still Fearful (AP)

By Paul Garwood, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Dozens of girls have been skipping school in this Pakistani Kashmir mountain town, but neither bullies nor boredom is to blame. Teachers say pupils fear being crushed in an earthquake like the one that killed 80,000 people one year ago Sunday.

Among the dead were 34 students of the Government Girls Middle School in Chikar, which collapsed in a heap of rubble and trapped scores of pupils and teachers. Four tents have been raised on top of the ruins to serve as classrooms for some 400 pupils aged 14-16.

"There has been low school attendance recently," Saira Bhatti, a teacher at the school, told The Associated Press. "They are so scared that the quake might strike again. Sometimes when the wind blows hard, the children are terrified and start crying because they think it is another quake."

Fear is palpable among many locals in Chikar, which was ravaged by the 7.6 magnitude quake that townspeople claim killed at least 10,000 in and around the hilltop settlement.

Most said they are sleeping outside now in case Sunday's anniversary leads to a repeat of last year's disaster that killed thousands as they slept in homes, studied in schools or worked in offices.

All said they will offer special prayers Sunday for those who died in the earthquake, which devastated cities, towns and villages across northern Pakistan and in the Indian-controlled part of Kashmir.

Javed Iqbal, 42, said he is not afraid of sleeping inside his home, but acknowledged that he was an exception, particularly after reports spread that tremors had been felt late Friday in Balakot, the worst-affected Pakistani city in the earthquake where more than 30,000 people died.

"News spread throughout Chikar so quickly that there had been an earthquake in Balakot and fears of aftershocks here have forced most people to spend the nights outside," said Iqbal, who works as a curtain maker in Saudi Arabia and returns to his Pakistani home three months each year.

In Chikar, concrete and metal that once formed shops are still heaped throughout the town's main bazaar. Cracks in walls of houses and offices give passers-by a glimpse of the rooms inside.

But earthquake-proof houses with shiny corrugated iron roofs are popping up inside the town and on steep, pine-covered mountainsides. And health clinics run by aid groups are providing around-the-clock primary health care to anyone who asks.

Safia Bibi, a 35-year-old mother of four, received compensation from the government for the deaths of her infant son and mother who were crushed under the rubble of their mud brick house, but said the payments have not healed her pain.

"There remains so much fear and tension since the earthquake and no amount of money will change that," said Bibi, while two of her children underwent routine immunizations at a Chikar health center.

But others see compensation as their best chance at regaining some semblance of normalcy.

More than 1,000 survivors rallied in the capital Islamabad on Saturday demanding that delays in the release of compensation to quake victims be overcome so they can reconstruct housing.

Chanting slogans such as "Stop taking bribes!" "Stop cheating us!" and "Build our homes before snowfall," the protesters marched from the parliament to the government department responsible for releasing aid money for reconstruction.

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf has said that his government will ensure the provision of basic facilities to those affected by the quake and he hopes that 80 percent of the reconstruction will be over in the coming three years.

Muslim Lawmaker Assimilated And Berated (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Denmark's Naser Khader is praised by secular Europeans as a voice for moderation and unity. Islamists consider him a traitor.

COPENHAGEN — Ever since he left the laundry-draped alleys of his Syrian village and glimpsed the red-light district of Copenhagen, Naser Khader's life has been a curious, and sometimes dangerous, navigation between Islam and the West.

A man with "democracy" tattooed in Arabic on his arm, the Danish lawmaker epitomizes Europe's struggle to integrate moderate Islam into secular democracy. The Danes view him as the ideal Muslim, a multilingual author with European sensibilities for tolerance. Islamists regard him as a traitor, a factory worker's son who bartered his identity for a bit of Western acceptance.

It is sensitive cultural and political terrain, but Khader's convictions are anything but opaque. This was apparent early this year when he condemned violent Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper's publication of caricatures of the prophet Muhammad. Khader argued that the worldwide demonstrations were orchestrated by radical clerics to aggravate tensions between East and West.

"If you don't want to look at the cartoons, don't buy the paper," Khader, one of three Muslims in the Danish parliament, said in a recent interview at his office. "I understood why Muslims were upset. But you protest in the frame of democracy.

"Why this overreaction? I asked the Islamists why they didn't demonstrate when Abu Musab Zarqawi killed innocent hostages in Iraq. Why didn't they protest when Bin Laden sent planes into New York? This is against Islam too."

Such sentiments earned Khader, who travels with bodyguards and a wry sense of humor, at least one death threat from an extremist imam. A sturdily built man who perfected his Danish on neighborhood soccer fields, he is bemused by the discreet men who shadow him. "I think it's sad," he said, "that police have to protect those who speak for democracy. But the world has changed. This is my life."

The 43-year-old lawmaker and his adopted Europe are caught amid disturbing agendas. Radical Islamists and anti-immigration attitudes are jeopardizing Muslim integration, giving rise to right-wing political groups such as the Danish People's Party. Muslims with immigrant backgrounds often face high unemployment and alienation, which has led to terrorist threats, including an alleged plot several weeks ago by three men to detonate a bomb in Denmark.

Khader has tried to become a unifying voice; his politics spring from a childhood of trying to fit in and succeed. But his unapologetic political message, praised by secular Europeans, has irritated conservative Muslims. They consider him a man who has drifted too far to the other side, marrying a native Dane, not attending Friday prayers, sipping beer and attending soccer games in a jersey that resembles the Danish flag.

"Naser Khader is irrelevant to Muslims in this country," said Ahmed abu Laban, an outspoken Islamic leader in Copenhagen. "His role is to keep bombarding Muslims and Muslim values. He represents that strain of thought in Europe that's too cowardly to face legitimate Muslims. So they get people like Khader to act as a human shield and to spit in our face."

David Trads, a political analyst who has written a book on Islam in Denmark, said:

"Many are saying that Khader's like an Uncle Tom. That's not a fair criticism, but he wants to make sure everyone in Denmark understands that there's a very serious situation with the Islamists. He wants also to build a bridge between moderate Muslims and Danes."

Dressed in a blue blazer and pinstriped shirt open at the collar, Khader sat the other day at a table strewn with papers, a folder and a book titled "Cradle of Islam." A biography of U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton sat on a nearby shelf. Khader, who is straightforward instead of tactical when it comes to politics, weighed the aspirations and pitfalls of being identified as a European and a Muslim in the same breath.

The atmosphere was less volatile in 1974, when an 11-year-old Khader and his mother, three brothers and a sister left their Syrian village to join his father in Copenhagen. The elder Khader, a Palestinian, was among those who had come to Denmark years earlier to fill Northern Europe's need for laborers and factory workers. His parents weren't religious — his father was a Marxist — and unlike today, Islamic head scarves were rarely spotted along the city's canals and alleys.

"There was no Islamophobia in Denmark in the 1970s," said Khader, who first tasted rye bread and licorice on the sidewalks of his new city, where sometimes the "working girls" near the red-light district bought him ice cream on his way home from school. "It was a different world. I had come from a village where the only TV set was in a coffee shop for men."

The tone in Denmark shifted a decade later, however, when refugees from the Lebanese civil war began arriving. More Muslim immigrants landed throughout the 1990s, along with imams financed by radical Islamic groups in the Middle East.

The gap between the parallel societies of Muslims and Danes widened after Sept. 11, and the controversy over the Muhammad caricatures further exposed the integration failures in a nation that prided itself on equality.

Danes were left with the moral question of how far the vaunted tradition of Scandinavian tolerance extended. Muslims, who account for about 200,000 of the population of 5.4 million, are split between those such as Khader and the more extremist voices angry about discrimination and issues such as the participation of Danish troops in the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

"It's not a clash of civilizations. It's a clash of ideologies, and the largest part of that is between Islamists and moderate Muslims," Khader said, adding that Middle East extremists were trying to exploit Muslim integration problems in Europe. "I've founded a group called Democratic Muslims. We're going to hold an international conference. We need to oppose the well-organized Islamists.

"We don't know enough about the Islamists," he said. "Who are they? What's their thinking? Why is radical Islam so attractive to people even born in this country?"

Khader says much of the blame lies with religious leaders such as Abu Laban, who organized a Muslim delegation to the Middle East to gain diplomatic support for protests against the Muhammad cartoons. The demonstrations in Europe were largely peaceful, but the outrage in the Middle East and other regions led to violence, deaths and the storming of Danish embassies.

"I went to Abu Laban's mosque when I was younger, but then I got tired of his politics," said Khader, a former Copenhagen city councilman with a master's degree in political science. "He started talking about then-President Reagan and the first President Bush. I couldn't listen to him anymore.

"In Denmark today there are between 100 and 120 imams, but only five or six of them [radicalized] the controversy around the cartoons."

Abu Laban said that he was opposed to violence and that "relations between Danes and Muslims are not so fearful as some might imagine."

When asked about Khader, Abu Laban said, "Unfortunately, Mr. Khader is riding two horses, and in my opinion, he doesn't fulfill even the minimum of being called a Muslim."

Khader said he was aware that some might perceive him as a patsy for the West's idea of a Muslim. Europe constantly sifts through the rhetoric of radical mullahs and fundamentalist ideologues to find what it considers palatable Muslim voices. This search is growing more intense as the continent's population ages and immigrants are needed to bolster its economies and fund its welfare states.

Khader said Danes had begun to move away from stereotyping Muslims, but overall the society had been slow to embrace multiculturalism. There are indications that since the publication of the cartoons, Danes are more skeptical about Muslim integration.

The Danish People's Party controls 13% of the parliament; the nation's new bestseller compares radical Islam to Nazism, calling it a threat to Western freedoms.

"It's not enough to think that all Muslims must look like me," Khader said. "Integration has to be for liberal and conservative Muslims, for Muslims who wear head scarves and for Muslims who are devout. Europe must accept this fact."

Khader had to accept it within his family. Five years before his death, Khader's father rediscovered his faith and became an observant Muslim. Khader's mother, who wore no head scarf when she arrived as an immigrant, wears one today.

One Man Leads Often Dangerous Quest To Quell Violence In Yemen (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

SANA, Yemen — With his mobile phone buzzing incessantly, the radio blaring and a band of young men standing by the phones for any word of trouble, Abdelrahman al-Marwani waited nervously as the polls closed in Yemen's presidential elections on Sept. 20, eager to see the results of his decade-long campaign.

Success, however, had nothing to do with voting or who might win and everything to do with whether election day remained peaceful.

"People are usually riled up now, and they're easily triggered to seek revenge," Mr. Marwani said on election day, listening to the news wearing his traditional tribal headdress and a sports jacket. "This is usually the most dangerous time."

The election, in which President Ali Abdullah Saleh was re-elected and local councils were chosen, was something of a victory for Mr. Marwani, the son of a tribal sheik who has struggled to bring the issue of violence and the need for gun control into the spotlight here. For the past decade, he has led a lonely and often dangerous fight to quell tribal wars, seeking to break a cycle of revenge and retribution that kills as many as 1,200 people a year.

Through his organization, Dar Al Salam, or the House of Peace, which he formed in 1997 to spread the message of tolerance, he says he has negotiated cease-fire deals between warring tribes and even persuaded some to disarm.

This year he persuaded the government to declare election day a weapons-free day. Then he helped cajole Yemen's combative tribes to sign a contract agreeing to leave their weapons at home, and he enlisted businessmen to plaster his trademark symbol, a pistol crossed out with a thick red line, on billboards, in newspapers, and on bottles of water and laundry detergent, among other items.

Eight people were killed on election night, The Associated Press reported, but that was down from the 67 killed and more than 100 wounded during local council elections in 2001.

Yet the fact that it took Mr. Marwani so long to get the government's support for just one day of peace is a measure of the difficulty of changing Yemen's mind-set, one person at a time.

"The law doesn't work here," as it should, he said. "It takes months or years to get justice." And even then, he added, the judges are not impartial.

Mr. Marwani formed his organization largely with his own money, persuading select tribal elders to represent their tribes, giving his group more political weight. Today, it has more than 400 members, he says, and can draw on more than 1,000 volunteers throughout Yemen. The group holds exhibitions, classes and theater workshops. He relies on individual donations and has received some help from the government, but operates on a shoestring budget.

Mr. Marwani said he formed the group out of the dogged conviction that if something was not done about the violence soon, Islamic militants would take over the country.

Yemen, one of the poorest countries in the Arab world, is an ally of the United States in the effort to curb terrorism, but it is also a breeding ground for extremism. With a weak, preoccupied central government, law and order in the hinterlands is left to tribes that exist in a perpetual state of war.

At any time, Mr. Marwani said, Yemen has many tribal conflicts, ranging from family squabbles to warfare with heavy weapons and, in some areas, armor from Yemen's civil war a decade ago.

Mr. Marwani traces his determination to end the violence to a severe injury he suffered at age 12, when he and his friends were playing with a grenade that exploded. Although the wounds have healed, he says, he can never forget the damage that the continuous conflict had done to Yemen's society and culture. He had long planned to do something about it, he said, but was waiting for the right moment.

In 1996, with the civil war finally over, he formed a council to try to settle tribal disputes in his region. But when he tried to settle a feud in another province, they refused his services and chased him out of town, he said.

He said he realized he had to broaden his effort, to reach out to other tribes and, "We simply needed to be more organized."

A year later, he started Dar Al Salam with the help of friends and colleagues with the express aim of bringing warring tribes across the country to the negotiating table. In one case in 2004, a man belonging to the Beni Shar tribe was killed while working for members of the Beni Hushaysh tribe, and a tribal war exploded. Mr. Marwani rounded up hundreds of his men and they drove straight between two ridges where the tribes were fighting, he said. In a scene his group videotaped and in photographs, Mr. Marwani could be seen running between the combatants holding up a white flag and beseeching each side to hold its fire. Then, his men, including many elders from various tribes climbed up on either ridgeline and tried to persuade the tribesmen to hand over their weapons.

Once tempers cooled, he said, he set up a makeshift trial, and negotiated a settlement, with livestock exchanging hands as restitution.

In other cases, his group has intervened in revenge attacks, with a goal of finding the original attacker and bringing him to confess and to apologize. "And then it gives the other side a sense of pride and dignity in offering forgiveness," he said.

The work is decidedly dangerous. He has been shot three times, he said, and nine of his volunteers have been killed and 15 injured over the years. Volunteers' cars have been attacked and they have been forced to leave towns and villages where they have tried to intervene.

He estimates he has settled more than 165 feuds over the past 10 years with almost no input from the government. But ultimately, Mr. Marwani said, his battle is to change the public discourse in Yemen from one of trigger-happy intolerance to one of open debate and acceptance.

The small victories keep him going. "I never thought I could get even this far, but people have begun to listen to me," he said. "Extremism is not new, but the oil, the wars, all have turned it into something very dangerous. And now is the time to deal with it."

Knocking It Off In China (AP)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press

The Associated Press, October 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078150

By the time David S. Pearl II saw one of the knockoff versions of his company's refrigeration-testing devices, the damage had been done.

For more than 35 years, Uniweld Products Inc. had painstakingly built its reputation in the air-conditioning-hungry Middle East. But as cheap counterfeits entered the market, sales plummeted. Workers were laid off, consumer confidence destroyed.

The reason for Uniweld's misery sat before him, just out of an express-mail package: a Chinese-made, nearly identical version of the real thing -- one of a flood of pirated American products, the bulk from China, that the United States blames for costing thousands of jobs, robbing companies of profits and seriously harming the U.S. economy's ability to compete.

In Mr. Pearl's case, the bogus equipment matched the original right down to the name, trademark, address and phone number of his manufacturing company's headquarters in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

The differences, though, were crucial: The fake products cost half as much as the real ones, and they didn't work. Mr. Pearl estimated that over the years Uniweld lost more than $1 million, a significant amount for a small company.

"You look at them side by side, it is absolutely amazing how well they copied them, and it's scary," said Mr. Pearl, Uniweld's executive vice president. "The United States is a country of thousands and thousands and thousands of small businesses, who employ the majority of the employees in the country. For them to be hammered by Chinese counterfeits is a serious problem."

U.S. lawmakers, government officials and businesses agree that stopping the theft of American brands abroad would save companies billions of dollars and would help to correct a U.S. trade deficit that hit a record high of $202 billion with China last year.

But the accord often ends there.

Businesses want lawmakers to do more; Congress urges the Bush administration to take a harder line on China's lax enforcement of existing copyright-protection laws; and the U.S. government threatens China with punitive action in the World Trade Organization (WTO) if progress is not made.

Meanwhile, rampant theft of copyright American products continues.

Officials estimate that piracy and counterfeiting worldwide cost U.S. industry as much as $250 billion a year.

China is a major culprit, U.S. officials say, accounting for nearly 70 percent of all pirated products seized at the U.S. border last year -- more than 10 times greater than any other American trading partner. Russia also is a problem, with American business groups urging stronger pledges from Moscow to protect intellectual property before being allowed WTO entry.

Sen. Carl Levin, a Democrat who represents Michigan's auto-parts makers, says China is thought to be responsible for about $9 billion of the $12 billion in the industry's estimated losses annually to counterfeits.

"There China sits while our government dawdles," Mr. Levin told a recent congressional advisory panel. "We need to stop merely putting China on lists and start taking more effective action."

U.S. officials say they are working hard to get Beijing to fight the problem more aggressively and to follow through on commitments made when China joined the WTO in 2001.

The United States posted its first intellectual property attache in Beijing in 2004 and plans additional attaches this year. Dozens of copyright-protection training programs have been conducted with Chinese officials since 2001, the U.S. government says.

Last year, the U.S. trade envoy formally requested that China document what it was doing to enforce copyright protection under its WTO obligations. Though China's response was "less than forthcoming," officials say they continue to push for those details.

The United States has placed China on a "priority watch list" over concerns about Beijing's failure to improve protection of intellectual property.

A meeting between top U.S. and Chinese officials on the eve of President Hu Jintao's April visit to Washington "yielded measured progress" on the issue, said Timothy Stratford, an assistant U.S. trade envoy for China affairs. China committed to take stronger action against producers of pirated optical discs and to make sure computers are pre-installed with legal operating-system software.

Still, many were disappointed that Mr. Hu did not make greater commitments to crack down on piracy when he met with President Bush.

Above all, the United States has signaled its willingness to wield what is considered one of its most powerful weapons: a formal WTO complaint against China for inadequate enforcement of copyright protections. A ruling against China could lead to strict sanctions.

"Results are what matter to us," Mr. Stratford recently told the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission. "We will not shy away from using dispute settlement at the WTO when we feel China is not living up to its commitments."

Critics say warnings are meaningless. The Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, Mr. Levin said, "is a paper tiger, I'm afraid."

Lack of government leadership, the senator said, has forced the auto industry to "do too much of the policing itself and at great expense."

Bill Primosch, director for international business policy at the National Association of Manufacturers, said the U.S. government is faced with obstacles as it considers a WTO case. First, he said, it must make sure it can win. If the WTO ruled against the United States, it could send a message to Beijing that its current approach is sufficient.

Another problem is that U.S. companies are reluctant to cooperate publicly. Mr. Primosch said many are afraid that if they complain too loudly, China will retaliate, forcing them out of what is considered the most important major growth market in the world for U.S. manufacturers.

Until the problem is solved, industry representatives say, many U.S. companies eyeing China face bleak prospects.

Patricia Schroeder, president of the Association of American Publishers, estimated in recent testimony that U.S. publishers in China lost $52 million last year, part of a "staggering amount of book piracy plaguing this most promising of markets."

Mrs. Schroeder, a former member of Congress from Colorado, summed up the problem faced by many U.S. industries working in China: "China is a country that boasts millions upon millions of eager potential readers and scholars," she said. "And these readers are largely being supplied with illegal goods."

Castro Foe With C.I.A. Ties Puts U.S. In An Awkward Spot (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

EL PASO, Oct. 6 — Thirty years ago, long before liquids and gels were restricted on airliners, a tube of Colgate toothpaste may have brought a plane down from the sky.

Cubana Airlines Flight 455 crashed off the coast of Barbados on Oct. 6, 1976, killing all 73 people aboard. Plastic explosives stuffed into a toothpaste tube ignited the plane, according to recently declassified police records.

Implicated in the attack, but never convicted, was Luis Posada Carriles, a Cuban exile who has long sought to topple the government of Fidel Castro.

Today, Mr. Posada, 78, is in a detention center in El Paso, held on an immigration violation while the government tries to figure out what to do with him. His case presents a quandary for the Bush administration, at least in part because Mr. Posada is a former C.I.A. operative and United States Army officer who directed his wrath at a government that Washington has long opposed.

Despite insistent calls from Cuba and Venezuela for his extradition, the administration has refused to send him to either country for trial.

Intensifying the problem is that Mr. Posada, who was arrested last year in Miami after sneaking into the country, may soon go free because the United States has been reluctant to press the terrorism charges that could keep him in jail.

That prospect has brought a hail of criticism of the Bush administration for holding a double standard when it comes to those who commit terrorist acts.

“The fight against terrorism cannot be fought à la carte,” said José Pertierra, a Washington lawyer who is representing the government of Venezuela in its effort to extradite Mr. Posada. “A terrorist is a terrorist.”

The Bush administration has stopped short of prosecuting him as a terrorist, however, even though the Justice Department called him as much this week. In papers filed in federal court in El Paso on Thursday, it described him as “an unrepentant criminal and admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks on tourist sites.”

Instead, Mr. Posada faces immigration charges, as the Bush administration tries its best to deport him somewhere else, where he would walk free.

Few countries seem willing to take him. So far, Canada, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico and Panama have all turned down American requests to take Mr. Posada, who denies that he bombed the plane but who is linked to the case in declassified C.I.A. and F.B.I. files.

"Who would want him?" asked one lawyer close to the case, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified because of the delicacy of the litigation. "Wherever he goes there will be intelligence agents from a variety of nations following him, not to mention hit squads."

Two countries do want Mr. Posada: Venezuela, where he is wanted for blowing up the plane, and Cuba, where he is viewed as an enemy of the state who has repeatedly tried to assassinate Mr. Castro.

An immigration judge has ruled that Mr. Posada may be subject to torture in those two countries. But because no other country has stepped forward, and because he has not been officially deemed a terrorist by the American government, a federal judge recommended last month — coincidentally on Sept. 11 — that Mr. Posada be released.

The Bush administration is now invoking a law that bars the release of an illegal immigrant who poses adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States. That tack has placed it in the awkward position of, in effect, having to call Mr. Posada a terrorist even as it refuses to charge him as one.

Mr. Posada has longstanding links to American intelligence agencies, and his colorful past helps to explain why this is not a garden variety terrorism case. One immigration judge involved in the proceedings described them as being "not unlike one of Robert Ludlum's espionage thrillers."

A former sugar chemist and exterminator in Cuba, Mr. Posada has been working in the shadows to carry out a policy not unlike the one Washington has advocated over the decades — the removal of Mr. Castro.

"How can you call someone a terrorist who allegedly committed acts on your behalf?" asked Felipe D. J. Millan, Mr. Posada's El Paso-based lawyer. "This would be the equivalent of calling Patrick Henry or Paul Revere or Benjamin Franklin a terrorist."

Mr. Posada received military training in the United States and worked for the C.I.A. as far back as the failed Bay of Pigs invasion. He played a role in supplying the contras in Nicaragua. He has admitted, but subsequently denied, involvement in a string of bombings of Cuban tourist facilities.

By the time the Cubana Airlines plane exploded, Mr. Posada was no longer in the employ of the C.I.A. But records show that he may have notified his former bosses that a bomb was going to be set off on a plane shortly before it happened.

Venezuela and Cuba staged events on Friday, the 30th anniversary of the airplane bombing, where Mr. Bush was condemned for his government's failure to turn over Mr. Posada. A billboard posted outside the United States Interest Section in Havana features the image of Mr. Bush, Mr. Posada and Hitler.

Some of the anger directed at the Bush administration's handling of the case originates closer to home. Roseanne Nenninger Persaud, whose 19-year-old brother, Raymond, was one of the passengers who perished, recently wrote a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales urging him to brand Mr. Posada a terrorist.

"It feels like a double standard," Ms. Nenninger, who was born in Guyana but has since become an American citizen, said in a telephone interview from New York. "He should be treated like bin Laden. If this were a plane full of Americans, it would have been a different story."

A majority of the victims were Cubans, including the entire Olympic fencing team, which was returning from a competition in Venezuela. Guyanese and North Koreans made up most of the other passengers.

"Luis Posada Carriles is a terrorist, but he's our terrorist," said Peter Kornbluh of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, which has been unearthing documents on Mr. Posada's case. "The historical baggage that he brought with him when he sneaked into the U.S. has created this dilemma for the Bush administration."

Getting out of jail has not been a problem for Mr. Posada in the past. In Venezuela, where he was held in the prison bombing, he had associates bribe a guard and he walked out dressed as a priest in 1985. In Panama, where he was implicated in a plot to kill Mr. Castro during a visit there, the departing president pardoned him in 2004.

He appears headed for release again, this time from a nondescript holding center ringed by barbed wire near El Paso's airport.

Mr. Posada's cloak-and-dagger past — his aliases, his fake passports, his life on the run through Latin America — is over, insists his Miami-based lawyer, Eduardo R. Soto.

In fact, even before Mr. Castro fell ill and ceded power to his brother, Mr. Posada declared his campaign to topple the Cuban leader by force to be over.

"The Cuban government is in a very deteriorated condition, inexorably reaching its end, and I sincerely believe that nothing would help to go back to the past with sabotage campaigns," Mr. Posada said.

Mr. Posada's case has eerie parallels with the case of Orlando Bosch, an associate who has also been accused of playing a role in the bombing. The administration of Mr. Bush's father released Mr. Bosch from prison in 1990, a step praised by many in Florida's Cuban community. Now 80, he lives outside Miami.

Mr. Posada is two years younger and in failing health, partly the result of a 1990 assassination attempt against him. His application to become a United States citizen has been rejected by the government, but Mr. Posada, who is a naturalized Venezuelan citizen, is pursuing the matter on appeal.

Mr. Soto says Mr. Posada wants to devote whatever time he has left in life to members of his family who live in South Florida, and to a hobby he picked up years ago in prison — painting.

"Mostly nature scenes," Mr. Soto said. "He's seen a lot of those."

In Caracas, Thousands Support Opposition (AP)

By Elizabeth Nunez, Associated Press Writer

Associated Press, October 8, 2006

Thousands marched Saturday in the biggest show of public support yet for Venezuela's main opposition presidential candidate, who pledged to undo what he called the ills of President Hugo Chavez's government.

Manuel Rosales accused the government of mismanaging the country's oil wealth and ignoring crime. He also played on fears that Chavez's close friendship with Cuban leader Fidel Castro was leading Venezuela down the same path as the communist island.

"They say the Venezuelan people rule — that's a lie," said Rosales, governor of oil-rich, western Zulia state, who faces Chavez in the Dec. 3 election. "(We have) a government that is a puppet of a communist, totalitarian system. ... We have a government that is governing from Cuba."

Venezuelan authorities had promised to have as many as 2,500 officers on the streets to ensure security amid concerns about violence as Rosales' supporters traversed sectors of the capital that are pro-Chavez.

A government helicopter flew overhead and a heavy police presence was on hand, but there were no reports of disturbances.

Caracas' metropolitan police estimated the crowd at about 9,000, but reporters on the scene estimated the turnout was more than 10,000. The crowd packed full a 2-mile avenue.

"I'm marching for a different future, for better education," said Julia Pena, a 50-year-old teacher, who came out to show her support for the opposition for the first time since April 2002, when a short-lived coup toppled Chavez before he returned amid a popular uprising.

Chavez grabbed headlines recently when he called President Bush "the devil" and slammed U.S. leaders for trying to block his country from taking a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Rosales also appeared to rule out the possibility of a boycott against the Dec. 3 presidential election, urging people to vote despite worries about transparency and electronic voting machines. Major opposition parties boycotted congressional elections last year over such concerns.

"We must vote on Dec. 3 and not believe in the threats of the government," he said. "That doesn't help anybody."

Germany Drafts Policy For Europe To Strengthen Russian Ties (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey, International Herald Tribune

DOJ_NMG_0078154

BERLIN, Oct. 7 — The German Foreign Ministry is preparing a new policy toward the east that aims to tighten ties between Russia and Europe, but does not address human rights, a theme dear to Chancellor Angela Merkel.

According to Foreign Ministry officials, the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin, has been informed of the policy and likes it. He will visit Germany on Tuesday for a meeting of the Petersburg Circle, a group established five years ago to promote economic, cultural, social and youth links between Russia and Germany.

The policy is described in an internal paper prepared by the ministry. The subtext is clearly Europe's increasing dependence on Russia to meet its energy needs.

But Mrs. Merkel won support from the German public last year by promising a more critical approach toward Russia, and her advisers say she prefers an approach to the east that takes into account the interests of Poland and the Baltic states, not just Western Europe's ties to Russia.

"The view of the chancellery is that we have to take care of Poland, Ukraine and the immediate neighborhood," said Jörg Himmelreich, a regional expert in the Berlin office of the German Marshall Fund of the United States.

The Foreign Ministry paper advocates the adoption of this policy by the European Union during Germany's six-month presidency of the bloc, which begins Jan. 1.

The gap in the approaches is, at least in part, a reflection of the power-sharing arrangement created after inconclusive elections last September. To create a governing coalition in Parliament, Mrs. Merkel crafted a deal between her Christian Democratic Party and the rival Social Democratic Party in which they split the posts in the 16-member cabinet and she became chancellor.

The Foreign Ministry's paper, titled "The German E.U. Presidency: Russia, European Neighborhood Policy and Central Asia," states that "Russia will play a central role in the German E.U. presidency."

In the ministry's vision, this policy would actively engage Russia and the post-Soviet states to bring them closer to Europe.

The section on Russia highlights the energy ties with Europe that were strengthened by Chancellor Gerhard Schröder, a Social Democrat, from 1998 to 2005.

Mr. Schröder developed a friendship with Mr. Putin. On losing to Mrs. Merkel last year, Mr. Schröder was immediately appointed to head a German-Russian gas consortium dominated by Gazprom, Russia's state-owned monopoly.

Some analysts say the Foreign Ministry's outlined policy is shortsighted, because it does not challenge energy relations.

"Germany is becoming increasingly dependent on Russia for its energy," said Prof. Claudia Kempfert, an energy expert at the German Institute for Economic Research. "This dependence is dangerous, given how Putin is trying to push foreign investors out."

Other experts note that it is uncertain that the policy described in the Foreign Ministry paper would lead to better relations.

"We don't have influence with Russia," said Roland Götz, a Russian expert at the government-financed German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "We cannot integrate Russia into NATO or the E.U., because Russia does not want to be integrated. We have no levers."

Germany's Comeback (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

BERLIN -- Germany's richly deserved 60-year holiday from leadership abroad is ending sooner than many here would like. Since World War II, Germans have become comfortable with standing in the shadows of power while the Americans, the French and others shoulder the costly burden of claiming to run the world.

War-imposed modesty no longer shelters Angela Merkel's coalition government from having to show leadership in defining Europe's new relations with a suddenly assertive Russia, fixing an independent Kosovo's place in the Balkans and perhaps even shaping a broad response by secular societies to the challenges posed by militant Islam.

This is an especially daunting agenda for Merkel's ideologically dissonant coalition. The chancellor's Christian Democrats and and their Social Democrat "partners" have been battling openly in recent months over domestic reforms. As a result, the chancellor's once-high approval rating has dropped like a stone.

But with power vacuums developing on the country's eastern and western borderlands and the United States bogged down in Iraq, Berlin understands that it is condemned to lead. A visitor finds the capital beset with angst -- but also bubbling with ideas -- about the approaching German moment in international affairs.

In January, Germany takes over the rotating presidency of the European Union for six months while also serving as host for next year's Group of Eight summit. Both jobs involve setting agendas for others, organizing joint action plans and putting out unexpected diplomatic brush fires when national interests collide.

Merkel will stand pretty much alone in doing this. A looming leadership change and urgent domestic problems in France render inoperative the French-German duopoly that often runs European affairs. Britain and Italy are disabled as potential leadership partners for similar reasons.

To the east, political turmoil in Poland and Ukraine makes the task of designing an E.U. "neighborhood policy" more difficult and more urgent. And Germany will be in the saddle as negotiations get underway on a 10-year strategic cooperation agreement between the European Union and Russia just as Russia is flexing its muscles toward Georgia, other ex-Soviet states and an energy-needy Europe.

Fortunately, Merkel continues to distance herself from President Vladimir Putin -- or rather from the unhealthily supine relationship with Putin pursued by her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, now employed by Russia's national pipeline company to oversee a deal he blessed while in office.

Merkel returned fuming from a triangular summit last month with Putin and French President Jacques Chirac, suggesting privately that this would be the last such gathering of the three-power group, which originated in opposition to the U.S. invasion of Iraq. Merkel's mood was not helped by Chirac's public announcement that the meeting would be held in the northeastern French town of Compiegne -- the site of Germany's surrender in World War I and of Hitler's infamous victory jig in 1940 -- before he informed Merkel.

In any event, Merkel and Putin are circling each other cautiously as the Russians seek a legally binding new "strategic partnership" with the European Union that would dilute Europe's transatlantic commitments. Merkel instead would like to see a common European-American energy strategy take shape to reduce the political leverage of Russia and other oil and gas producers. That idea has not evoked enthusiasm in Washington yet, but it should.

Moscow also plays hardball with Berlin by demanding that the final status of the former Serbian province of Kosovo be determined through a negotiated settlement with the Serbs.

Official German thinking projects Kosovo moving next year from U.N. administration to declared independence with limited sovereignty. The new state would have no army, and U.N. membership and other diplomatic recognition would be phased in over a decade.

Too timid for the Kosovars and perhaps for the Bush administration, the ideas will nonetheless anger Russia and upset Serb allies in the European Union. The Kremlin is already warning Berlin that Kosovo independence of any kind will bring disaster. It will set a precedent for breakaway factions in Georgia, Moldova and other places where there are "frozen conflicts" to pursue self-determination, with Russian help.

Berlin's new diplomatic activism complements the recent groundbreaking German military deployments abroad that have been the subject of previous columns, and the efforts by Wolfgang Schaeuble, Merkel's highly able interior minister, to counter militant Islam's challenges to European concepts of freedom of speech and equality of the sexes, the subject of a future column here.

For now it is time to welcome the Germans back from the frustrations and joys of living on history's outskirts and to hope that this time their ideas are stronger than their angst.

A Dying Population (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0078156

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

The nation is succumbing to a low birthrate, disease and despair. Leaders see the trend as a security threat.

Welcome to Kstinovo, population one.

Antonina Makarova, 78, spends her days watching news and soap operas in her peeling wooden dacha, the only inhabited structure in two lanes of sagging cottages that once were a village. Her nearest neighbor, 80-year-old Maria Belkova, lives in adjacent Sosnovitsy, population two. But she can't hear anymore, and all in all, Makarova finds the television better company.

"All the houses here were filled with people. There was a cheese factory. But now everyone else has died. God has taken care of them, and he's still making me suffer," Makarova said. "Even the thieves have disappeared."

The Tver region, along the upper reaches of the Volga River 130 miles north of Moscow, is dotted with more than 1,400 villages such as Kstinovo labeled nezhiloye — depopulated. Since 1989, the number of people here has shrunk by about 250,000 to about 1.4 million, with deaths outnumbering births more than 2 to 1.

The Tver region is far from unusual in this country.

Russia is rapidly losing population. Its people are succumbing to one of the world's fastest-growing AIDS epidemics, resurgent tuberculosis, rampant cardiovascular disease, alcohol and drug abuse, smoking, suicide and the lethal effects of unchecked industrial pollution.

In addition, abortions outpaced births last year by more than 100,000. An estimated 10 million Russians of reproductive age are sterile because of botched abortions or poor health. The public healthcare system is collapsing. And many parents in more prosperous urban areas say they can't afford homes large enough for the number of children they'd like to have.

The former Soviet Union, with almost 300 million people, was the world's third-most populous country, behind China and India. Slightly more than half of its citizens lived in Russia. The country has lost the equivalent of a city of 700,000 people every year since the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, only partially offset by an influx of people from other former Soviet republics.

A country that sprawls across one-eighth of the globe is now home to 142 million people.

The losses have been disproportionately male. At the height of its power, the Soviet Union's people lived almost as long as Americans. But now, the average Russian man can expect to live about 59 years, 16 years less than an American man and 14 less than a Russian woman.

Sergei Mironov, chairman of the upper house of Russia's parliament, said last year that if the trend didn't change, the population would fall to 52 million by 2080.

"There will no longer be a great Russia," he said. "It will be torn apart piece by piece, and finally cease to exist."

That may be an overstatement, but there are serious questions about whether Russia will be able to hold on to its lands along the border with China or field an army, let alone a workforce to support the ill and the elderly.

The government, flush with revenue from record prices for the country's oil exports, has started to respond. President Vladimir V. Putin this year pledged payments of $111 a month to mothers who elected to have a second child, plus a nest egg of $9,260 to be used for education, a mortgage or pensions. He also called for renewed efforts to attract ethnic Russians still living in the former Soviet republics.

"Russia has a huge territory, the largest territory in the world," Putin said. "If the situation remains unchanged, there will simply be no one to protect it."

'This Infection in Us'

The economic earthquake of Russia's transition from communism to capitalism plunged tens of millions into poverty overnight and changed the value systems upon which many had planned their lives.

A small minority, mostly in urban centers such as Moscow and St. Petersburg, were able to exploit the absence of rules in the chaotic 1990s to become fabulously wealthy. But such a profound social transition, coming at the end of a century of war, revolution and ruthless social experimentation, condemned a great many more to a deep malaise.

Those who lost out have proved susceptible to drinking, smoking and other habits that killed millions of Russians even in the best of times. In more extreme cases, they kill themselves.

The suicide rate jumped nearly 50% during the 1990s; half a million people killed themselves from 1995 through 2003. Russians fling themselves from balconies, slash their wrists or simply walk out in the snow on a bitter night.

Russia's suicide rate, at about 36 per 100,000 people, is second only to that of Lithuania, according to the Serbsky National Research Center for Social and Forensic Psychiatry. In some remote areas of Russia, the rate exceeds 100 per 100,000.

Nikolai Zavada, a 21-year-old musician who goes by the name Serial Self-Killer, posted a song on http://www.mysuicide.ru , a well-known website that was later shut down because of public pressure:

I'm going out.

And it doesn't matter whether it's up or down.

Or who's holding your hand, an angel or otherwise….

The cold has worn me out.

"People have a lack of hope," Zavada said in an interview. "That all their efforts are in vain. And also, they have a feeling of eternal emptiness."

Russia's transformation from a society that guaranteed employment means that millions of people, especially in the provinces, "have become surplus; they do not have a place in the current economy," said Andrei Demin, president of the Russian Public Health Assn., a nongovernmental advocacy group.

"They do not protest openly. They protest inside," he said. "And the most extreme form of protest is just dying."

Others tried to adapt, and still failed. Birthrates declined, not only because couples such as those elsewhere in Europe elected to have fewer children, but because they couldn't afford to have large families.

Roman Kiptenko, 35, has a family, his health and two university degrees, but his life is turning out far differently than he had imagined. The national parks institute where he worked disintegrated in the Soviet collapse. He now works as a technical director in a friend's advertising company in Moscow. But the firm is small and its future uncertain. His wife was laid off last spring from her job as a dental office manager.

Kiptenko has begun to realize that they might never do better than the $330-a-month apartment — a cramped living room adjoining a tiny kitchen — where they live with their 10-year-old daughter. Kiptenko and his wife sleep on a pullout sofa. Their daughter's bed in the corner seats guests by day, her toys stacked neatly to one side. Clothing is stacked in cupboards next to Kiptenko's computer.

"At first, situations would come up when my wife would talk about wanting another child," he said. "But gradually, she stopped raising those questions."

Alexei Chaika, another Moscow resident, blamed the heart attack he suffered at 27 on stress from his job as a transportation manager for a construction company. Recovering at a clinic in the capital, he said he had worked every day until 11 p.m., and every weekend for months on end, all for a salary of $525 a month.

"At work, the tension is very high, and you have to quarrel with people," he said. "Somebody hits me on the back of my head; I hit someone lower than me; he hits somebody else."

Although the problems are surfacing in the post-Soviet period, some argue that their cause can be found in communism's willful destruction of generations of the country's most capable and adaptable people.

"Seventy-five years of Bolshevik life in this country led to the formation of a tribe of people which was cultivated to listen to orders, and fulfill them," said Alexander Gorelik, a St. Petersburg physician. Stalinism, he said, aimed for "the planned and gradual physical destruction of the most moral, the most creative group of the population."

"There is such a thing as a will for life. And the whole trouble is that the Russian public in general, and especially the male population, has a big deficiency in this area."

Vyacheslav Pushkarev, a Russian Orthodox priest who oversees several congregations in Siberian villages now too small to have a full-time cleric, said the Soviet system destroyed bodies and spirits in equal proportion.

"We are left with this infection in us, this sickness of degradation in everything around us because we were all part of it," he said. "We're living in a huge bowl here, and we're all getting boiled together."

Drowning in Alcohol

Many a Russian village that once might have been the subject of an idyllic painting of ruddy-cheeked peasants leading tired horses through the fields are now part of a twilight world of illness, drunkenness and stunning lethargy.

Moscow has the second-largest concentration of billionaires in the world. But one-fifth of all Russians live on less than $38 a month, many of them in the countryside. The collapse of collective farming and the failure to replace it with viable private agriculture has left thousands of villages in limbo, their residents living on minuscule government stipends, odd jobs, kitchen gardens — and vodka.

There is a long history of alcohol abuse in Russia. Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev tried to tackle the problem 20 years ago by limiting the production and distribution of liquor. Male life expectancy increased three years.

But consumption levels shot back up as soon as the controls were eased. The average Russian drinks five gallons of pure alcohol a year, causing an estimated 900,000 deaths over the last decade from acute alcohol poisoning, fights and accidents, according to figures released by Tatyana Yakovleva, head of the Russian parliament's healthcare committee. Others suffer permanent brain damage or liver damage from homemade alcohol.

"People drink, and they drink a lot, and they drink for a long time, because they can't help but drink," said Yuliya Kovgan, 25, her voice trembling as she struggled to sit without falling over in a potato field on the edge of Ryazanovshchina, a Siberian village northeast of Irkutsk.

She was surrounded by a few dozen seed potatoes, an empty shot glass, a bottle of industrial-grade alcohol and her reeling brother, an unemployed roofer. Standing to the side in an old housecoat was Larisa Berezhnaya, her 53-year-old mother, tapping a grimy foot and affecting a disdainful air; it became apparent that she was drunk too.

"This is our life; we call it normal. We plant potatoes, we dig them out, and that's it," Berezhnaya shrugged. "There's nothing for people here."

A few decades ago, Ryazanovshchina was a collective farm center with thriving livestock operations and about twice its current population. Men would go into the forests to fell timber all summer and the women would celebrate their homecoming with samovars of tea in the street. But without the support of the Soviet state, one by one the farms failed.

Last winter, villagers say, someone burned down a neighbor's hay shed when she wouldn't give a bottle on credit. In a nearby town, a drunk grandmother threw a crying infant out the window of her fifth-floor apartment. Pushkarev, the regional archpriest, confided that the church in nearby Tikhonovka was not functioning because "the priest is on a drunken rampage."

Olga Kolotygina, 36, one of several women who have assumed leadership of the Ryazanovshchina town council, estimates that no more than half a dozen men among the village's 160 people are sober and "trying to improve their lives."

Much more typical is the filthy two-room shack at the end of a street where Lyudmila Borisova, 16, is looking after her three younger siblings. Her mother moved to the next town with her boyfriend, leaving the children behind.

While Borisova earns money by tending cattle in a pasture outside town, her siblings wander the village gathering handouts. They retire each night to a pair of bare mattresses. Borisova says she doesn't blame her mother for leaving, and she'll do the same when she can.

"There's nothing good here," she said.

AIDS Strikes the Young

It has been five years since Svetlana Glukhova was diagnosed as HIV-positive, but she says she still has no idea whether she needs drug therapy. Doctors at the only AIDS center in her city do not have the necessary laboratory equipment to decide that.

She does know that even when she took her first AIDS test, the sores on the fingers she once used to inject heroin already were failing to heal.

The United Nations says Russia has more people infected with HIV than any other country in Europe, due in part to "extraordinarily large numbers of young people who inject drugs."

But the disease has spread widely through the population, and more than half of all new cases result from heterosexual intercourse. Officially, more than 300,000 Russians are infected with HIV or have AIDS, but the U.N. says the number could easily be much higher.

The problem is not as serious as Africa's. The difference, experts say, is that African birthrates are high enough to replace those who die. Not so in Russia.

Compounding the problem, the prevalence of AIDS among young people threatens to add to the population decline by killing them before they can bring a new generation into the world.

Murray Feshbach of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, one of the world's leading experts on Russian health and demographics, said in a study that 80% of Russian AIDS patients are younger than 30. In the West, it's nearly the reverse: 70% are older than 30.

That means 5 million to 10 million Russian teenagers could contract the disease within a few years, federal health officials say. The Russian Military Medical Commission has recorded a twenty-fivefold increase in the number of HIV-positive military conscripts in the last five years, Feshbach said.

"Even optimistically, you're looking at 250,000 deaths a year from AIDS alone in 2020, and pessimistically, we're talking about 650,000 a year," Feshbach said.

Deaths among adults between the ages of 25 and 49 would be particularly devastating, he said.

The Russian government pledged in 1995 to provide free AIDS treatment. But more than a decade later, only about 5,000 people are getting antiretroviral drug therapy.

Putin announced a twentyfold increase in funding this year, providing $120 million for the treatment of perhaps 15,000 AIDS patients.

A coalition of nongovernmental organizations known as the Global Fund is allocating another $120 million to treat as many as 50,000 additional patients through 2010.

But the World Health Organization said in June that shortages in AIDS drugs had developed in several regions, apparently resulting in interruptions in treatment and possibly some deaths.

Akrom A. Eltom, the agency's AIDS program leader in Moscow, said patients who had been coaxed with great difficulty into a healthcare system that strongly stigmatized them might not return, endangering their health and encouraging the development of drug-resistant strains of the disease.

Glukhova said AIDS patients in the city of Tula, the arms manufacturing center 112 miles southwest of Moscow where she lives, would be ostracized if they went public. She said she wouldn't dare talk to Russian news media without covering her face.

"If I uncover my face, I will be eaten alive at the bus stop tomorrow," she said in an interview. "I will lose my job, without any doubt."

Glukhova headed a support network of fellow HIV patients in Tula until international funds ran out in 2004. She said doctors told her they estimated that 1,000 people in Tula — population 600,000 — needed drug therapy for AIDS, but only 10 were getting it — and only partial treatment at that.

"When I asked the doctors in the AIDS center about this therapy, they just shrugged their shoulders. Because when I told them I heard there are three drugs you're supposed to take, they had a notion of what I was talking about, but they don't have access to it. The maximum they can offer you is just one drug," Glukhova said.

Sitting in a dimly lighted cafe that doubles as a dance hall on Saturday nights, Glukhova wiped away tears and said she was watching her friends slowly die.

"One person I know, he was trying to stifle all his pangs by injecting and injecting himself with drugs. He couldn't even get up from his bed anymore, but he continued to call his friends and ask for more drugs," she said.

"When I said to him, 'Let me take you to the hospital, let me try to get something for you,' he waved me away.

"Some people have such moments of despair that they just don't have the guts to struggle for their life anymore."

Outspoken Putin Critic Shot Dead In Moscow (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 7 -- Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian journalist whose byline defined the fading craft of investigative and crusading reporting in President Vladimir Putin's Russia, was fatally gunned down Saturday in the lobby of her apartment building in central Moscow.

Politkovskaya, 48, was renowned for her probes of the brutality of Russia's military campaign in Chechnya as well as the banality of corruption permeating Russian life, from the remote provinces to the bright lights of Moscow.

Born to Soviet diplomats in New York in 1958, Politkovskaya, who also had American citizenship, chronicled nearly every major story in Russia in the past decade. Her reporting often clashed with official versions of such events as the hostage crisis at a theater in Moscow in 2002 and the bloody end of a school siege in Beslan in 2004.

She was a harsh critic of Putin's rule and was working on a story about torture in Chechnya, where a Kremlin-backed strongman has all but routed a separatist movement that sparked two bloody wars, at a cost to Russia that has yet to be measured.

The article was to be published Monday, according to her newspaper, Novaya Gazeta, one of the few independent media outlets in a country where much of the press is timid if not directly controlled by central authorities or regional power brokers.

Former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, who is said by friends to be concerned about the increasing lack of pluralism in the country, became a minority shareholder in the newspaper this summer.

"It is a savage crime against a professional and serious journalist and a courageous woman," Gorbachev told the Russian news agency Interfax. "It is a blow to the entire democratic, independent press. It is a grave crime against the country, against all of us."

The Kremlin issued no immediate comment on the killing.

The attack was the highest-profile killing of a journalist in Russia since July 2004, when Paul Klebnikov, an American editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine, was gunned down outside his office. Twelve journalists have been killed since Putin came to power in 2000, and most of the cases remain unsolved.

Politkovskaya's name carried the kind of weight in Russia that the names Woodward and Hersh carry in the United States. She was unapologetically contrarian and distinguished by her willingness to go to the scene of whatever crisis captured her attention.

During the Moscow theater siege, she entered the building and spoke directly to the hostage-takers. On her way to Beslan to report on the crisis there, she became ill, leading to allegations that she had been poisoned to prevent her from reaching the school, where 331 people later died, most of them children.

"We had different positions on many issues, including issues related to the situation in the North Caucasus, but we always admitted Anna Politkovskaya's amazing fearlessness and inner freedom and her ability to defend her point of view," said Dmitry Rogozin, a member of parliament and former leader of the Motherland party.

Politkovskaya was shot twice, once in the head, at 4:20 p.m. The weapon was thrown at her feet, according to Vitaly Yaroshevsky, deputy editor in chief of her newspaper. He said police had obtained a surveillance tape from a camera on the street. The authorities described the attack as a contract killing, which they said was carried out by a young man dressed in black.

"There is no doubt she was killed for her professional activities," said Igor Yakovenko, general secretary of the Russian Union of Journalists. "She was an absolutely hard-edged person and honest journalist who tackled the toughest subjects."

Politkovskaya's newspaper said it would conduct its own investigation of the killing.

The shooting occurred on Putin's birthday and closely followed the birthday of his anointed leader in Chechnya, Ramzan Kadyrov. Angry journalists here could not let the coincidence pass.

"Apparently, this was a present for the two leaders," Yakovenko said.

"Why do I so dislike Putin?" Politkovskaya had asked in her book, "Putin's Russia." "I dislike him for . . . his cynicism, for his racism, for his lies . . . for the massacre of the innocents which went on throughout his first term as president."

Politkovskaya, the mother of two children, is also the author of "A Dirty War: A Russian Reporter in Chechnya".

In New York, the Committee to Protect Journalists described Politkovskaya's death as a "devastating development for journalism in Russia."

Journalist Critical Of Chechen War Is Shot Dead (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

DOJ_NMG_0078161

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 7 — Anna Politkovskaya, the veteran Russian journalist and author who made her name as a searing critic of the Kremlin and its policies in Chechnya, was found dead on Saturday in her apartment building, shot in the head with a pistol, the authorities and her colleagues said.

Ms. Politkovskaya, 48, was a journalist with few equals in Russia. She was a special correspondent for the Novaya Gazeta newspaper and had become one of the country's most prominent human rights advocates.

In recent years, as the Russian news media faced intensifying pressure under the administration of President Vladimir V. Putin, she maintained her outspoken stance. And she became an international figure who often spoke abroad about a war she called "state versus group terrorism."

She was a strident critic of Mr. Putin, whom she accused of stifling civil society and allowing a climate of official corruption and brutality.

She was found dead by a neighbor shortly after 5 p.m. A Makarov 9-millimeter pistol had been dropped at her side, the signature of a contract killing, Vitaly Yaroshevsky, the deputy editor of Novaya Gazeta, said in a telephone interview.

"We are certain that this is the horrible outcome of her journalistic activity," he said. "No other versions are assumed."

In Washington, the State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the United States "urges the Russian government to conduct an immediate and thorough investigation in order to find, prosecute and bring to justice all those responsible for this heinous murder."

The former Soviet president Mikhail S. Gorbachev, a shareholder of the newspaper where Ms. Politkovskaya worked, called her killing "a savage crime."

"It is a blow to the entire democratic, independent press," he told the Interfax news agency. "It is a grave crime against the country, against all of us."

Accounts about where she died conflicted, with some law enforcement authorities saying she was found inside the entrance of her apartment building and others saying she was in the elevator.

The police said a security video camera had recorded the image of her presumed killer: a tall young man in dark clothes and a black baseball cap. They said a search for him had begun.

Ms. Politkovskaya, who had two adult children, had worked for Novaya Gazeta since 1999, and covered the second Chechen war and the terrorist siege of a Moscow theater in 2002. One of her books, "A Small Corner of Hell: Dispatches from Chechnya," recorded her impressions of the war's unrelenting and often macabre cruelty, and the manifest corruption of many of its participants.

She wrote of torture, mass executions, kidnappings to gain ransom and to eliminate rebel suspects, and the sale by Russian soldiers of Chechen corpses to their families for proper Islamic burial. Her writing cemented her place as one of the war's most vocal domestic critics.

"The army and police, nearly 100,000 strong, wander around Chechnya in a state of complete moral decay," she wrote. "And what response could one expect but more terrorism, and the recruitment of new resistance fighters?"

Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, Russia has been one of the world's more difficult and dangerous countries for journalists. The climate has continued in recent years; at least 12 journalists have been killed in Russia in contract-style murders since 2000, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

None has been solved, including the contract killing in 2004 of Paul Klebnikov, the American editor of Forbes magazine's Russian-language edition.

Ms. Politkovskaya had received death threats in the past, and at least once had left the country fearing for her safety. In 2004 she claimed to have been poisoned while en route on an airplane to cover the public school siege in Beslan; she passed out on the flight but survived. Mr. Yaroshevsky also said that Novaya Gazeta had briefly placed her under protective guard a few years ago.

But as prosecutors opened an investigation into what they called premeditated murder, her colleagues expressed astonishment that she had been killed in such a fashion, saying her public stature had seemed to lend her an aura of invincibility.

"She was doing such risky things for such a long time that it seemed she had transcended the danger," said Tanya Lokshina, chairwoman of Center Demos, a Moscow-based human rights organization. "I am ashamed to say it, but we all felt she was next to a monument, and that she was an icon."

Ms. Lokshina said she had been with Ms. Politkovskaya two weeks ago in Stockholm, and that nothing seemed out of order. "She never spoke about any current threats," she said. "Everything seemed quite normal. She seemed happy and never referred to anything suspicious."

Mr. Yaroshevsky said that Ms. Politkovskaya had been at work on Saturday finishing an article for the Monday paper about torturers in the government of Ramzan A. Kadyrov, the pro-Kremlin premier of Chechnya. He said the story included evidence and pictures.

In an interview in April with The New York Times, Ms. Politkovskaya said she had evidence of torture in Chechnya by Mr. Kadyrov's police and other gunmen, including at least one witness who had been tortured by Mr. Kadyrov himself. Mr. Kadyrov has always vigorously denied such allegations.

Mr. Yaroshevsky said there were no immediate theories about who might be behind her killing, and noted that it might be convenient for an enemy of Mr. Kadyrov to kill Ms. Politkovskaya in order to blacken the Chechen premier's name.

The paper had been expecting her to file the article on Saturday night, he said, and she had apparently been killed after she left her apartment for a trip to a nearby store. The RTR television station reported that investigators believed that she had been followed throughout the day.

Russian Who Reported On Chechnya Killed (AP)

By Maria Danilova, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

A journalist who chronicled Russian military abuses against civilians in Chechnya, garnering awards and accolades from around the world, was found shot to death Saturday in her apartment building. Prosecutors suspect her killing could be connected to her investigative reporting.

Anna Politkovskaya, 48, was found dead in an elevator in the building in central Moscow, police, prosecutors and a colleague said.

Prosecutors have opened a murder investigation, said Svetlana Petrenko, spokeswoman for the Moscow prosecutor's office. Investigators suspect the killing could be linked to her work, Vyacheslav Rosinsky, Moscow's first deputy prosecutor, said on state-run Rossiya television.

Rosinsky said a pistol and bullets were found at the site of the crime. The RIA-Novosti news agency, citing police officials, reported that Politkovskaya was shot twice, the second time in the head.

The ITAR-Tass news agency reported that work was under way on a composite sketch of the attacker based on footage recorded by a security camera at the building. The assailant, believed to have acted alone, wore black.

Politkovskaya, who wrote for the Novaya Gazeta newspaper, chronicled the killings, tortures and beatings of civilians by Russian servicemen in Chechnya in reports that put her on a collision course with the authorities but won her numerous international awards.

"People sometimes pay with their lives for saying out loud what they think. People can even get killed just for giving me information," Reporters Without Borders quoted her as saying at a press freedom conference in Vienna in December.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States was shocked and profoundly saddened by the murder of a journalist who devoted much of her career to "shining a light on human rights abuses and other atrocities of the war in Chechnya" and the plight of Chechen refugees.

"The United States urges the Russian government to conduct an immediate and thorough investigation in order to find, prosecute, and bring to justice all those responsible for this heinous murder," McCormack said in a statement.

Politkovskaya also wrote a book critical of Russian President Vladimir Putin and his military campaign in Chechnya, documenting widespread abuse of civilians by government troops. And she was a persistent critic of Chechnya's Moscow-backed Prime Minister Ramzan Kadyrov, accusing his security forces of kidnapping and torturing civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0078163

In "Putin's Russia," Politkovskaya wrote of more than a million soldiers and officers who have passed through the Chechnya experience.

"Poisoned by a war on their own territory, they have become a serious factor affecting civilian life. They can no longer simply be left out of the social equation," she wrote.

Politkovskaya began reporting on Chechnya in 1999 during Russia's second military campaign there, concentrating less on military engagements than on the human side of the war. She wrote about the Chechen inhabitants of refugee camps and wounded Russian soldiers — until she was banned from visiting the hospitals, said Oleg Panfilov, director of the Moscow-based Center for Journalism in Extreme Situations.

"Whenever the question arose whether there is honest journalism in Russia, almost every time the first name that came to mind was Politkovskaya," he said.

Politkovskaya had frequently received threats, Panfilov said. A few months ago, unknown assailants had tried unsuccessfully to break into a car her daughter, Vera, was driving, he said.

In 2001, she fled to Vienna, Austria, for several months after receiving e-mail threats alleging that a Russian police officer she had accused of committing atrocities against civilians was intent on revenge. The officer, Sergei Lapin, was detained in 2002 but the case against him was closed the following year.

"There are journalists who have this fate hanging over them. I always thought something would happen to Anya, first of all because of Chechnya," Panfilov said, referring to Politkovskaya by her nickname.

In 2004, she fell seriously ill with symptoms of food poisoning after drinking tea on a flight from Moscow to southern Russia during the school hostage crisis in Beslan. Her colleagues suspected the incident was an attempt on her life.

She was one of the few people to enter the Moscow theater where Chechen militants seized hundreds of hostages in October 2002 to try negotiating with the rebels. She later devoted much of her investigative reporting to that crisis, in which 129 victims died, the overwhelming majority succumbing to the gas used by special forces to knock out the hostage-takers.

"Anna was a hero to so many of us, and we'll miss her personally, but we'll also miss the information that she and only she was brave enough and dedicated enough to dig out and make public," said Joel Simon, executive director of the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists.

The 46-nation Council of Europe, a leading human rights watchdog whose executive body is currently led by Russia, called for her death to be investigated quickly and convincingly.

"We have all lost a strong voice of the kind which is indispensable in any genuine democracy," said the council's secretary general, Terry Davis.

Politkovskaya's murder is the highest-profile killing of a journalist in Russia since the July 2004 slaying of Paul Klebnikov, editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine.

Russia has become one of the deadliest countries for journalists. Twenty-three journalists were killed in Russia between 1996 and 2005, many in Chechnya, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. At least 12 have been murdered in contract-style killings since Putin came to power, Simon said.

"None of those have been adequately investigated," he said. "We do know that record creates an environment where those who might seek to carry out this murder would feel that there would be few likely consequences."

The intimidation and murder of 12 journalists in Russia in the past six years, including American citizen Paul Klebnikov on July 9, 2004 is an affront to free and independent media and to democratic values.

In addition to her daughter, Politkovskaya is survived by a son, Ilya, Panfilov said.

During her career, Politkovskaya received more than 10 awards and prizes, including an award for human rights reporting from the London-based Amnesty International; a freedom of speech award from the Paris-based watchdog Reporters Without Borders; and a journalism and democracy award from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Acclaimed Reporter Killed In Russia (LAT)

Anna Politkovskaya, known for writing about human rights abuses in Chechnya, is shot in an apparent assassination.

MOSCOW — A prominent Russian journalist known for reporting of human rights abuses in war-torn Chechnya was shot and killed Saturday in her apartment building in what colleagues and authorities described as an apparent assassination.

Anna Politkovskaya, 48, was shot in the chest as she was getting out of an elevator, then shot in the head, the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported, citing investigative sources. The image of the suspected killer was captured on a surveillance videotape, the agency said.

"We have a feeling, almost an assurance, that it is political murder," said Vitaly Yaroshevsky, deputy editor of Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where she worked. "It was certainly related to her professional activities."

Politkovskaya, known to her friends as Anya, was one in a series of prominent officials and journalists to die violently in post-Soviet Russia, and her slaying sent a chill through Russia's community of pro-democracy and human rights activists.

Last month, gunmen shot and killed a senior central banker, Andrei Kozlov, who had been involved in shutting down banks suspected of money laundering. American journalist Paul Klebnikov, editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine, was gunned down near his office in 2004.

Politkovskaya, a mother of two, was considered one of the toughest critics of Russian President Vladimir V. Putin and of pro-Moscow Chechen Prime Minister Ramzan Kadyrov. One of her areas of expertise was documenting mistreatment of ordinary Chechens by Russian troops or forces loyal to Kadyrov.

Yaroshevsky said Politkovskaya had been working on an article about torture in Chechnya that was due to run in Monday's paper.

"As far as I know she was planning to write about Kadyrov people who torture people in order to get confessions from them for anti-government activities," Yaroshevsky said. "I don't know whether she managed to complete her story. But if she did, or there are some drafts left, we will certainly publish it. We know that she had testimonies from those who were tortured, and photos of them."

Former Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, who recently purchased a major interest in Novaya Gazeta, described Politkovskaya's killing as "a savage crime against a professional and serious journalist and a courageous woman."

"It is a grave crime against the country, against all of us," Gorbachev told the Russian news agency Interfax.

The killing of Politkovskaya led to speculation that it was ordered by someone loyal to Kadyrov or Putin who wanted to eliminate an influential critic. But Yaroshevsky said he didn't think the Kremlin was involved.

"If we were to think that, it would mean that we live in a country of cannibals," he said.

Gorbachev said he thought the killing was ordered by someone "who wants to cast a shadow both on the leadership of the country" and on the "positive" developments taking place in Chechnya, where separatist rebels appear to have been greatly weakened and Kadyrov has reimposed a semblance of order.

Politkovskaya had an exceptionally high international profile for a Russian journalist. She was frequently quoted as an analyst by Western media, and she received more than 10 awards and prizes in her career from groups such as Amnesty International, Reporters Without Borders and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

In a 2002 opinion piece for the Los Angeles Times, Politkovskaya chided the West for its faith in Putin.

"Today's regime in Russia, as personified first and foremost by Putin, is interested only in power — to keep it, consolidate and augment it, and do it in such a way that opponents would not even be able to raise their heads," she wrote.

Politkovskaya was scheduled to be in Los Angeles to receive a Courage in Journalism Award from the International Women in Media Foundation in Beverly Hills on Oct. 24, 2002, but instead returned to Moscow in an effort to help resolve the takeover of a theater by Chechen militants. She was one of the few people to enter the theater and attempt to negotiate with the hostage-holding rebels, but the effort failed and authorities eventually stormed the theater. At least 129 hostages and all the rebels died.

After another hostage crisis in 2004, the seizure of a school in Beslan, Politkovskaya became seriously ill on a flight to the region and was hospitalized.

She and her doctors suspected poisoning, but it was never proved.

"I always had a list of journalists whose lives I am scared for," said Oleg Panfilov, director of the Moscow-based Center for Journalism in Extreme Situations. "Anya was first on my list."

DOJ_NMG_0078165

Alexei Venediktov, editor in chief of Echo of Moscow radio, one of the few broadcasting outlets still pursuing Western-style journalism in Russia, said that after word of Politkovskaya's death spread, some of his friends urged him to start using bodyguards.

"I think that this murder may contain a signal for all of us, but this signal is secondary," he said. "The first and primary target was Anna herself, as a journalist."

Lyudmila Alexeyeva, a former Soviet-era dissident who heads the Moscow Helsinki Group human rights organization, said she was sure the attack on Politkovskaya was "a purely political murder."

"As for me personally," she said, "I am not scared because I will turn 80 next year, so what can I be scared of?"

Murder In Moscow (WP)

The Putin era of brutality claims a victim of rare courage.

ANNA POLITKOVSKAYA, who was murdered in her apartment building yesterday, knew it was dangerous to be an honest reporter in President Vladimir Putin's Russia. Yet, as he wielded a combination of blandishments and bullying to gradually reimpose authoritarianism on his country, Ms. Politkovskaya, 48 and the mother of two, never yielded. Whether reporting on Mr. Putin's dirty war in the separatist region of Chechnya or on the diminution of freedom at home in Moscow, she remained, if not unafraid, unbowed.

Chances are Ms. Politkovskaya's murderer will never be officially identified. At least a dozen other journalists have been murdered in contract-style killings in the past six years, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists, and not one of those murders has been solved. Human rights advocates and pro-democracy politicians have been struck down in the same way.

Yet it is quite possible, without performing any detective work, to say what is ultimately responsible for these deaths: It is the climate of brutality that has flourished under Mr. Putin. A former KGB agent himself, he inherited an imperfect democracy and systematically undermined its institutions. The media, political parties, local government, private business -- each in turn was neutered. Loyalty to Mr. Putin has become the quality that matters most, and any opponent is labeled an enemy, to be bankrupted, imprisoned or worse. Meanwhile, ugly nationalism was permitted to flourish.

Now you can see these same values being applied to foreign policy. The independent nation of Georgia, to Russia's south, has not displayed adequate fealty in Mr. Putin's view; it wants to be a democracy, with normal ties to the West. So the czar has launched an ugly campaign of threats against the country and the hundreds of thousands of ethnic Georgians who live in Russia. It is a dangerous moment.

Through all this, the Bush administration has responded with timid complaints bracketed, until recently, by absurd protestations that Russia was moving, overall, in the right direction. France and Germany, dependent on Russian natural gas, have bowed even more cravenly. Against these studies in amoral pragmatism, the courage of small nations, such as Georgia, and lone heroes, such as Anna Politkovskaya, shines all the more luminously.

"Taking a risk comes with the job," she said in 2002, as she accepted an award for courage from the International Women's Media Foundation. "And if you cannot take it any more, if you are unwilling to risk, you have to leave.

"As for myself," she concluded four years ago, "I am not tired yet."

Our Failure In Europe's East (WP)

By Bruce P. Jackson

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

At Warsaw University in 2002, in what many believe to be his finest speech, President Bush advanced a vision of a free and complete Europe that would stretch "from the Baltic to the Black Sea." At the end of next month, when they gather in Riga, Latvia, on the shores of the Baltic Sea, Bush and the NATO allies will have cause to wonder what happened to their hopes for Europe's East.

At the most superficial level, things never go well in Europe when the United States is preoccupied elsewhere. This was true in 1956 during the Suez crisis, when the Soviet Union invaded Hungary, and again in 1968, when the Vietnam War drowned out interest in the suppression of the Prague spring. Given NATO's difficulties in Afghanistan and the bloody frustration of the United States in Iraq, it is not surprising to see Russia bullying its way around its former empire and threatening energy-dependent Europe.

But the newly powerful Kremlin, flush with oil money, is not the real problem of Europe's East. Even truculent Turkey, which now seems lost in a strange haze of anti-Americanism, anti-Semitism and vaguely Islamist nativism, is not the problem. Turkey has been the "sick man" of Europe for at least a century, and Russia has been a threat to its neighbors far longer. What has changed is that Europe has finally reached the frontiers of its influence and has no idea what to do with its new neighborhood.

To the south of Vienna lie Croatia, Macedonia, Serbia, Montenegro, Bosnia, Albania and Kosovo, which have been waiting on Europe's doorstep since the wars of Yugoslav succession ended in 1999. This year at the NATO summit the top three candidates, Albania, Croatia and Macedonia, can only hope for an honorable mention on the back pages of the summit communique.

The rest of the Western Balkans has even less interaction with Europe. Over 70 percent of university students in Serbia have never set foot outside their country. This may not be surprising to Americans, but it is shocking on a continent as interconnected as Europe. Albanian students have given up trying to get visas to visit Italy and now spend their vacations in Libya.

Comparatively, however, the Western Balkans are the most fortunate of the countries in Europe's East. In December, when Romania enters the European Union, Europe will border Moldova, whose gross domestic product is roughly half of Haiti's. Moldova's wine, by far its most important product, is embargoed both by Russia, because of Moldova's deviationist pro-Western tendencies, and by the European Union, because of the high quality and low cost of the wine itself. In a triumph of enlightened E.U. policy and in keeping with the law of unintended consequences, Moldova's largest cash export to Europe today is sexually trafficked women.

Like Moldova and the western Balkans, Ukraine also suffers from the tendency of both Washington and Brussels to isolate what they do not understand. Since the early 1990s the United States has pursued a manic-depressive policy toward the largest country in Eastern Europe -- and for that matter toward the country with the largest Jewish population remaining in Europe.

At first, in the infamous "Chicken Kiev" speech, delivered by President George H.W. Bush in 1991, we advised Ukraine to remain part of the Soviet Union. We then celebrated Ukraine's independence and its common-sense president, Leonid Kuchma -- until we decided that Kuchma was an autocrat who sold radars illegally to Saddam Hussein. It turns out that this did not happen, but you get the point. The same unpredictable volatility characterizes the ups and downs of our response to the coalition government in Kiev today. Seventeen years after the fall of the Berlin Wall, the United States and Europe cannot maintain a consistent policy toward Ukraine from one day to the next.

What confounds both Europe and the United States are the complexity of post-Soviet societies and the impotence of Western institutions. But instead of combining our efforts with those of the European Union to end the isolation of Europe's East, we have allowed the fecklessness of the European Union and the impatience of U.S. policy to re-create what the Soviet Union used to call its "near abroad." In effect, a vacuum of crime, underdevelopment and squabbling political elites now stretches from the Baltic states to the northern shore of the Black Sea. This is the sad Marshall Plan of our generation.

The problem of Europe's East is simply the loss of political vision in Washington and Brussels and the failure to keep the commitment to a Europe that is whole, free and at peace. One wonders: If this is the best Europe can do in its neighborhood and the best the United States can do together with Europe, what chances do we have in the Greater Middle East, where our ideas and influence count for far less than they do in Europe's unloved East?

In A Long-Ago Revolution, Echoes For Today (NYT)

By Roger Cohen

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

FUNNY with history, how remote it can seem, and how close, even in teeming Times Square, scarcely an oasis of retrospection. Charles Legendy recalled being there the other day when his gaze turned to a black-and-white billboard of a tank emblazoned with the words “1956 Hungary” and, beneath that, “Our Revolution Was Not a Movie.”

DOJ_NMG_0078167

His wife, Annemarie, also looked up, and the elegant young man on the left of the tank in a European city rising in revolutionary ire against the Soviet empire caught her eye. She knew him, she felt, with a certain intimacy. "Charlie," she said, grabbing her husband and pointing at the photograph, "that's you!"

A half-century can concertina in a moment, eliding exile and a whole American life, and leaving a 69-year-old New Yorker, Mr. Legendy, back in the Budapest of his youth, on the eve of the Hungarian uprising of Oct. 23, 1956, living once again "that electric atmosphere, that absolute exhilaration."

Mr. Legendy's disorientation — he said it took him some time to accept that he was indeed captured in an image he'd never previously seen — is in some measure also every American's at this 50th anniversary. The Hungarian events are far away, but are they? Once again, in Middle Eastern guise, the United States confronts issues of containment or rollback, of moral principle or pragmatic caution, of liberty or stability.

"The same quandaries are posed, most fundamentally the question of how America can behave responsibly and whether it may be more tragic to engage in war against tyranny or refrain from it," said Paul Berman, an author who has written widely on European political history.

President Bush, who chose to tear down the status quo in Iraq and unleash violent instability in the name of liberty, has not hesitated to draw a straight line from Budapest to Baghdad.

He has compared the Iraqi government's pursuit of democracy to that of the patriots of 1956 and told Hungarians: "We've learned from your example, and we resolve that when people stand up for their freedom, America will stand with them."

That has a ring to it and the stamp of post-cold-war, neoconservative certainty. But the Eisenhower administration had also vowed to roll back Communism from Eastern Europe. Nonetheless, when Hungary rose, it was left to a bleak fate beneath the Soviet yoke. Liberty was set aside in favor of circumventing World War III.

Worse, America misled the freedom fighters. Radio Free Europe, Washington's mouthpiece, egged on the uprising, declaring on Nov. 4, 1956, that a "practical manifestation of Western sympathy is expected at any hour." At the same time, it disparaged the revolution's leader and martyr, Imre Nagy, as a compromised Communist.

A less felicitous mixture of misleading near-promises and maximal demands from an American knight-turned-bystander is hard to imagine. That rankles still, as all blots do on the idealism inextricable from the freedom-bearing narrative of American foreign policy.

"You can't incite people and then do nothing to help them," said Max Boot, a conservative commentator at the Council on Foreign Relations. "The closest parallel is what happened in 1991, when we told the Kurds and Shia of Iraq to rise up and abandoned them. That was really inexcusable, even more so than in 1956, when there were not really military options short of starting a world war."

Or were there? History happens, but only just. Few events are as tantalizing as the Hungarian uprising, whose initial few days saw Soviet hesitation and a growing belief that Nagy, the prime minister, could engineer some form of pluralist democracy — Titoism-plus — even within the Communist orbit. Might the exercise of militant American principle over pliancy have ushered Hungary toward the neutrality achieved by Austria in 1955?

The hypothetical has little value: what happened, happened. Thousands died; Hungary waited another 43 years to be free. But we now know from the Soviet archives that as late as Oct. 30, 1956, a week into the revolution, Nikita Khrushchev was still talking of "a military path," that of "occupation," or "a peaceful path" — "the withdrawal of troops, negotiation."

The die, it seems, was not altogether cast from the outset. Certainly that was the impression on the street, where Mr. Legendy, then a student at Budapest's technical university, recalled: "It seemed we could change the system. Russian troops were ordered to put down the uprising, but were inefficient, hesitant. We were almost sure America would intervene. After all, we were being attacked for being pro-American, and Radio Free Europe was encouraging us to end the regime."

But the United States was not ready to challenge the division of Europe between free and totalitarian spheres; and Britain and France were embroiled in the simultaneous Suez crisis, a Western attempt to reassert empire in the Middle East that proved less successful than Khrushchev's ultimate decision to impose Communist imperialism through force of arms.

No wonder Eisenhower expressed unease, in a discussion with his secretary of state, John Foster Dulles, at feelings that "we have excited Hungarians for all these years," and are "now turning our backs on them when they are in a jam." To which

Dulles, according to a memorandum of the conversation on Nov. 9, 1956, responded that "we always have been against violent rebellion."

So goes history — and myriad human lives — floating on the whims and hesitations and little hypocrisies of the powerful. But Hungarian bloodshed and loss were not without catalytic effects.

The revolution jolted the West European left into the beginning of a rethinking of Communism, long an affair of the heart. "Hungary signaled to the West that it was not true that the masses supported Communism," Mr. Berman said.

It also carried Hungarians, on the wrong side of two world wars and Europe's division, to a rediscovered pride. Arthur Koestler is quoted in Kati Marton's "Great Escape," a new book on Budapest's loss of its Jewish intelligentsia, as saying that, "To be Hungarian is a collective neurosis." That state was eased by an uprising that became a collective point of reference in the nation's journey toward NATO and the European Union.

Finally, and perhaps most important, Hungary became an example for the Czechs, the Poles and others in the web of dissent and defiance that would lead to the fall of the Berlin Wall.

An optimist, and someone prepared to take the long view, might look to all these developments — a catalyzed region, a changed Western view of the acceptability of a totalitarian ideology, rediscovered national pride — and argue that the Iraqi invasion, for all its own terrible human cost, has also set in motion a cycle that will prove to be a liberating one.

Mr. Legendy, who fled Budapest in November 1956 and later studied at Princeton University, supports the invasion strongly, although he's a Democrat and believes grave mistakes have been made. "Because of my experience of Hungary, I feel very strongly about Iraq," he said. "The Baathists and the Communists are so close, first cousins. The cause of liberty is a great one."

His 23-year-old son, Gabriel, also a Princeton graduate and now a second lieutenant with the United States Army, is in Baghdad. Almost a month ago, on Sept. 11, Lt. Gabriel Legendy sent his parents a letter from Iraq saying he felt melancholy as he recalled the attack on America. "That day and my thoughts and feelings on it are such a benchmark in my life," he wrote. "Maybe this letter is my way of observing a moment of silence."

So a line of sorts does run from Budapest to Baghdad, from a Hungarian student in revolt against Communism a half-century ago to his son, a young American officer trying to fashion a free Iraq. But how best to craft liberty?

A realist might conclude from the events of 1956 and what followed, as well as from today's Iraqi mayhem, that totalitarianism must be tackled not by frontal assault, but by fostering resistance within — through a Polish pope, say, or the anti-Soviet, American-financed mujahedeen of Afghanistan of the 1980's.

Through subtlety, that is, and long-term probing, and knowledge and effective agents of influence — all apparently absent in the Iraq whose freedom the Bush administration likes to trumpet.

But perhaps there is a third view, and that is simply of history as tragedy, a process where sometimes no options, whether transformational or incremental, are good, and events may be as arbitrary as Mr. Legendy's extraordinary sighting of himself in Times Square.

The billboard was put up at a cost of $100,000 by the Hungarian Cultural Center, whose director, Laszlo Jakab Orsos, said: "What happened to Mr. Legendy illustrates the nature of history, which is no more than a chain of stories and lives, all interwoven, often in the most unexpected ways."

Latvia's Coalition Government Leads (AP)

By Gary Peach, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

The governing coalition in the former Soviet republic of Latvia was poised to retain power in Saturday's parliamentary election, nearly complete results showed.

With 89 percent of votes counted, Prime Minister Aigars Kalvitis' center-right coalition of three parties had 45 percent, the electoral commission said. The results give the coalition far more support in parliament than the main opposition New Era party which has no partners and cannot form a government.

If the results hold up, it would be the first time since Latvia regained independence in 1991 from the crumbling Soviet Union that a sitting government survived an election.

New Era and the People's Party are both right-wing parties but have historically been at odds, and earlier this year New Era dropped out of the coalition government. Both parties are pro-European Union and favor eventual adoption of the euro currency.

With few hot issues in the campaign, the main question was which of the similar right-wing parties would be given a mandate to lead the traditionally shaky coalition government. Latvia has had 12 governments in 15 years of independence.

Gaining admission to the EU and NATO were the dominant goals after winning independence. With that achieved, a sense of complacency set in, analysts said. Latvia will host a NATO summit next month, seen as a way to cement the country's place in the international arena.

"I voted for the People's Party because I like Kalvitis and the way he's brought stability to the government," said Aija, 56, who refused to give her last name.

The electoral commission said voter turnout was 62.3 percent, 10 percentage points lower than in the last election in 2002.

President Vaira Vike-Freiberga urged voters to go to the polls as she cast her ballot in the capital, Riga.

"If a citizen does not make his choice now, someone else will make the choice for him," she said, according to the Baltic News Service.

Although the Baltic country remains among the poorest in the European Union, its economy was the fastest-growing in the bloc in 2005 when gross domestic product soared 10.2 percent.

In all, 19 political parties, consisting of 1,024 candidates competed in the race to fill the 100-member Saeima, or parliament.

The Toughest Job On Earth (WP)

By Edward C. Luck

It's not easy being the U.N. secretary general. The men who've held the post like to call it the most impossible job on Earth. Its duties are largely undefined, and the whole world claims the right to weigh in on how the job should be done. Some clamor for a crusading international leader, on the model of current Secretary Kofi Annan, others for a low-key administrator who'll stay out of the limelight and just make sure the organization runs smoothly.

So when the contest for the eighth secretary general opened earlier this year, it was widely expected to result in prolonged bickering. Some feared that the recent anti-American rants by Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad before the General Assembly would sour the Security Council's deliberations on the candidates. Meanwhile, editorialists the world over pleaded for the appointment of a political rock star -- an amalgam of Bill Clinton, Mother Teresa and Bono -- who could command headlines and rally supporters.

The Security Council had other ideas. Tomorrow, it is expected to nominate -- unanimously -- Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's minister of foreign affairs and trade. If tradition holds, the 192-member General Assembly will vote within a week or two, without debate or dissension, to complete the appointment (in an arcane rubber-stamping process -- see securitycouncilreport.org).

In selecting Ban, the council chose competence over charisma, performance over promise. Ban proved his diplomatic mettle in the on-and-off six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear ambitions (something he may now have to delegate to envoys from other parts of the world). His campaign received a decisive boost from the fact that three permanent Security Council members -- China, Russia and the United States -- plus the most influential non-permanent member, Japan, were his partners in those critical negotiations.

In 1945, the founders decreed that the council should nominate the secretary general to ensure that he (and someday she) has the confidence of the major powers, which is hard to earn and even harder to sustain. Whenever a secretary general has clashed openly with one of the great powers -- Trygve Lie and Dag Hammarskjold with Moscow in the 1950s and early '60s and Boutros Boutros-Ghali with Washington in the 1990s -- the organization and its efforts to build bridges between rivals have suffered. And as Annan's tenure has confirmed, the pressures to pose as a secular pope rallying the world against U.S. domination are incessant these days, particularly with a United-States-vs.-the-rest mentality already so prevalent at the United Nations.

The popular image of an outspoken world leader, morally and intellectually above the fray of crass and narrow interstate politics, doesn't reflect the gritty realities of the job. Secretaries general are most effective when they are quietly defusing regional crises and cajoling member states behind the scenes to modernize the United Nations' creaky and sometimes corrupt machinery. Unless Ban is considered an honest broker by all sides of the mistrustful, divided membership, he will have little chance of moving the stalled U.N. reform agenda forward. The less ego and identification with past political glories, the better. For a rookie secretary general, quiet modesty in public and candor in private have their virtues.

Truth be told, the council has never tapped an orator or media star to be secretary general. Hammarskjold and Annan grew into their public personalities while in office, and Ban could do the same. But Lie, U Thant, Kurt Waldheim, Javier PÃ©rez de CuÃ©llar and Boutros-Ghali never mastered that side of the job.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton called earlier this year for "a proletarian" secretary general, who would stick to improving internal management and be little more than the chief administrative officer mentioned in the U.N. Charter. But that is far too narrow a job description. Leading a diverse secretariat and dealing with a 192-member board of directors demands keen political instincts, as well as tough, fair and open management. Paul A. Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee report on the oil-for-food scandal at www.iic-offp.org provides a chilling look at what can happen when no one is accountable at the top and member states and secretariat leaders prove equally adept at finger-pointing. But the committee also underlined that the secretary general serves as the United Nations' "chief political and diplomatic officer" and that "in unsettled times, those responsibilities tend to be all-consuming."

World-class proletarian diplomats, not to mention proletarian managers (an oxymoron if ever there was one), are in short supply.

No doubt, as former undersecretary general Brian Urquhart asserts in "The Next Secretary-General: How to Fill a Job With No Description," in the current issue of the journal Foreign Affairs, "history has shown that a great secretary-general not only is important for the U.N. but also is a priceless asset for the world at large." Having served every secretary general since 1946, he should know. His classic 1972 biography, "Hammarskjold," depicts the office's lows as well as its highs. There are times when the secretary general is called upon to scramble around the world, breathlessly trying to resolve brutal crises, as journalist William Shawcross described in his 2000 book, "Deliver Us from Evil: Peacekeepers, Warlords and a World of Endless Conflict." At other points, however, the mediating capacity of the office is underemployed by the powers of the day, leaving the secretary general to wait for some juicy assignment, a bit like the passive hero Chauncey Gardener in the movie "Being There."

Two memoirs by past holders of the office tell us more about their authors than intended. PÃ©rez de CuÃ©llar's 1997 "Pilgrimage for Peace: A Secretary-General's Memoir" is solid, dependable -- and dull. In contrast, Boutros-Ghali's "Unvanquished: A U.S.-U.N. Saga" from 1999 is as lively as it is tendentious and self-serving. Annan's roller-coaster ride as secretary general, which will end on Dec. 31, has spurred a record batch of biographies and commentaries. Two upcoming journalistic accounts look especially promising: James Traub's "The Best Intentions: Kofi Annan and the UN in the Era of American Power," out this month, and Stanley Meisler's "Kofi Annan: A Man of Peace in a World of War," to be released in December.

Those who want to dig deeper into the role will have to wait for Simon Chesterman's "Secretary or General?: The UN Secretary-General in World Politics," which will be published next spring.

After all that, if you still find the United Nations and its top post to be enigmas, you're on the right track.

Edward C. Luck is a professor at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs and the author, most recently, of "UN Security Council: Practice and Promise" (Routledge). He has consulted for several secretaries general.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Abizaid Lauds Pakistan In Terror Fight (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0078173

By Munir Ahmad
AP, October 8, 2006

The commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East praised Pakistan's intelligence service on Saturday for its fight against terrorism.

Gen. John Abizaid, who met with President Gen. Pervez Musharraf on Saturday, made the comments in talks with Musharraf at his office in Rawalpindi, near the capital Islamabad, a government statement said.

"(Abizaid) particularly lauded the role of Pakistan's intelligence agencies in the anti-terror campaign, and said their cooperation was crucial in thwarting plots and apprehending most-wanted terrorists," it said.

Indian police a week ago alleged that Pakistan's secret service — the Directorate of Inter Services Intelligence, or ISI — was behind a series of bombings that hit Mumbai trains in July, killing more than 200 people.

Pakistan immediately denied the claims and demanded evidence.

The Indian allegation came days after the British Broadcasting Corp. reported that a document prepared for Britain's Defense Ministry accused ISI of indirectly supporting terrorist groups, including al-Qaida.

Musharraf rejected the documents, while Britain's Ministry of Defense also clarified that the leaked document was academic research and did not represent the British government's view.

On Saturday, Musharraf reiterated Pakistan's commitment to combating terrorism, and called for close cooperation in intelligence sharing. Musharraf and Abizaid also discussed the ongoing cooperation between both countries' armed forces.

Pakistan is a key ally of the United States in its fight against international terrorism.

Abizaid often visits Islamabad to ensure coordination between Pakistan and U.S.-led forces that have operated in neighboring Afghanistan since late 2001 when the Taliban regime was ousted for sheltering al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

On Friday, two American senators visited the Afghan capital, Kabul, and asked Pakistan to do more to stem the infiltration of insurgents into Afghanistan. Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., and Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., spent a few days in Afghanistan during a regional tour that included a stop in Pakistan.

Pakistan has said it is doing its best to curb militancy and secure its border with Afghanistan.

48 Suspected Taliban Fighters Arrested (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Police acting on a tip raided several militant hide-outs in Quetta and arrested 48 suspected Taliban fighters who had arrived in small groups from Afghanistan, said Wazir Khan Nasar, the city's police chief.

However, no important Taliban figures were among the detainees, he said.

The suspects were being questioned to determine why they were in Pakistan.

Pakistan was once a main supporter of Afghanistan's Taliban regime but switched sides after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Orange County Man Rises In Al Qaeda Ranks (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian And H.g. Reza
The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

'Azzam the American,' or Adam Gadahn, has moved from translator to propagandist.

Two years ago, no one knew quite what to make of Adam Gadahn.

While many in the U.S. intelligence community saw the angry Muslim convert from Orange County as dangerous, plenty of counterterrorism officials viewed the pudgy 25-year-old as a bit player on the world stage of jihadists.

No longer.

Though the young man who has appeared on four Al Qaeda videotapes and now calls himself Azzam the American is still not deemed part of Al Qaeda's operational command, recent interviews with counterterrorism officials suggest that Gadahn has gone from a valuable translator to an invaluable propagandist for the international terrorist network.

"It is not some masked guy with a rifle saying, 'Death to America,' " one senior U.S. law enforcement official said. "It is an American. And his target audience is the U.S."

Gadahn's newfound stature is underscored by a sealed federal indictment in Los Angeles that, law enforcement sources say, will charge him with supporting terrorism. It also comes as new details are surfacing about his time in Orange County and connections to extremists.

The new attention to Gadahn reflects his ascent in one of the world's most impenetrable terrorist groups. Indeed, although a handful of Americans have been convicted or still face charges of conspiring as terrorists, none has had a more astounding trajectory into Al Qaeda's inner circle than Gadahn.

From journeying to Pakistan to meeting with Osama bin Laden and later self-proclaimed Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, Gadahn quickly established himself as an American entrusted by Al Qaeda's leadership, counterterrorism officials say. Two of the four videotapes in which he has appeared also featured Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman Al-Zawahiri.

"Increasingly, the stature of his statements shows that he not only has credibility as an information operative for Al Qaeda … but if you look at it through the lens of Al Qaeda spreading its message, then he is absolutely an instrumental player," said another counterterrorism official who has watched Gadahn's ascent for years.

"I mean, he is now making statements with Al-Zawahiri, who is the No. 2 and the tactician. And [Gadahn] is right there with him at critical periods of time," said the official, who like others in government spoke on condition of anonymity because of the anticipated criminal case against Gadahn.

The grandson of a Jewish doctor, the young man was raised as Adam Pearlman on a goat farm in the hills of southwestern Riverside County by parents who had eclectic religious tastes and shunned the modern world.

At 14, his spiritual journey took him to the Islamic Center of Orange County, where he fell under the influence of two radical Muslims, Khalil Deek and Hisham Diab, both naturalized U.S. citizens.

Diab, an Egyptian, owned an accounting business, and Deek, a Palestinian, repaired computers. They lived in upstairs apartments across from each other in a complex near Little Gaza, a stretch of Arab-owned shops, restaurants and other businesses on Brookhurst Street in Anaheim.

"Deek and Diab met him at the mosque and [Diab] brought him home like a lost dog," said Saraah Olson, who was married to Diab at the time but divorced him in 1996. "He was hungry and [Diab] asked me to give him something to eat. That's how it began, innocently enough. Then they begin teaching the kid their version of Islam."

Haitham "Danny" Bundakji, president of the Islamic Society of Orange County, said Diab and Gadahn had extremist views that caused him to bar them from the mosque. "They believed that Muslims like me who reached out to Christians and Jews are infidels. They had a warped interpretation of Islam," Bundakji said.

Friends and family members said Diab and Deek were followers of radical cleric Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, the so-called blind sheikh who is now serving a life sentence in federal prison for his role in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

Diab and Deek hosted Abdel Rahman in their apartments during his lecture tours of Orange County mosques in 1992 and 1993. Olson said she cooked dinner for the Egyptian sheikh. A relative of Deek, who asked not to be identified, said Abdel Rahman stayed in Deek's apartment for two days during one visit.

Olson said Gadahn never met the radical cleric, but she said he too was a follower. According to Olson, Abdel Rahman would call Diab and others in Orange County from prison on Sunday afternoon to deliver fiery sermons that were recorded.

In 1995, the year Gadahn converted to Islam, Diab formed Charity Without Borders, which according to state records was founded to "provide an education and humanitarian aid to poor and needy people in USA and in other countries."

The nonprofit's records list Diab as its chief financial officer. In April 1999, Gadahn was added as the charity's secretary. His name is spelled "Gaden" on the form, which also has a phony Santa Ana address for him.

Olson said the $150,000 raised by Charity Without Borders was sent to extremist groups in the Middle East. Deek's relative said he wrote a proposal for the charity that led to one $50,000 grant from the state of California, which he said was supposed to be used for an oil recycling awareness program directed at minority communities.

Two weeks after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, California's Department of Justice shut down Charity Without Borders and began an investigation.

U.S. terrorism officials believe that Deek and Gadahn traveled separately to Pakistan in 1998. According to the 9/11 Commission report, by early 1999 Deek was living in Peshawar, Pakistan.

The commission report also said Deek was a close associate in Pakistan of Abu Zubeida, now held at the military's Guantanamo Bay detention facility and identified by the CIA as a senior aide to Osama bin Laden.

Deek's relative who spoke to The Times said Jordanian officials told the family that Deek had a joint bank account with Zubeida in Peshawar.

The senior U.S. law enforcement official said it was Deek who sent Gadahn to Pakistan, where he meet Zubeida. From there, the official said, Gadahn found his way into Al Qaeda's training camps and, ultimately, introductions to its Al Qaeda's leadership.

"Bin Laden was particularly interested in meeting American converts," the official said.

In December 1999, Deek was extradited to Jordan, where he was charged with involvement in the millennium plot to bomb tourist hotels in that country.

Two years later, the charges against him were dropped. He returned to Pakistan in May 2001, the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0078175

That same year, Diab left the U.S., according to Olson, his ex-wife, and hasn't been heard from since.

Three years later, in May 2004, the Justice Department and FBI first identified Gadahn as an alleged extremist and Al Qaeda member. Then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft said he was an associate of Zubeida.

Brian Jenkins, a terrorism expert at the Rand Corp., said that although Gadahn has clearly become a "key communicator" for Al Qaeda in the two years since, his effectiveness in reaching and radicalizing other Westerners remains to be seen.

"There is no question he is an articulate communicator," said Jenkins. "The question is whether there is a significant audience for that significant message."

The first Gadahn videotape surfaced in October 2004, months after Ashcroft revealed his Al Qaeda affiliation. At the time, U.S. officials didn't even know for sure that he was the menacing, masked figure making threats against the U.S., although the CIA said he was the most likely suspect.

In that hourlong tape, released just before the U.S. presidential election, a young man hidden behind a head scarf identified himself as "Azzam the American" and said American "streets will run with blood."

Gadahn appeared in another video in September 2005, on the eve of the anniversary of the 9/11 attacks.

In that tape, he invoked the name of the most infamous Sept. 11 attacker, Mohammed Atta, and warned of new attacks in the U.S. and Australia.

"Yesterday, London and Madrid," he said, referring to two cities then recently bombed by terrorists. "Tomorrow, Los Angeles and Melbourne…. "

Then, this year, Gadahn appeared in the two videotapes also featuring Zawahiri.

Now, even those who once doubted Gadahn's importance say they and others were wrong in rejecting the possibility that an American could play a key role for Al Qaeda.

"That," the counterterrorism official said, "was the wrong assumption."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NYC Mayor Takes Charge Of WTC Memorial (AP)

By Sara Kugler, Associated Press Writer

The Associated Press, October 7, 2006

The final truckloads of rubble had just left the World Trade Center site in the spring of 2002 when Mayor Michael Bloomberg foretold the difficulties ahead for the process of building a memorial to the victims of the terror attack.

The former CEO, in public office barely six months, told a group of business leaders he couldn't envision the end result.

"I can tell you the process, however," Bloomberg said. "The process is everybody yelling and screaming for a number of years and then somebody taking charge and just doing it."

He was remarkably right. Amid all the shouting — some directed at him — the mayor himself is taking over the memorial's multimillion-dollar foundation, where board members hope his philanthropic credentials and star power will breathe life into lethargic fundraising.

That surprised many people because of his awkward history with the memorial and victims' families.

His predecessor, Rudolph Giuliani, had suggested when he left office that the entire site should be made into a "soaring, monumental" memorial.

Bloomberg, however, was focused on stabilizing the city's shaky post-9/11 economy, and the pragmatic billionaire could not support giving up 16 acres of prime downtown Manhattan real estate. He came across as business-oriented and harsh.

Victims' relatives were angered when he said downtown residents wouldn't want to live next to a "cemetery." Many were already unhappy because at the start of his term Bloomberg did not attend every firefighter's funeral as Giuliani had done, although he quickly changed his ways.

The next year, he took heat for comments reportedly made during a meeting with Diane and Kurt Horning, who lost their son in the attack and were upset that the city buried the sifted trade center dust in a landfill. They say that dust still contains specks of human remains, and are suing the city in federal court to force its removal.

Diane Horning says Bloomberg should not head the emotionally charged memorial effort because he was "dismissive and abrupt" about their views on grieving and remains.

Bloomberg's opponents also say he lacks compassion for rescue workers sickened by toxic trade center debris and has ignored demands to group the names of victims on the memorial by where they died and who employed them, rather than listing the names randomly.

"I don't get any warmth from the man — I don't feel that he can understand the need for memorializing the victims or the feelings of the families," Horning said. "Does he understand the financials? Of course he does, but that's not enough."

Christy Ferer, who lost her husband on Sept. 11 and serves as Bloomberg's liaison to the families, says the public dramatically misunderstands him.

Ferer said he cares deeply about the families and has been instrumental in countless projects on their behalf.

"He is an amazing, philanthropic guy, but that doesn't mean he's warm and fuzzy, and sometimes people can potentially misread that," she said. "Maybe these families can't recognize his ability to execute his vision in the long run, and therefore think that he's all about lack of feeling."

The mayor lost friends on 9/11 and endured his own grief early in life, but rarely mentions either. His father, who had a weak heart, died during Bloomberg's junior year in college.

In his autobiography, Bloomberg noted that "today, he could have survived; medicine wasn't as capable then as it is now."

It is a revealing passage: The mayor, who wears his father's watch as a remembrance, donates hundreds of millions to medical research.

Many say this is how he deals with adversity, by focusing on what can be changed rather than dwelling on the past.

"His energy is totally directed forward, and sometimes his way of grieving is really not to look backwards," Ferer said.

He has also given $10 million to the memorial foundation. As its chairman, the Republican mayor will likely tap his business connections and wealthy friends for more donations to the project, which is expected to cost more than $700 million. Nearly $145 million has been raised. Construction on the memorial has begun and officials hope to finish in 2009 — Bloomberg's last year in office.

"What we're really seeing is that he understands how central this is to the nation, to the city and to the families," said Mitchell Moss, a New York University urban planning professor. "Even though he has not been that close with them, he understands the power of this and the significance that it has."

Advocates Say Illegal Workers Suffer After 9/11 Cleanup (WP)

By Darryl Fears, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

But a Recent N.Y. Program Offers Help to Many With Lung, Other Diseases

Jose Moncada watched the World Trade Center towers tumble, and, like so many Americans, felt a patriotic urge to help rescue survivors and rebuild after Sept. 11. "It was my time to put my hand on my heart," he said. "It was my time to help somebody."

It did not matter to him that he was an illegal immigrant from Honduras. And that did not seem to matter to supervisors who oversaw the retrieval of human remains and the removal of toxic debris at Ground Zero. They welcomed Moncada and thousands of other illegal immigrants, no questions asked.

Working on the pile for 10 days, Moncada breathed in thick dust, grainy asbestos and foul-smelling gases driven by an angry downtown wind. Now, five years later, he suffers from a hacking cough, nosebleeds, wheezing breath and life-threatening respiratory illnesses that also trouble thousands of legal U.S. residents who worked there.

No one knows how many illegal immigrants worked at Ground Zero in the days after Sept. 11. Immigration advocates claim it was thousands.

And now, as the workers have become sick, partisans on both sides cast their plight in moral terms.

"After 9/11, everybody responded with their heart," said Carmen CalderÃ³n, coordinator of Sept. 11 immigrant outreach for the New York Committee for Occupational Safety and Health. "Immigrants died in those towers. They wanted to be part of the recovery of this nation."

But when a backlash developed against the huge wave of illegal immigration, "they changed the DMV laws, and a lot of asbestos workers lost their licenses because they couldn't get a picture ID," CalderÃ³n said. "A lot of them are sick now, without work. They've lost their insurance. They lost their incomes. They lost everything."

Mark Krikorian, director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which opposes immigration increases, expressed regret for illegal immigrants who fell sick after working at Ground Zero but said they should not have been allowed to enter the country illegally.

"It tells us how harmful it is to have a policy that winks at illegal immigration and gives status to illegal aliens," Krikorian said. "If they present themselves to authorities, they should be sent home. It makes people squeamish to say this because of what happened. But this is a result of the ridiculous situation we've put ourselves in."

Moncada said fires were still burning on the streets when he showed up to volunteer in September 2001. "No one asked for papers or anything," he said. He worked with others who spoke Spanish.

Volunteers searched for survivors but found only pieces of remains.

"They had 100 people on one side, 50 people on the other, a big long line. We had to remove all the dust and the debris, the steel and metal. The machines couldn't do it because the vibrations caved everything in, so they worked by hand," Moncada said.

Andrzej, an illegal immigrant from Poland who would not give his last name because he feared deportation, worked for pay. He arrived at Ground Zero in October 2001 and took a job doing cleanup, wearing only a paper mask. "Nobody was asking me for any documents or any paper," he said. "All the time I only heard that I was doing a good job, 'Thank you.' "

Workers were paid about $19 an hour, toiling for up to 16 hours a day. They were given buckets, mops, rags and little protective equipment as they cleared away glass, metal, dust and waste from downtown buildings that were not destroyed, advocates said.

"The ladies were smaller, so they put them in the air ducts, huge pipes," CalderÃ³n said. "They crawled in to wipe down the pipes with no masks, no gloves, nothing, not even a change of clothes."

Two years later, Moncada started to feel tired. Then he felt pain.

"My nose hurts every time I breathe," he said. "My vision is very bad. My breathing is very bad. A doctor gave me Tylenol and Advil.

"I don't want to speak to anybody. I want to stay home. I feel depressed. I can't sleep very well at night. Every day I wake up and I do nothing. I don't know what is happening to my system, my body."

Andrzej said he felt even worse. He went to an emergency room when he could not move his arms. He was admitted for a week and released with medication to control blood clotting.

"I don't work anymore," he said. "I am too sick to work. I can't speak or clearly think. I try but I have to push myself. It feels like someone is sitting on my chest. It's hard to breathe."

The New York Committee for Occupational Safety and Health estimates that 40,000 workers cleaned along Canal Street. Thousands of illegal immigrants from China, Honduras, Russia, El Salvador, Guatemala and Mexico worked beside legal U.S. residents.

"For low-income immigrant communities where health insurance is scarce . . . this disaster magnified an already desperate situation," CalderÃ³n said. "Their choice is concrete. Do I pay my rent? Do I buy medicine? Do I put food on the table? These choices are obviously choices that some victims of Sept. 11 have to make."

In 2004, an advocacy group called Beyond Ground Zero noticed more and more immigrants getting sick. The advocates approached Bellevue Hospital and asked for help. The hospital started an unfunded program that provided care to patients, and last year the American Red Cross donated money to expand the program.

This month, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) pledged $16 million over five years to expand the initiative further. Within two weeks, the occupational safety committee received more than 350 calls from immigrants, CalderÃ³n said. Newton said 500 people had been screened for medical examinations by her organization, and 700 people were waiting.

But the assistance may have come too late for illegal immigrants who have gone home since working at Ground Zero, advocates and workers said.

"It's going to be a challenge finding them, because undocumented immigrants move around a lot," CalderÃ³n said. "Because of some of the anti-immigrant sentiment, many of them have returned home to Mexico, to Poland. They might not hear the message."

Mike Cutler, who tracked down illegal immigrants for the Immigration and Naturalization Service, said authorities should do what they can to aid the sick. But he said they should also send home illegal immigrants and fix the dysfunctional immigration system.

"While I feel bad for people who saw Sept. 11 happen, chipped in and got sick, I would not want a blanket amnesty for them," he said. "You would wind up with millions and millions of people saying they worked at Ground Zero."

Speedy Lines For Trusted Fliers (NYT)

Programs that offer faster airport security check-ins to travelers who pay an annual fee and pass a background check seem poised to expand after a trial run in Orlando, Fla. Advance applications are now being taken for Registered Traveler programs at four additional airports, including Kennedy Airport in New York. As many as 20 airports in all may set aside Registered Traveler lanes by the end of the year.

There is nothing wrong with the overall goal of making security checks a bit easier and more predictable for business travelers and other frequent fliers. The airlines would be in truly dire straits if they stopped flying. But there are qualifications: It is imperative that registered travelers not be allowed to get by with less intense security screening. The expedited service should not be allowed to further inconvenience the ordinary traveler. And government money should not be used to subsidize the faster service. These are principles that the government itself has for the most part espoused.

Travelers who want to take part in these programs would voluntarily submit personal information, allow fingerprints and iris scans to be taken, and pass a government background check. They would then be given cards identifying them as registered travelers eligible for fast-lane treatment. There was originally a widespread expectation that these certified-as-safe travelers would get less rigorous security screening. But on sober second thought, experts recognized that terrorist groups could easily qualify members with clean backgrounds as registered travelers. The screening of registered travelers must be identical to, or every bit as rigorous as, the screening accorded ordinary folk.

At Orlando International Airport, a pilot program has been operated for the past year by a company founded by Steven Brill and working in collaboration with General Electric and Lockheed Martin. More than 27,000 people have signed up and paid fees of $79.95 a year, a measure of their frustration with long and uncertain waits in security lines. What they get in return is a designated lane that leads directly to one set of the airport's metal detectors and X-ray scanners. In effect, Mr. Brill's customers get preferred treatment similar to what some airlines in other major airports grant their first-class passengers or highest-mileage frequent fliers.

The Orlando project claims registered travelers go through its lines and pass through airport screening machines in five minutes or less. Airport officials believe the program has reduced waiting times for regular passengers as well. The screening machines are operated by regular government-supervised inspectors, and the Transportation Security Administration has announced that it expects to levy a fee — probably $30 per enrollment — to cover its vetting and administrative costs. The government must keep monitoring to make sure it is charging enough.

For the future, Mr. Brill hopes to gain government approval for new screening technologies that would let his customers keep their shoes and jackets on, thus eliminating the annoying and time-consuming ritual of removing the items for X-ray screening. That would be fine, as long as any approved technology his group develops could also be bought for the lines processing regular customers.

Air travelers have long since become used to the fact that they receive different levels of service depending on how much they pay and how often they fly. If Mr. Brill or other entrepreneurs can find a business plan that allows them to make a profit by providing registered travelers with faster lines, without compromising security or adding to the inconvenience of other passengers, it would be a welcome development. But the best option would still be a broader program to improve screening for all passengers, thus rendering the designated fast lanes superfluous.

Homeowners Stay Put In New Orleans (LAT)

By Jean Guccione And Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Records show most are using government aid to rebuild their property rather than to relocate.

Most New Orleans-area property owners seeking government aid for hurricane damage are showing a strong preference for restoring their old neighborhoods rather than take the money to seek new horizons.

Although federal and state recovery programs offer aid to those who choose to relocate, few applicants have requested it, records show.

A Times analysis of data from the Small Business Administration, the federal agency primarily responsible for disaster reconstruction loans, found that of more than 150,000 homeowners and business owners approved for the loans, 2% were transferring the money to a new property.

Those who are moving aren't going far. New Orleans suburbs on the north shore of Lake Pontchartrain are favorite destinations of the few loan applicants who are leaving the devastated neighborhoods in the area south of the lake. Only a handful have asked to use the money to buy homes outside the metropolitan area.

Though the 2% relocation figure may seem low considering the widespread property loss after Hurricane Katrina, it is higher than that of other disasters, said Herb Mitchell, the Small Business Administration's associate administrator for disaster assistance.

"In most disasters, there are very few relocations," he said. "Generally they stay in the community and rebuild."

Half of his agency's loans have been distributed. Mitchell said those who hadn't received the money could still request relocation.

Mitchell said he expected that more applicants would ask for relocation funds, and that some who had received only a portion of their loans for personal property might also ask to use the reconstruction funds elsewhere.

"My general impression [is] that people want to come back," Mitchell said. "The circumstances create the uncertainty."

The will of New Orleanians to return to their homes is also demonstrated by grant applications received by Louisiana's recovery program, the Road Home, which will distribute $10.4 billion in federal housing grants. The Road Home surveyed tens of thousands of applicants about where they intended to live, Road Home spokeswoman Carol Hector-Harris said.

About 12% of respondents planned to relocate — the vast majority of them within the state — whereas more than half intended to return to their properties, Hector-Harris said. The remaining third did not know or did not respond, illustrating the uncertainty that pervades the recovery.

Melanie and Richard Goodyear are among the small percentage of New Orleans area property owners who intend to relocate within the metro area with federal assistance.

The Goodyears had dreamed of moving to the New Orleans suburbs north of Lake Pontchartrain when they retired in 10 or 20 years. They are following a path that was well-worn even before the storm. Many of their friends live on the north shore, an area now packed with hurricane evacuees.

When Katrina damaged the Goodyears' home and scattered their friends and neighbors last year, the couple accelerated plans to leave St. Bernard Parish, one of the areas hit hardest by the storm. "It just pushed us to make a decision a little earlier," said Melanie Goodyear, 45.

She and Richard, 53, are building a home in the north-shore town of Madisonville. The Goodyears return to their damaged house every two weeks to cut the grass. But Melanie Goodyear cannot imagine ever returning to St. Bernard Parish to live.

"We are not going back," she said. "It's not the same. None of our neighbors came back. None of our friends are there…. There is no quality of life right now."

WAR NEWS:

Taliban Back, Using Iraq-style Violence (AP)

By Jim Krane, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

A sweating man wanders into a crowd and blows himself up, leaving a dozen bodies lifeless on the street. A few blocks away, a car bomb pulverizes an armored Humvee, killing two U.S. soldiers and 14 civilians. The kind of anonymous insurgent violence that is convulsing Iraq has migrated 1,500 miles east to plague Afghanistan five years after the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban regime.

The prospect of a second downward spiral — though so far Afghanistan isn't nearly as violent as Iraq — has experts worried that Western militaries don't have an effective strategy for these irregular wars.

"One Iraq is bad enough," said Bruce Hoffman, a counterinsurgency expert at Georgetown University. "Given that our two main theaters of operations aren't going well, one has to question how well the U.S. understands counterinsurgency."

The reborn Taliban acknowledges that it has adopted the suicide bombings, beheadings and remote-controlled bombs of the Iraqi insurgent movement. Nearly 200 civilians have been killed in suicide attacks this year that look all too much like the wave of bombings sweeping Iraq.

"We're getting stronger in every province and in every district and every village," said Qari Mohammed Yusuf Ahmadi, who calls himself the Taliban's spokesman for southern Afghanistan. "We don't have helicopters and jet fighters. But we're giving America and its allies a tough time with roadside bombs, suicide attacks and ambushes. Our Muslim brothers in Iraq are using the same tactics."

Resemblances to Iraq don't stop there. Taliban public relations teams videotape attacks and post them online, an uncharacteristic venture into modern technology for a Muslim fundamentalist group that once banned cameras and computers.

The West's military strategy in Afghanistan also resembles that in Iraq.

Just as critics say Washington did not send enough troops to Iraq before the insurgency took root, analysts fault the U.S. for failing to press its advantage in Afghanistan in 2002 and 2003 when the Taliban were all but vanquished.

Meanwhile, Afghan observers say the same harsh U.S. tactics, decried in Iraq for causing civilian casualties, have helped the Taliban recruit new fighters.

But unlike Iraq's insurgents, the Taliban has ready sanctuary and support just outside their battle zone, in the border areas of Pakistan.

"There will be no end to this insurgency until its sanctuaries and external support are addressed," said Christopher Alexander, the deputy head of the U.N. Assistance Mission in Afghanistan.

The U.S. military estimates about 6,000 Taliban and other insurgent fighters operate in Afghanistan, many from bases in Pakistan. Yusuf Ahmadi — who spoke by satellite phone from an undisclosed location and whose exact ties to the militia's leadership are unclear — put the figure in the tens of thousands.

The Taliban comeback, while focused on the volatile south and east, has begun to hit Kabul. The mountain capital's tree-lined boulevards are now scarred, like the streets of Baghdad, by garlands of razor wire, towering blast walls and impromptu police checkpoints.

There's little indication that Iraqi insurgents are joining the fight in Afghanistan or giving the Taliban direct aid, although a few Arab and Chechen fighters mingle in Taliban ranks.

But even without much personal contact, the Taliban has learned from Iraq's insurgency. Web sites explain the insurgent's art: everything from concealed rocket launchers to roadside bomb-making.

"We're not saying they're getting direct support from Iraq," a U.S. military official in Afghanistan said on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity the information. "They've evolved by adapting their tactics. They've seen the value of the suicide bomber in Iraq. For them, it's a very cheap and effective weapons system."

The U.S. and NATO military response in Afghanistan also has nuanced differences from Iraq. U.S. warplanes drop 10 times more bombs in Afghanistan than they do in Iraq, and a few U.S. and NATO troops live off base in village houses, a strategy rarely attempted in Iraq.

But most of the allied war efforts looks similar. In both places, troops cordon off villages and search homes. They employ billions of dollars in technology — things like signal jammers and mine-clearing vehicles — to find and disarm roadside bombs. They operate from bases nearly identical in appearance, with troops living in tin trailers barricaded by dirt-filled metal baskets.

The Afghan war is still far smaller, occupying just 40,000 allied troops — a quarter of those in Iraq — and suffering a fraction of the casualties. But for individual soldiers serving in mountainous Taliban lands like Zabul province, the dangers feel the same.

"I know Iraq grabs a lot of headlines. But there's still a war going on over here," said Lt. Col. Steve Jarrard, 46, of Johnson City, Tenn., based in the hard-bitten southern town of Qalat. "I really hope we're doing the right thing over here."

Right now, it's too early to tell the result of major U.S. and NATO offensives aimed at crushing the Taliban.

"In three to six months you'll see a noticeable effect," said NATO spokesman Maj. Luke Knittig. "But you're talking two to five years before seeing a defeat of the insurgency" in southern Afghanistan.

German Journalists Killed In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jason Straziuso, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Two German journalists who had pitched a tent on the side of a road outside a northern Afghan village were killed by gunmen early Saturday, the fifth anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan.

The freelance journalists conducting research for a documentary were the first foreign reporters killed in Afghanistan since late 2001, when eight journalists died.

A NATO soldier, meanwhile, was killed by militants who detonated a roadside bomb and fired on a military patrol in southern Afghanistan. A suicide car bomber targeted a U.S. patrol in eastern Afghanistan but caused no casualties.

The killings came on the fifth anniversary of the Oct. 7, 2001, invasion by U.S.-led troops to oust the Taliban for hosting Osama bin Laden. Western forces and Afghanistan's Northern Alliance quickly routed the Islamic regime.

But the militant fighters who once appeared soundly defeated have returned with a vengeance, taking control of large swaths of countryside in the last year. Taliban fighters have stepped up the use of roadside and suicide bombs, and more than 3,000 people have been killed this year, mostly militants battling Western forces.

Some 40,000 U.S. and NATO troops are now in Afghanistan, 2 1/2 times the number three years ago.

The slain journalists — identified as Karen Fischer, 30, and Christian Struwe, 38 — worked as freelancers for Deutsche Welle, Germany's state-owned broadcast outlet.

The two were traveling through the northern province of Baghlan, about 100 miles northwest of Kabul, and had stopped outside a small village, where they set up a tent to spend the night, said Mohammad Azim Hashami, the provincial police chief.

They were killed by AK-47 gunfire around 1:30 a.m., he said.

"The sound of the shooting was heard by some of the villagers, who ran toward that area," Hashami said. "They found a tent and they found the two journalists dead."

Hashami said nothing was stolen from the journalists, including their vehicle. Police had no suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0078181

Deutsche Welle said the journalists had been conducting private research for a documentary and were en route to the province of Bamiyan, the site of two large Buddha statues that were destroyed by the Taliban in early 2001.

Deutsche Welle director Erik Bettermann called them "pioneers in re-establishing a functioning media system in Afghanistan" and said Struwe helped set up a state-run radio and television newsroom, a project supported by Deutsche Welle.

"It is tragic that Karen Fischer and Christian Struwe had to die in the country that they spent so much of their energy supporting in the past few years," Bettermann said.

The German government condemned the killings.

"This heinous crime must be solved and the perpetrators brought before justice," Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said in a statement. "The atrocious and senseless death of our citizens strengthens all the more our responsibility to support the Afghan government in its commitment to security and a rule of law."

Some 2,700 German soldiers are serving in the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force in the north of the country.

There is little daily violence in the northern province of Baghlan, compared with Afghanistan's volatile south, but militant fighters allied with the renegade warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar roam the area. A Canadian aid worker helping to build a school was killed in the province in July.

No foreign journalists have been killed in Afghanistan since late 2001, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. An Afghan journalist who arrived at the scene of a suicide bombing in July in the southern city of Kandahar was killed by a second suicide bombing at the same spot, CPJ said.

The attack on the NATO troops, meanwhile, happened in the volatile Panjwayi district of Kandahar province near a NATO base, the alliance said. NATO did not release the nationality of the dead soldier.

NATO troops clashed with militants in Panjwayi district last month, and NATO said more than 300 fighters were killed.

In the eastern province of Khost, a suicide car bomber targeted a U.S. patrol near the border with Pakistan, said provincial police chief Mohammed Ayub. Maj. Luke Knittig, a NATO spokesman, said there were no military casualties.

In Ghazni province, police said a regional Taliban commander — Mullah Abdul Rahim Sabauun — was killed by police on Thursday. Sabauun was reportedly a high-ranking politician during the Taliban's rule.

It's Time For Him To Go (WP)

By Robert Dallek

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Before he appointed Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, President Bush would have done well to listen to the tape of an old telephone conversation between Rumsfeld and President Richard M. Nixon. It was March 1971, and Nixon was offering career advice to Rumsfeld, then head of Nixon's Office of Economic Opportunity:

"You should be thinking of what you should do in the future," he told the 39-year-old Rumsfeld. "Down the road, my view is that you would be a Cabinet officer. . . . [A]nd you can do, as far as I'm concerned, anything in the Cabinet field, except I wouldn't put you in Defense and I wouldn't put you in State . . . actually, you could be attorney general."

Perhaps Nixon understood something about Rumsfeld that eludes Bush. Whether out of loyalty to his defense secretary, or out of a stubborn reluctance to acknowledge Rumsfeld's failings -- and therefore his own -- Bush seems determined to keep Rumsfeld in the Pentagon. In so doing, the president is hanging on to an individual who has become the public face of the U.S. debacle in Iraq, one who has drawn fire not only from political opponents and countless retired military officers, but also from longtime Bush loyalists, such as former chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr. and even, reportedly, first lady Laura Bush.

But Bush would not be the first president to keep a controversial or ineffective official in place for fear of embarrassing his administration. Predecessors from Woodrow Wilson to Lyndon B. Johnson have grappled with similar dilemmas.

Forcing Rumsfeld to retire would be a political blow for the White House, at least in the short term: It would be an admission that Bush not only miscalculated the need for a preemptive war against Saddam Hussein but also bungled the plan to pacify and democratize Iraq after the invasion. Nonetheless, history shows that such tough personnel decisions can, eventually, prove healthy for an administration and for a nation, particularly in times of war. They force reassessments of long-standing policy; they help presidents stand back, evaluate and chart new directions.

Now, with little more than two years remaining in the Bush administration, the president can still drop his longtime defense secretary in favor of another who could bring fresh ideas and renewed credibility to the battle against terrorism and the war in Iraq. It's not too late.

Some Cabinet members stay in office long beyond their usefulness. Cordell Hull ended up as the longest-serving U.S. secretary of state (from 1933 to 1944) despite his unimaginative leadership and severely limited role in shaping Franklin D.

Roosevelt's foreign policy. President Dwight D. Eisenhower was reluctant to kick out "Engine" Charlie Wilson, his much-criticized defense secretary. At the time, some joked that Wilson, a former General Motors executive, had invented the automatic transmission so that he would always have one foot free to stuff in his mouth. And Nixon resisted firing Attorney General John N. Mitchell despite -- or because of -- his role in Watergate.

Other Cabinet secretaries, by contrast, leave too soon. President Jimmy Carter and the country lost a thoughtful public servant when Cyrus Vance resigned as secretary of state after the failed hostage rescue effort in Iran, which he had opposed. Vance's departure deprived the administration of an experienced national security official at a time of great international turmoil; the move only reinforced Carter's shortcomings as a foreign policy leader and weakened his bid for a second term.

It is wars, however, that provide some of the toughest personnel decisions for presidents -- but also some of the best opportunities to change course. The wartime dismissals or resignations of three high-level officials are particularly illustrative: William Jennings Bryan, Wilson's secretary of state; Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Harry S. Truman's commander of U.S. forces in Korea; and Robert McNamara, Johnson's secretary of defense and principal architect of the war in Vietnam.

Bryan resigned in 1915 over his belief that Wilson -- by favoring Britain and France -- was violating the stated U.S. policy of neutrality in World War I. The move came as a surprise to the White House, and resurrected questions about Bryan's suitability as the country's chief diplomat. A parochial Midwesterner with limited knowledge of the outside world, Bryan had been puzzled by a diplomat's mention of the Balkans during a trip he took to Europe in 1908. "What are they?" he asked as he boarded a train in Constantinople.

Bryan had been appointed to State for his eminence as a party leader and his help in winning Wilson the Democratic presidential nomination, not for any expertise in world affairs; he was certainly not the best person to shape an effective response to the European war that began in 1914. But his sudden departure -- its initial embarrassment to Wilson notwithstanding -- forced into the open a debate over America's role in the conflict and helped spur the domestic consensus that allowed the United States to join the Great War.

When Truman dismissed MacArthur in 1951 after the general publicly attacked the president's Korea policy as too timid -- "There is no substitute for victory," MacArthur had declared -- Secretary of State Dean Acheson warned Truman that the move would provoke "the biggest fight of your administration" with the men Acheson called the "political primitives." But it was more than right-wing zealots who attacked Truman over his decision. The dismissal became a headline story nationwide. In the words of Truman biographer David McCullough, the reaction "was stupendous, the outcry from the American people was shattering." Calls for Truman's impeachment became common and MacArthur's return to the United States turned into a triumphant tour of major cities, with parades and demonstrations greeting the general. Sixty-nine percent of Americans sided with MacArthur against the president.

Within weeks, however, the outcry turned into acceptance of the president's assertion of civilian authority over military power. MacArthur's firing eventually led to a sober examination of what best served U.S. interests in Asia -- a wider war with China or a conflict confined to Korea that contained communist aggression and left the United States free to defend its security in other parts of the world? In hindsight, MacArthur's firing encouraged a realistic understanding that containment made more sense than war. "Victory" was no more the only exit strategy in Korea than it was decades later in Vietnam or than it is today in Iraq -- no matter what Henry Kissinger said to Nixon in the 1970s or whispers to Bush and Vice President Cheney today.

McNamara's departure from the Johnson administration in 1967 was nothing like MacArthur's. McNamara left with his boss's blessing and received the presidency of the World Bank as a reward. But the real story behind the resignation was different from the image of a public servant in sync with his president on the Vietnam War and taking his leave after years of exhausting service. By the fall of 1967, McNamara had concluded that the war was a lost cause and urged Johnson to reduce U.S. involvement and shift responsibility for the fighting to the South Vietnamese -- a strategy reminiscent of today's "As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down." Indeed, the failed "Vietnamization" experiment of the Vietnam War should only deepen doubts that a rebuilt Iraqi army can deal effectively with Iraq's violent insurgency.

Johnson became angry with his defense secretary for abandoning a strategy that McNamara himself had done so much to put in place, and the president considered his removal a way to sustain the U.S. effort in Vietnam. But instead, McNamara's departure forced Johnson to reconsider the secretary's proposal and, eventually, to adopt it. Following the resignation, the president consulted with America's foreign policy "wise men" -- such as Acheson, W. Averell Harriman and Maxwell D. Taylor -- who convinced him that the country would not pay the price in blood and treasure to win in Vietnam. However uncomfortable and wrenching the departure may have been for both men, it was also a constructive step toward ending what had become a divisive and unpopular war, and one that was ultimately unproductive in the larger contest with Soviet communism.

Today, the nation again faces a divisive and unpopular war, and one that appears counterproductive in the larger battle against Islamic extremism. And in this war, Bush and Rumsfeld -- and, in particular, Cheney and Rumsfeld -- seem joined at the hip.

Yet the president should consider how the departures of Bryan, MacArthur and McNamara helped spark useful national debates and critical course corrections during World War I, Korea and Vietnam. Rather than considering Rumsfeld's exit as strictly an embarrassing confession of failure -- which of course it would be in part -- Bush could regard the appointment of a new defense secretary as an opportunity to stand back, review past actions and move in new directions.

Robert Lansing, a competent diplomat, took over for Bryan as Wilson's secretary of state. Johnson chose Clark Clifford, a respected and independent Washington figure, to fill in for McNamara. Both were instrumental in shifting policy on their respective wars, and were just as successful in renewing public confidence in U.S. efforts and intentions. Similarly, Bush could consider replacing Rumsfeld with someone of the stature of former senator George Mitchell or, as former chief of staff Card suggested (according to Bob Woodward's account in his new book "State of Denial"), former secretary of state James A. Baker III.

Finally, there is one candidate who is as qualified as he is unlikely to ever get the job: Zbigniew Brzezinski, the national security adviser under Carter. Brzezinski has proved brilliant and incisive in his criticism of the war. He notes, correctly, that there is no real U.S. strategy underpinning this conflict, as containment and deterrence focused the Cold War. Preemption has been disastrous, and victory is an outcome, not a strategy. Brzezinski also has the force of will and personality to demand real change. But that sort of change would require more than a new defense secretary -- it would require a new administration.

Worse Than McNamara? (WP)

By Stanley Karnow

By the mid-1960s, President Lyndon B. Johnson had deployed nearly half a million troops to Vietnam. His spokesmen loudly maintained that our troops' palpable military superiority -- they were equipped with ultramodern artillery, supersonic airplanes, technological gadgets and other sophisticated weaponry -- was having a decisive impact, killing countless Viet Cong guerrillas and North Vietnamese regulars.

But even as the situation in Vietnam was being pumped up, a few officials in Washington were questioning the conventional optimism. Not the least of them was Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara -- the man who had staunchly promoted the anti-communist struggle in Southeast Asia for half a decade, first under President John F. Kennedy and then under Johnson.

As I contemplate McNamara's evolution from war supporter to war skeptic, I ponder whether Donald H. Rumsfeld, his heir at the Pentagon, nurses any similar doubts about the dubious Iraq strategy he vaunts in his rhetoric. I wonder whether it's possible that, despite his projection of unshakable faith today, he may eventually come to make the same confession about Iraq that McNamara did about Vietnam, in the surprisingly candid mea culpa he published in 1995: "We were wrong, terribly wrong."

There's no public sign that Rumsfeld is swayed by such thoughts. But McNamara's dramatic transformation took years to surface.

I first discerned a change in him at a conference in Honolulu in February 1966. The small group of reporters he invited to his deluxe hotel suite for a background briefing was stunned by his appearance. His face seemed grayer, and his patent-leather hair thinner. His voice lacked the authority it had projected in briefings past, when, like the consummate corporate executive he had been, he would briskly point to an array of graphs and flip charts to buttress his roseate appraisals of the war's progress.

Exactly a year before, Johnson had galvanized Operation Rolling Thunder, the sustained aerial offensive that was supposed to crack Hanoi's morale. But McNamara bluntly told us that the attacks were ineffective. A rural society couldn't be blasted into submission, he emotionally insisted. "No amount of bombing can end this conflict."

His aim in leaking his reservations to the news media was to obstruct the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the belligerent faction on Capitol Hill, who were demanding an aggressive program to demolish every ammunition dump, bridge, road, factory, rail junction and warehouse in the North, as well as obliterate the Ho Chi Minh trail that threaded through the jungles adjacent to Cambodia and Laos. Some further advocated mining Haiphong harbor and flooding the Hanoi region by destroying the Red River dikes.

McNamara had partly endorsed their pugnacious scenario in hopes that it would fail and enable him to persuade LBJ to try diplomacy. The president was sympathetic to his proposals. Contrary to the portrait of him as implacably truculent, Johnson felt trapped in the Vietnam quagmire. But he feared that unless he continued to escalate the commitment, he would incur the anger of the hawks and ultraconservatives in Congress, whose support he needed to pursue his liberal domestic agenda.

McNamara was heavily influenced by the shifting attitudes of his civilian aides, notably John McNaughton, Paul Warnke and Adam Yarmolinsky, whose zest for the war had faded. Searching for fresh ideas, he consulted several prominent scholars. Their studies confirmed his pessimism. The communists were receiving sufficient equipment from Russia and China to bolster their insurgency, while the campaign against them had "clearly engendered their patriotic and nationalistic enthusiasm and strengthened their determination to resist the U.S. incursions," the academics concluded in a 1967 report.

Rumsfeld, unlike McNamara, evidently relies on a tight circle of loyal acolytes and shuns outside mavens. His assessments of the war in Iraq remain upbeat despite a growing drumbeat of criticism from both retired and active military officials, plummeting public support and a stream of disastrous news from Baghdad. In that regard, he may perhaps be more beleaguered than McNamara in 1966-67.

A crucial moment for McNamara arose in August 1967, when he testified at a session of Sen. John C. Stennis's subcommittee on preparedness. Stennis had scheduled the closed hearings to probe the attempts of "unskilled amateurs" to shackle our "professional soldiers." The admirals and generals were there, resplendent in their ribbons. McNamara showed up with mounds of statistics and, lecturing in his patronizing style, repeated his thesis that the clamor for a tough approach would not yield results.

Johnson was furious. Though he distrusted the brass and braid, he flinched at antagonizing their backers. In addition, he suspected that McNamara might be covertly collaborating with Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, who now opposed the war and was ambitiously focused on the White House. Suggesting that the Cabinet officer he had once hailed as a model had suffered a breakdown, Johnson maneuvered McNamara into the presidency of the World Bank, a post he took up after resigning from Defense in February 1968.

As far as I could tell, the experience traumatized McNamara. On one occasion, he rejected my request for an interview, then spent an hour on the telephone explaining to me why he was unable to talk.

In contrast to McNamara's relations with Johnson, Rumsfeld appears to enjoy the entire confidence of President Bush and, just as important, Vice President Cheney, neither of whom seem to be plagued by any Johnson-like uncertainties. So barring his possible ouster, he's unlikely to emulate McNamara by apologizing for a policy in Iraq that has been as misguided as the tragic Vietnam disaster.

Like scenes out of "Desperate Housewives," the war room machinations of the White House.

STATE OF DENIAL

By Bob Woodward

Simon & Schuster. 560 pp. $30

On July 20, 2005, a remote-activated explosive device detonated during a senior staff meeting at the White House. That device, according to Bob Woodward's remarkable new book, was a new form of stealth whoopee cushion, placed strategically under the chair of Karl Rove, senior adviser to the president, and discharged to cacophonous laughter all around. The prank had been planned for a staff meeting on July 7 but was postponed because of the terrorist bombings in London that day. July 20 was deemed a much more propitious day -- all that happened was the release of a new survey of the war placing the total number of Iraqi dead at 25,000.

A week after its hasty release, millions of Americans have heard the stunning accusations leveled in State of Denial . If journalism is the first draft of history, President Bush is going to have a very hard time in the posterity he is now approaching. Woodward's new book, the third in his trilogy on George W. Bush, conveys a great deal of information, none of it good for the president and his team. It gives far more operational detail on Iraq than its predecessor, Plan of Attack . It also goes much further in asserting the author's distaste for the war and the administration's handling of it than anything Woodward has written previously. In fact, it is the angriest book Woodward has written since his first, All the President's Men . Like that masterpiece, State of Denial feels all the more outraged for its measured, nonpartisan tones and relentless reporting. It is nothing less than a watershed.

The book begins in December 2000, with a shaky president-elect searching for the right secretary of defense and giving in to Dick Cheney's suggestion that his old friend Donald Rumsfeld is available. The story continues to very near the present (July 2006), when Woodward conducts the last of his many interviews with Rumsfeld. It gives a full chronicle of the Iraq adventure, including far more than has been previously reported on what our leaders said and did after the apparent victory of March 2003. In so doing, it reveals a government crippled by dysfunction at precisely the wartime moment when leadership was most necessary.

For many years, we have been hearing the stories of both the failures and the successes coming out of the Iraqi desert. It now appears that the failures were more pronounced than we knew and the successes more fabricated. Judging from the alacrity with which nearly everyone on the Bush team has talked to Woodward, it seems the entire enterprise is now foundering under a pessimism completely out of sync with the cheerful optimism of presidential pronouncements.

With whom did Woodward speak? It's hard to find someone he didn't speak with -- itself a sign of creeping executive dysfunction. It's a sort of Noah's Ark in reverse, with every animal leaving the ship. A quick guess list would include Andrew Card, George Tenet, Colin Powell, Richard Armitage, Jay Garner, David Kay, Prince Bandar bin Sultan and a lot of top military brass, including, to his credit, the book's chief victim, Donald Rumsfeld. But neither President Bush nor Vice President Cheney sat for interviews. By freezing out the author, they appear increasingly trapped in a Nixonian bunker -- perhaps why Woodward has returned to his original home in the opposition.

It's not just that so many people talked -- it's how mad they all seem to be at each other. Often the drama unfolds like an episode of "Desperate Housewives." George is mad at Condi. Condi is mad at Don. Don is mad at Colin. Dick is mad at everybody. Andrew Card, the sane presence at the center of all this bickering, gives the perfect quote: "I was frequently the person trying to take sand out of people's underwear, which is a very difficult task if it's not your underwear."

In crisis after crisis, the government simply failed to operate the way it was designed to. Memos failed to circulate or arrived after they became irrelevant. Briefings conveyed only the news that listeners wanted to hear. Controversial information was rarely presented to the president, who rarely asked for it. New proposals were quashed, and policy was stymied by terrible infighting, or worse, indifference. On point after point, the government's performance was over budget, unapologetic and late. In other words, the Bush administration has become the new Amtrak.

No one fares especially well in this retelling. The familiar stereotypes emerge -- Rice as powerless, Cheney as dark and secretive, Bush as blithe. Even Colin Powell, often lionized, fails to assert himself at crucial moments when the secretary of state might have used his prestige to alter the course of history. But Rumsfeld takes the worst of it. For a public that demands heroes and villains, he will appear in the latter role. Part of Woodward admires him and his charisma, intelligence and willingness to take on the Pentagon bureaucracy. Quoting John le CarrÃ© on George Smiley, Woodward writes of a man who "had been given, in late age, a chance to return to the rained-out contests of his life and play them after all." But throughout the book, with building intensity, Rumsfeld commits mistakes of the highest order, both strategic and tactical. Woodward calls his micromanaging "almost comic." He overwhelms his staff with short administrative notes (called "snowflakes") that he sends around the Pentagon. He crushes bureaucratic opponents such as the National Security council and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, then vacillates before important decisions or blames others when they go badly. He cherry-picks intelligence and distributes it unevenly before meetings. He badly misses crucial warnings before 9/11, sends too few troops to Iraq to do the job and blows the chance to train the Iraqi army when that might have saved it.

So many of Rumsfeld's subordinates appear to have talked to Woodward that the book suggests the feeling of a palace revolt. One Pentagon colonel penned a series of haikus to chase his blues away, including what must be the first poem in history to begin with the five-syllable line, "Rumsfeld is a dick." That gnomic sentence may be the book's motto.

But even if Rumsfeld becomes the fall guy, the book is damaging to the president as well. Like Rumsfeld, he is presented as intelligent and charismatic. But he never asks to be challenged or asks for dissenting views. Clearly, Woodward believes that the ultimate responsibility for Iraq rests on the president's desk. In one of many damning passages, Woodward writes, "the whole atmosphere too often resembled a royal court, with Cheney and Rice in attendance, some upbeat stories, exaggerated good news, and a good time had by all."

Long after reading this book, lasting images will remain of an "inexperienced president" with his "legs dancing" under the table during serious briefings, failing to rein in his quarreling deputies and laughing inordinately at inappropriate jokes.

There are many revelations like this, tiny pinpoints of light that illuminate the secret workings of a bureaucracy lumbering toward war. There is also a lot of dish, from the glimpses of George H. W. Bush's great sadness over the recent turn of events to inside stories of how the White House made decisions and who was considered a part of the team. It may not help Sen. Joseph Lieberman's quixotic campaign to learn that he was seriously considered to be either secretary of defense or secretary of homeland security in the second term. More than anything, there are countless examples of ineptitude (for example, Vice President Cheney urging that David Kay's team of weapon-trackers look for evidence of Saddam Hussein's WMD at a precise location that turned out to be in Lebanon). The more we learn about the hard facts of the decision to invade, the more it appears to have rested on faulty information, most of it collected before 1998, flimsy enough to assemble in a child's loose-leaf binder of 15 or 20 pages.

What impresses the reader throughout is the quiet force of Woodward's anger. He is no carping liberal, and no such person would be able to secure the kind of access he has. But slowly, the force of his unemotional condemnation overwhelms the reader. One senses, though he never says so, that he is arguing against the White House and the secretary of defense on behalf of one of their most loyal constituencies: the men and women of the U.S. military. But it's also personal to Woodward, more so than in recent books. He does not simply quote Rumsfeld -- he remembers a remark from "a dinner party at my house a dozen years after he had left the Pentagon the first time." These are old friendships that are sundering, rawly, before the klieg lights of his glare.

If overfamiliarity weakened some of his earlier books, here it is a strength. One of the book's arresting observations is how audible the echo of Vietnam has become -- a comparison that no one especially wants to make but is increasingly hard to avoid. If Iraq is slowly Vietnamizing, one reason must be that so many of the original players are still on stage. And that, too, adds to the nostalgic feeling of this book. We often forget how intricately connected the Watergate scandal was to the parallel efforts by the Nixon administration to tamp down dissent about the war, muzzle critics both inside and outside the administration, and prevent the full history of the war from being told. Rumsfeld and Cheney, of course, were in the White House on the day the helicopters removed the last stragglers from the roof of the embassy compound in Saigon. Henry Kissinger makes a lengthy cameo appearance as a maven of deep influence in the Bush White House, blindly repeating the mantra "victory" without ever quite defining it. Wise men are summoned for meetings that adjourn with no results. Body counts are cited as indices of progress. Stephen Hadley, now Bush's national security adviser, wonders about ways that we might be able to retreat quietly and declare victory. It's dÃ©jÃ vu all over again.

Near the beginning of his tenure, President Bush said, "time is our ally at the beginning of the administration. It will at some point turn against me." Abraham Lincoln, whose name graces the aircraft carrier where President Bush declared victory in Iraq, once wrote, "We cannot escape history." That remains true, even for presidents. Soon the full story of the Iraq War will be told by historians, who will be swayed less by the heat of the moment and adhere instead to the simple tally sheet of promises made and kept. They will not be swayed by ABC television scripts, or executive privilege or lofty claims that were once made but, like snowflakes, melted upon human contact. This book, heavy in every sense, will be at the top of their shelves as they proceed to the altar of judgment. Â·

The World According To Rummy (WP)

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

On May 1, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld circulated a secret memo titled "Illustrative New 21st Century Institutions and Approaches." The six-page document, excerpted below, highlights the Iranian threat, calls for a multilateral military force and argues that the United States' antiquated system of government makes competence "next to impossible." I obtained the contents of this memo while reporting for "State of Denial: Bush at War, Part III" (Simon & Schuster).

-- Bob Woodward

1. Transformation of international institutions. Today the world requires new international organizations tailored to new circumstances. Many of the more pressing threats are global and transnational in scope. Terrorism proliferation, cyber crime, narcotics, piracy, hostage-taking, criminal gangs, etc. Because they cannot be dealt with successfully by any one nation alone, the cooperation of many nations will be vital. Current institutions such as the UN, NATO, OAS, the African Union, ECOWAS, ASEAN and the European Union, to mention a few, were designed at a time when the world's challenges were notably different. Some were formed over half a century ago to further U.S. foreign and security policy purposes. Today, as U.S. goals in the world at large have changed, existing international institutions have failed to adapt sufficiently. Effective international organizations are needed to bring competence to such areas as quick reaction forces, military training, military police training, counterproliferation, capacity building for the rule of law, governance and domestic ministries. This may require institutions designed for those purposes rather than struggling to reform existing institutions to take on tasks for which they are ill suited.

Examples . . . Peacekeeping and governance. The world and the U.S. would benefit from a "global peace operations and governance corps." A standing capability is needed ready to respond rapidly to deal with emerging situations before they spin out of control. Such a capability would have been useful in just the past few years in Liberia, Haiti and perhaps Sudan.

The U.S. and like-thinking nations could help to enable such a capability by training, equipping and sustaining peacekeepers with military and police capability, perhaps organized regionally in considerably greater numbers than are currently available. . . . Similarly, the U.S. and our friends and allies could help organize and train cadres of international professionals who can assist emerging governments in areas of governance and ministry building. The cost-benefit ratio of being prepared in advance and in benefiting from the use of several nations' troops rather than using solely US military forces would be substantial.

2. Regional challenges. Mideast security initiative. The threat Iran is posing and will likely continue to pose argues that it may well be time to form a new collective security arrangement for the Middle East and/or the Arabian Sea. Already one or two Middle East nations appear to be wondering if they should develop nuclear programs. This is the moment first to reassure key friends of U.S. commitment to shield them from nuclear blackmail through declaratory policy; and second, to find other ways to strengthen cooperation with them. Egypt and Saudi Arabia are the key. The U.S. needs to bolster Arab moderates now while they are viable. Some Gulf states are leaning well forward on this idea. . . .

3. A Goldwater-Nichols process for the national security portions of the U.S. government. The 1986 Goldwater-Nichols legislation led to greater jointness and interdependence in the Department of Defense among the 4 services, but it has taken 20 years to begin to fully realize its potential. The broader [U.S. government] structure is still in the industrial age and it is not serving us well. It is time to consider a new Hoover Commission to recommend ways to reorganize both the executive and legislative branches, to put us on a more appropriate path for the 21st century. Only a broad, fundamental reorganization is likely to enable federal departments and agencies to function with the speed and agility the times demand. The charge of incompetence against the U.S. government should be easy to rebut if the American people understand the extent to which the current system of government makes competence next to impossible.

Foreign assistance. The present structure of the U.S. government foreign assistance is an anachronism. A system is needed that recognizes assistance for what it really is, a component of our national security strategy. In simple terms, DOD has resources but not authorities, while State has authorities but not resources. . . . The only choice is to trash the current laws and to undertake a total overhaul of the current systems.

Strategic communications . . . A new U.S. agency for global communication could serve as a channel to inform, educate and compete in the battle for ideas. . . .

Today the centers of gravity of the conflict in Iraq and the global war on terror are not on battlefields overseas. Rather, the center of gravity of this war are on the centers of public opinion in the U.S. and in the capitals of free nations. The gateways to those centers are the international media hubs and the capitals of the world. [Ayman al-] Zawahiri has said that 50 percent of the current struggle is taking place in the arena of public information. That may be an understatement. Osama bin Laden, Zawahiri, [Abu Musab al-] Zarqawi had media committees that consistently outpace our ability to respond. When the U.S. government tries to compete in the communications arena it runs up against lack of national consensus and understanding about what means are acceptable to the media and to the Congress and disagreements as to what is legal. . . .

Rumsfeld Shift Lets Army Seek Larger Budget (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 7 — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is allowing the Army to approach White House budget officials by itself to argue for substantial increases in resources, a significant divergence from initial plans by Mr. Rumsfeld and his inner circle to cut the Army to pay for new technology and a new way of war.

With its troops and equipment worn down by years of fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Army appears likely to receive a significant spike in its share of the Pentagon's budget request when it goes to Congress early next year. Significantly, increases to the size of the Army made by Congress since 2001, amounting to 30,000 troops, have become a permanent fixture of the force, military and Congressional officials say.

Beyond that, the Army is discussing internally whether it should expand by tens of thousands more, as some in Congress have long advocated. This time, Mr. Rumsfeld is not standing in the way. His original vision for a transformed military called for leaner, more agile forces capitalizing on the latest technological innovations.

Mr. Rumsfeld's current acquiescence is viewed within the Pentagon as reflecting both the reality of the Army's needs to increase its size and repair or replace current equipment and a decision not to cross swords with the service — or with the Army's staunchest supporters in Congress. Some of them are sharply critical of the defense secretary's management of the war effort and have called for him to step aside.

But Mr. Rumsfeld is requiring the Army to make its own case. The defense secretary has broken Pentagon precedent by allowing the Army to make its financial case directly to the president's Office of Management and Budget, a task normally managed by the defense secretary and his staff rather than by the individual military services. The Air Force and the Navy also asked to present their budgets directly to the budget agency and the requests were granted.

The federal government is at the point in the budget process where departments are building their budget requests, with the Office of Management and Budget overseeing the effort.

Pentagon officials said the Army was seeking about $138 billion for the next fiscal year, compared with its $112 billion request last year. Army officials told Congress that the service was already $50 billion short in equipment when terrorists struck on Sept. 11, 2001, and that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan would require $17.1 billion in extra spending for 2007 just to repair and replace tanks, Humvees and other gear. Money to repair and replace equipment is expected to be $13 billion in 2008 and the next five years.

As negotiations in the Defense Department and with the Office of Management and Budget got under way to build the 2008 budget proposal, which the White House is due to submit to Congress in February, the Army took the unusual step of ignoring a deadline for submitting its central budget document, which the armed services use to explain their missions and resource requests.

"This is unusual, but we are in unusual times," a senior Defense Department official said. The official, who said the missions assigned to the armed forces were larger than those envisioned in official Pentagon strategy and far outstrip what can be supported by current budgets, described the conundrum Mr. Rumsfeld and the Army face.

"Do we lower our strategy, or do we raise our resources?" said the official, who was given anonymity to discuss budget deliberations. "That's where we're at."

Army officers made the case that meeting the administration's internal preset deadline for budget proposals before the service had fully assessed its needs — and made the case for a substantial increase — would create a false debate over numbers that would have to be dramatically revised before the February deadline for the administration's public budget submission to Congress.

Even with additional money and more troops, it is far from clear that the Army will be able in the near term to fulfill all of its commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan, prepare for other contingencies and keep its pledge to active-duty soldiers to give them two years at home between yearlong deployments to the war zone. Some senior Army officials are said to be advocating a growth not just of 30,000 soldiers, but of 60,000 to 80,000, and it is likely that sustained troop levels in Iraq may require a sizable recall of the National Guard to fill out future deployments there.

Steven Kosiak, a defense budget expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, an independent group that monitors defense policy, said previous budget plans looking ahead to 2011 gave the Army about 25 percent of the defense budget, roughly the same level it has received for decades.

But by pushing for a substantial increase in 2008 and for years thereafter, the Army is saying it needs a bigger share to deal with the requirements of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan, possible future wars and the need to modernize its force.

Unlike the Air Force and the Navy, which have been cutting their total personnel substantially to save money that can be applied to operations and new weapons systems, the Army is being forced to increase its total numbers, drawing from money for overhauling equipment and for new weapons systems.

The Air Force and Navy also have substantial mission requirements that cannot be ignored, so eventually, the question will be whether or by how much the Pentagon budget should be allowed to grow to meet the Army's rising needs.

Loren Thompson, an analyst at the Lexington Institute, a policy research group in Virginia, noted that the military budget was on the verge of exceeding a half trillion dollars a year, a level that, based on inflation-adjusted dollars, has been reached only three times before. Each previous time the budget reached that level, after the wars in Korea and Vietnam and after the defense buildup in the 1980's, it soon went back down.

"The question is, Are we going to break that glass ceiling this time?" Mr. Thompson said. "The future is unknowable, but I would say probably not."

Mr. Rumsfeld has come around to the Army's position of needing more money after a series of meetings and briefings with senior officers.

"The secretary said: 'Prove your case. Show me the metrics,' " a member of Mr. Rumsfeld's policy staff said. "The Army came in and showed him their metrics and proved their case. That's when Rumsfeld said, 'O.K. Now go over to O.M.B. and talk to them.' "

Mr. Rumsfeld has not publicly addressed his reasons for allowing this tactic, although it is a no-cost decision for the defense secretary, one that allows an important yet thorny issue to be raised with the White House without any specific personal commitment from him at this early stage of the debate.

Some Pentagon officials are frustrated that the Army is arguing for increases to pay for current missions even as it resists calls to cut its own $130 billion, 10-year investment in a next-generation weapons program called Future Combat Systems. Others express concern that the Army is using its current resources inefficiently.

Rumsfeld supporters say the continued financing of Future Combat Systems illustrates how his agenda to use technology to overhaul the Army is still being pursued. Some of the additional money the Army is seeking would go toward another part of his plan, realigning the infantry divisions into more deployable brigades.

Mr. Rumsfeld has opposed proposals to increase the size of the military, citing the need to contain health benefits and other personnel costs that have been eating a larger share of the defense budget.

Congress authorized a 30,000-soldier increase in the active-duty Army after the Sept. 11 attacks that was described as a temporary measure. Army officials say they hope to reach the authorized total troop strength of 512,000 by next year.

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Rochelle, the Army's top personnel officer, said that number was being treated as a "permanent floor."

In an interview, General Rochelle called that level “adequate” and said the Army “is growing the force as quickly as we can to get to that.”

Inside the Pentagon, officials both in the Army and in Mr. Rumsfeld’s inner circle go out of their way to describe a consultative relationship between the defense secretary and senior officers. The tenor, they said, is far more constructive than it was before Mr. Rumsfeld called a retired four-star officer, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, from his Rocky Mountain ranch to become the Army chief of staff and rebuild relations.

General Schoomaker, in his final year as chief, now finds himself negotiating with a strong hand as the Army carries the lion’s share of the mission in Iraq.

U.S. Casualties In Iraq Rise Sharply (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Growing American Role in Staving Off Civil War Leads to Most Wounded Since 2004

The number of U.S troops wounded in Iraq has surged to its highest monthly level in nearly two years as American GIs fight block-by-block in Baghdad to try to check a spiral of sectarian violence that U.S. commanders warn could lead to civil war.

Last month, 776 U.S. troops were wounded in action in Iraq, the highest number since the military assault to retake the insurgent-held city of Fallujah in November 2004, according to Defense Department data. It was the fourth-highest monthly total since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

The sharp increase in American wounded -- with nearly 300 more in the first week of October -- is a grim measure of the degree to which the U.S. military has been thrust into the lead of the effort to stave off full-scale civil war in Iraq, military officials and experts say. Beyond Baghdad, Marines battling Sunni insurgents in Iraq's western province of Anbar last month also suffered their highest number of wounded in action since late 2004.

More than 20,000 U.S. troops have been wounded in combat in the Iraq war, and about half have returned to duty. While much media reporting has focused on the more than 2,700 killed, military experts say the number of wounded is a more accurate gauge of the fierceness of fighting because advances in armor and medical care today allow many service members to survive who would have perished in past wars. The ratio of wounded to killed among U.S. forces in Iraq is about 8 to 1, compared with 3 to 1 in Vietnam.

"These days, wounded are a much better measure of the intensity of the operations than killed," said Anthony H. Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

The surge in wounded comes as U.S. commanders issue increasingly dire warnings about the threat of civil war in Iraq, all but ruling out cuts in the current contingent of more than 140,000 U.S. troops before the spring of 2007. Last month Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top commander in the Middle East, said "sectarian tensions, if left unchecked, could be fatal to Iraq," making it imperative that the U.S. military now focus its "main effort" squarely on Baghdad.

Thousands of additional U.S. troops have been ordered to Baghdad since July to reinforce Iraqi soldiers and police who failed to halt -- or were in some cases complicit in -- a wave of hundreds of killings of Iraqi civilians by rival Sunni and Shiite groups.

U.S. commanders have appealed for weeks for 3,000 more Iraqi army troops to help secure Baghdad but as of Thursday had received only a few hundred, according to military officials in the Iraqi capital. Mistrust of Iraqi police in Baghdad remains high, Abizaid said. Last week, an Iraqi police brigade with hundreds of officers was removed from duty over its involvement in sectarian killings.

"The Baghdad security plan and the general spiral of operations is driving us to be more active than we have been in recent months," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution, a Washington-based think tank. "We have more people on patrols and out of base, so we get more people hurt and killed in firefights," he said, explaining that U.S. military offensives -- more than other factors such as shifting enemy tactics -- tend to drive the number of American casualties.

In March, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that Iraqi forces -- not U.S. troops -- would deal with a civil war in Iraq "to the extent one were to occur." Today's operations in Baghdad demonstrate that that goal was not realistic, experts say.

"In a sense, the Baghdad security plan is a complete repudiation of the earlier Rumsfeld doctrine where he said the Iraqis would prevent the civil war," said O'Hanlon.

Despite the mounting cost in U.S. wounded and dead -- including 13 American soldiers killed in combat in Baghdad in three days last week -- Pentagon officials say aggressive military operations in the Iraqi capital are at best a short-term and partial solution, buying time for political compromise, which they call the only way to arrest Iraq's disintegration.

"The Baghdad security plan will only be a temporary fix," said a Pentagon official who has served in Iraq. "You need to address the root causes," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

The rising toll of wounded reflects ongoing heavy combat in Anbar as well as in Baghdad, where U.S. troops face an escalation of small-arms and other attacks as they push into the city's most violent neighborhoods to rein in sectarian death squads, militias and insurgents, officers say.

"Attacks against the coalition have definitely increased as . . . the enemy is trying to come in and reestablish themselves" in a dozen religiously divided districts in east and west Baghdad, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman for the U.S. military command in the city. "There's a lot of weapons in Baghdad," contributing to an increase in enemy attacks using small arms, he said.

Withington said he was not authorized to release the number of U.S. military personnel wounded in Baghdad or the number of attacks in the city, although the military has released such data in the past.

A survey of reports on combat deaths from August through early October, however, shows an increase in those killed in Baghdad from small-arms fire as well as bombs along roads. Dense urban terrain in the city of 6 million people, where enemy fighters have many places to hide and can attack from close quarters, reduces the advantage of the better-trained and better-equipped U.S. forces.

"September was horrific" in terms of the toll of wounded, and if the early October trend continues, this month could be "the worst month of the war," said John E. Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a Virginia-based Web site that tracks defense issues.

The worsening violence in Baghdad has led some Pentagon officials to criticize decisions by the U.S. military since early 2005 to transfer responsibility for security in large swaths of Baghdad to Iraqi forces while cutting back on American patrols.

"We made decisions to take an indirect approach, which is great if you want low U.S. casualty rates," said the Pentagon official. However, he said: "Passing responsibility to Iraqis does not equal defeating terrorists and neutralizing the insurgency. Period."

Bomb Kills 14 In Iraqi City That Bush Had Lauded As Safe (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 7 -- A suicide car bomb slammed into an Iraqi army checkpoint Saturday and killed at least 14 people in Tall Afar, a northern city that President Bush has previously hailed as a symbol of security and normalcy in Iraq.

The fiery explosion, which occurred at 10 a.m. in the city's Salam neighborhood, also wounded at least 11 people, mainly civilians in cars that had been stopped at the checkpoint, authorities said.

"There were screams and shouts of people calling for help," said Hameed Buhriz, 43, a taxi driver who was wounded and knocked unconscious by the attack. "I felt like I was being crushed against the door of my car. After that, I do not recall what happened."

The assault -- which occurred as two construction workers were killed by gunmen west of the city -- followed another suicide bombing in Tall Afar last month that killed at least 21 people and wounded 18. Taken together, the attacks seemed to undercut the president's assertion in March that residents of Tall Afar "can count on a basic level of safety and security, they can live together peacefully."

Violence continued to rage across Iraq on Saturday. At least 25 people were killed in separate attacks, the Associated Press reported. The [a] news service quoted the Interior Ministry as saying 51 bodies had been found in Baghdad in the past 24 hours, many tortured and bound.

The U.S. military announced that a soldier assigned to the 3rd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division, was killed Friday by enemy action near the city of Baiji, north of Baghdad.

In Kirkuk, a volatile mixed city in the north, Iraqi and U.S.-led forces launched a major security operation, dubbed "the key to peace," to root out members of al-Qaeda and other Sunni Arab insurgent groups. Authorities imposed a 6 p.m. curfew and announced the detention of 155 suspected insurgents.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad met in Baghdad with more than 100 tribal leaders from volatile Anbar province who have formed a group, known as the Anbar Salvation Council, to fight al-Qaeda and insurgent groups. The tribal leaders have asked Maliki to sack the provincial government and replace it with their new council, but a government spokesman said such a decision would have to be made instead by the people of Anbar.

"If the people of Anbar do decide that they want to have this change," said the spokesman, Ali al-Dabbagh, "then the government does not object."

Suicide Bomber Kills 14 In Northern Iraq City (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 7 — A suicide bomber plowed into an Iraqi Army checkpoint in the northern city of Tal Afar on Saturday, killing 14 people and injuring an additional 10, Iraqi officials said.

It was the deadliest bombing in several weeks in Iraq, on a day where 29 people were reported killed across the country. In addition, Iraqi authorities found 51 bodies, many of them bound and showing signs of torture, in western and eastern Baghdad.

The American military on Saturday announced the death of one American soldier, who it said was killed "as the result of enemy action" near Bayji, a town north of Baghdad.

Sunni gunmen shot two Shiite bakery workers dead at their shop on Saturday morning, an Interior Ministry official said. The bakery, Al Nahrain, is in Mansour, a neighborhood in central Baghdad where Sunni Arab fighters gained a foothold this spring.

In Tal Afar, a dusty city near the Syrian border, the bomber blew himself up after ramming his car into the checkpoint, The Associated Press reported. Some of those killed were crushed when parts of buildings collapsed from the force of the explosion.

At various times since the American invasion, Tal Afar has been all but controlled by Sunni Arab insurgents. American forces have twice driven insurgents out of the area.

The attack was the fourth bomb attack on an army or police checkpoint in that city since the start of the holy month of Ramadan several weeks ago, [a news organization] reported.

In Baghdad on Saturday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki continued efforts at dialogue with Sunni Arab tribes of the western province of Anbar. Meeting with leaders in the Green Zone, Mr. Maliki called for a three-point plan to improve security in the war-torn province. The plan included broadening participation in local governments to include tribal leaders, financing a reconstruction effort, and assembling strong police and army forces quickly.

Iraqi authorities in the northern city of Kirkuk began a broad security crackdown, after an unusual curfew was imposed Friday night. Maj. Gen. Jamal Tahir said Iraqi and American troops were searching neighborhoods for weapons and militants, and that the curfew, imposed 6 p.m. on Friday, would be in place until further notice.

In the southern city of Najaf on Saturday, Iraq's oil minister, Hussein al-Shahristani, opened a new refinery with the capacity to process about 10,000 barrels of oil a day. Mr. Shahristani said the government planned to open another refinery in the south of Iraq, in Karbala, with a daily capacity of about 200,000 barrels.

Iraqi Troops Launch Crackdown In Kirkuk (HC/AP)

By Lee Keath

Houston Chronicle/AP, October 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Thousands of Iraqi troops launched a crackdown in Kirkuk today, ordering residents to stay in their homes in an effort to put down violence that has swelled in the north amid efforts to rein in bloodshed in Baghdad.

Elsewhere in the north, a suicide bomber rammed a police checkpoint with an explosives-packed car, killing 14 people in the town of Tal Afar. It was the deadliest attack in a day that saw 26 Iraqis killed around the country.

In March, President Bush had pointed to Tal Afar as an example of progress made in bringing security to Iraq after a major U.S. offensive swept through the town, 30 miles from the Syrian border.

But after a period of quiet, today's was the fourth suicide attack in the town in the past three weeks.

Thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops have been carrying out an intensified sweep of Baghdad since August, searching neighborhood by neighborhood to root out insurgents and militias who have killed thousands this year.

But at the same time, shootings, bombings and other attacks has been swelling in northern areas such as Kirkuk and Mosul, the capital of the province where Tal Afar is located — though the bloodshed has not been on the scale seen in Baghdad.

The U.S. military announced today that a U.S. soldier was killed Friday near Beiji, about 60 miles southwest of Kirkuk.

Authorities in Kirkuk this week completed digging a 10-mile trench around the city's southern and western edges aimed at cutting off side roads to prevent car bombs from being brought into the city. Intensified checkpoints were set up on city entrances that remained.

Today, authorities announced a curfew had been extended to round-the-clock "until further notice," ordering all residents off the streets, said Kirkuk police chief Lt. Gen. Sherko Shaker.

"This operation comes as a measure to cleansing Kirkuk from weapons, as well to prevent the militants from having any chance to reorganize their abilities," he said. "We shouldn't give them any chance to rest."

DOJ_NMG_0078192

Troops conducted searches and raids today in the southern and western sectors of the city, where most of the Sunni Arab population is centered. So far, 150 suspected Sunni insurgents have been arrested and more than 220 assault rifles have been seized, Shaker said.

Kirkuk, located 180 miles north of Baghdad, is a major oil center and the focus of an ongoing struggle for power between its large Sunni and Kurdish populations.

The Kurds want to include the city in their autonomous zone further north and are working to resettle thousands of Kurds who were driven out during the regime of Saddam Hussein and replaced with Sunni Arabs.

Al-Qaida in Iraq and another major Sunni group, Ansar al-Sunna, have increased their presence in regions west of the city, said Sheik Abdul-Rahman al-Munshid, a top sheik in the Sunni Obeid tribe. He blamed Kurdish efforts in the city for fueling Sunni Arab support for insurgents.

"The demands of the Kurdish political forces and their attempt ... to work to make Kirkuk part of the northern region that have created worry among the non-Kurdish groups," he said.

Meanwhile, a suicide bomber rammed an explosives-packed vehicle into a police checkpoint in Tal Afar, killing four policemen and 10 civilians. Some of them died when parts of nearby homes collapsed from the force of the blast.

In nearby Mosul, gunmen killed a woman whose son works with the city police, Mosul police Col. Abdel-Karim al-Jubouri said. A Kurdish lawyer was shot to death in front of his home in the evening.

Gunmen killed five people in separate shooting attacks on roads northwest of Mosul, including three Iraqis who worked at a nearby military base.

In Baghdad today, gunmen sprayed a Shiite-owned bakery in the Mansour district with bullets, killing two people and wounding one.

More bodies with bound hands and signs of torture on them were found; two were in the Tigris River in downtown Baghdad and five others were dumped in a southeastern suburb.

Meanwhile, the U.S. command said it had captured 28 suspected terrorists in a series of nine raids early Tuesday in the Jisr Diyala neighborhood of southeastern Baghdad. Among those were three "high value individuals, including the No. 9 person on the division's high-value target list."

U.S., Iraqi Forces Clash With Insurgents (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday/AP, October 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- U.S. and Iraqi forces fought militiamen early Sunday in Diwaniyah, a southern city under the growing influence of the Mahdi Army loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Fighting could be seen in two neighborhoods and heavy explosions were heard.

An Associated Press reporter saw U.S. soldiers sealing off roads to the city, in an apparent attempt to keep the insurgents from bringing in reinforcements.

Fighting broke out after a joint U.S.-Iraqi unit raided the house of Kifah al-Greiti, a Mahdi Army commander in the city, said Iraqi Army Capt. Fatiq Ayed.

The U.S. command in Baghdad had no immediate comment on the fighting.

Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of Baghdad was the scene of a fierce fight in August between the Mahdi Army and Iraqi forces that left 23 Iraqi troops and 50 militiamen dead and scores wounded.

Baker Panel May Recommend Federal Iraq (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 8, 2006

A commission chaired by former U.S. Secretary of State James Baker may recommend a federal Iraq divided among the country's three major groups.

"The Kurds already effectively have their own area," a source close to the group told the Times of London. "The federalization of Iraq is going to take place one way or another. The challenge for the Iraqis is how to work that through."

Baker's panel was set up by Congress with President George W. Bush's approval in an effort to break out of what appears to be a dead end in Iraq, with the United States unable to create a stable regime, the newspaper said. Baker was secretary of state during the first Gulf War while Bush's father was president.

The source said the report to be released next month would favor devolving power to Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish regions with considerable autonomy. A weak central government would be involved with distribution of oil revenues, border security and foreign affairs.

Listen To The Iraqis (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

With our Iraq policy floundering, it's time to take advice from the experts — the Iraqis themselves.

And Iraqis are crystal clear about what the U.S. should do: announce a timetable for withdrawal of our troops within one year. They're right. Our failure to declare a timetable and, above all, our coveting long-term military bases in Iraq feed the insurgency and end up killing more young Americans.

A terrifying new poll conducted last month found that 61 percent of Iraqis now approve of attacks on Americans. That figure, up from 47 percent in January, makes counter-insurgency efforts almost impossible, because ordinary people now cheer, shelter and protect those who lay down bombs to kill Americans. The big change is that while Iraqi Sunnis were always in favor of blowing up Americans, members of the Shiite majority are now 50 percent more likely to support violent attacks against Americans than they were in January.

The poll, by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, also found that 78 percent of Iraqis now believe that the American military presence is "provoking more conflict than it is preventing."

So ordinary Iraqis themselves — who have the most at stake — overwhelmingly think they will be better off if U.S. forces leave according to a timetable. Only 9 percent prefer President Bush's policy of toughing it out, while 71 percent favor a withdrawal within one year.

This midterm election season is an ideal time for a public debate on Iraq policy, and Senator John Warner, the longtime Republican leader on military issues, is right to raise the possibility of a "change of course." The evidence suggests ever more clearly what we should do: Don't rush for the exits, but renounce permanent bases and announce that we will withdraw our troops within one year.

Renouncing bases should be a no-brainer, and it would be the simplest way to save American lives. Seventy-seven percent of Iraqis say the U.S. plans permanent bases in Iraq. (They're right, although we hem and haw about it.) And as the poll discovered, "the belief that the United States plans to have permanent bases in Iraq is highly correlated with support for attacks on U.S.-led forces."

Iraqis who don't think the U.S. wants bases are half as likely to favor attacks on Americans as those who do think the U.S. wants bases. And so if President Bush stands up and unequivocally renounces bases, that will reduce popular support for attacks — and save American lives.

"There is also some evidence that if the United States were to make a commitment to withdraw according to a timetable, support for attacks would diminish," the survey found. For example, half of those who approved of attacks said they would be less supportive if the U.S. did announce a timetable for withdrawal.

The biggest mistake we Americans have made all over the world in the post-World War II era, from China and Vietnam to Latin America and Iraq, has been the failure to appreciate the appeal of nationalism. Ironically, it's the same big mistake King George III made in the 1770's.

All our options are bad, and I worry that a timetable will encourage the insurgents to hang on until we leave. Or maybe Iraq will fall apart no matter what we do. But the evidence is pretty strong that our presence — because of suspicions that we plan to stay forever — is doing more harm than good. One poll conducted by our own State Department found that nearly three-quarters of Baghdad residents said they would feel safer if U.S. forces left Iraq, according to The Washington Post.

The present policy is also nurturing a broader extremism. A letter seized by the U.S. military and reported by The Christian Science Monitor suggests that Al Qaeda itself is rooting for the U.S. to "stay the course" rather than withdraw. "Prolonging the war is in our interest," the Qaeda letter says, presumably as a tool for propaganda and recruitment.

A U.N. report found that the Iraqi insurgency is inspiring the Taliban fighters in Afghanistan. New designs for bombs are used in Afghanistan just a month after they make their appearance in Iraq.

Likewise, Sudan's president is able to defy calls for international peacekeepers in Darfur because he plays on Arab fears that the U.S. plans to do to Sudan what it has done to Iraq. All over the globe, American diplomacy is hobbled because of Iraq.

So it's time to face the grim reality and announce that all our troops will leave Iraq by October 2007.

US Puts Maliki On The Clock In Iraq (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United States is putting Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki and fellow Iraqi leaders on the clock, as frustration in Washington mounts at his government's inability to stem raging violence.

DOJ_NMG_0078194

A fearsome week in Iraq which saw Baghdad's worst rash of bombings in three years and a surge in the numbers of US soldiers killed, tightened the political screws on President George W. Bush's administration ahead of crucial November elections.

Top US officials further sharpened the public US message towards the Maliki government -- a process which started with anonymous quotes by US officials leaked to US newspapers in September -- and reached a new pitch when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flew into Baghdad on Thursday.

Comments by influential Republican Senator John Warner, meanwhile, fuelled perceptions that a new debate may be emerging on the direction of Iraq policy among members of the administration and political allies.

"The security situation is not one to be tolerated, and is not one that is helped by political inaction," Rice said on her trip to Baghdad this week, which started with the uncomfortable image of the US secretary of state being forced to circle the airport for 45 minutes because of a rocket attack.

Rice complimented Maliki on his "excellent" leadership and strength, but the steel in the US message was a call for the prime minister to bring together all factions in Baghdad to stop the killing.

She flew into Baghdad after Iraq's political leaders signed a pledge to halt sectarian violence, but there are already doubts in Washington that they will follow up on their promises.

Rice did not provide a deadline, but US ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad indicated a week ago on CNN that the window for critical action to stem the carnage in Iraq may be down to two months.

Deputy White House spokeswoman Dana Perino also noted Friday that Iraq was at a "crucial moment," while reiterating strong US public support for Maliki.

The comments by Warner, a World War II veteran who chairs the powerful Senate Armed Services Committee, caused a stir, when he complained that Iraq was "drifting sideways" after returning from his own visit.

He warned the government did not seem to be pulling the "levers" of sovereignty.

"In two or three months, if this thing hasn't come to fruition and this level of violence is not under control, I think it's a responsibility of our government to determine: Is there a change of course we should take?"

The administration hinted in recent weeks that its continuing support for the Maliki government, and the price it pays in blood and treasure on its behalf, is not a one-sided bargain.

"Iraq can count on our partnership, as long as the new government continues to make hard decisions necessary to advance a unified, democratic and peaceful Iraq," Bush said in an August speech.

What Washington might do if it decides Iraq's government is not making those "hard" choices is not clear.

"The United States is obviously constantly looking at what we're doing and reviewing our options and our policies," said Rice, but she made clear that the US administration was not going to remove American support for the Iraqi government if it could not stand on its own feet.

Some observers have seen veiled US hints as the start of a public relations strategy that would provide a rationale for a drawdown of US troops.

But the administration is adamant American forces will not leave until the Iraqi government and military can control the country.

Other plans floating around Congress include one which would see Iraq divided into sectors for Kurds, Sunnis and Shiites, though that appears fraught with problems.

The real debate on where to go next is likely to heat up after the name-calling and political posturing over Iraq die down following November's congressional elections.

A report is due by the Iraq Study Group, a group of US public service grandees asked by Bush to examine the situation in Iraq and US policy options.

Led by Bush family fixer and former US secretary of state James Baker, the group has already echoed US government warnings that the status quo in Iraq cannot continue indefinitely.

"The next three months are critical. Before the end of this year, this government needs to show progress in securing Baghdad, pursuing national reconciliation and delivering basic services," group co-chair Lee Hamilton told reporters in September.

Analysis: U.S. Influence On Iraq Limited (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 8, 2006

The Bush administration is bumping up against the limits of military and political power to influence what happens next in Iraq, four years into an increasingly unpopular war that has not gone as planned.

DOJ_NMG_0078195

As U.S. officials now acknowledge, the cycle of sectarian killings poses a greater threat than does al-Qaida or the anti-American insurgency.

"The security situation is not one that can be tolerated and it is not one that is being helped by political inaction," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said last week at the start of a two-day trip to Iraq.

The day Rice arrived, a leading Republican and Bush loyalist offered a bleak assessment of Iraq. Sen John Warner, R-Va., said Iraq is "drifting sideways" and that the U.S. military has done what it could.

Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Congress must make some "bold decisions" if, after three months, the Iraqis have not made progress to calm ethnic violence and hasten reconstruction.

Rice's visit came a month before the fall elections in the United States that Democrats are portraying as a referendum on President Bush's handling of Iraq.

Associated Press-Ipsos polling in September found that more than half of likely voters say the U.S. is losing ground in Iraq, and Democrats got higher marks than Republicans about which party would best handle the conflict. Forty-six percent of likely voters said Democrats and 40 percent said Republicans.

Democrats argue that Iraq had nothing to do with the Sept. 11 attacks and that the war has been a costly distraction from the global effort to combat al-Qaida and its leader, Osama bin Laden.

In Iraq's capital, Rice reaffirmed Bush's commitment to help Iraqis finish the job.

She also carried an implicit warning about Americans' patience as she shuttled under heavy guard among the often squabbling factions in Iraq's fragile government.

People in the U.S., she told the Iraqi politicians, do not see the complicated history of grudges and strife among ethnic groups that drives the current violence.

"What they see are Iraqis killing Iraqis, and that is not a good image," a U.S. diplomat who attended the meetings later quoted Rice as saying. "The world, the American people, need to see different views. They need to see Iraqis working together and producing progress."

In other words, Rice was saying, the folks at home who are bankrolling the war at $300 billion and counting may not see why American lives and dollars are being spent to police internecine fighting half a world away.

The U.S. diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice's sessions with Shiites, Sunnis and others were private, also said Rice was frank about the stakes.

Rice told the Iraqis that "of all of the threats facing Iraq — the insurgency, al-Qaida terror, sectarian violence — it's sectarian violence that poses the strategic threat to success, as Iraqis would define it, for their country and in certainly success as we would define it for Iraq."

It also is the force that the United States has the least leverage to counter.

The bodies dumped on Baghdad streets each night are unrelated to the presence of U.S. troops, although mounting deaths among U.S. soldiers reflect the latest attempt to slow the revenge killings.

The United States has put increasing pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to stop sectarian violence amid deep divisions within his Cabinet between Shiite and Sunni parties.

Sunnis complain al-Maliki is hesitant to take tough action against Shiite militias because many of them are linked to parties he relies on. His signature plan to contain the spiral of violence in Baghdad has had little effect, and it is not clear how much authority he commands to do more.

The U.S. claim that democratic politics will triumph in Iraq depends largely on al-Maliki's success, and Rice praised him as a strong and capable leader.

At the same time, she told reporters, she was firm in "saying very clearly to all of them that what the Iraqi people expect, and indeed what the United States expects, is that they're going to overcome any political differences rapidly."

Iraq Youths See Frozen Futures (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 7 — In a dimly lighted living room in central Baghdad, Noor is a lonely teenage prisoner. Many of his friends have left the country, and some who have stayed have strange new habits: a Shiite acts holier-than-thou; a Sunni joins an armed gang.

At 19, Noor is neither working nor in college. He is not even allowed outdoors.

Three and a half years after the American invasion, the relentless violence that has disfigured much of Iraqi society is hitting young Iraqis in new ways. Young people from five Baghdad neighborhoods say that their lives have shrunk to the size of their bedrooms and that their dreams have been packed away and largely forgotten. Life is lived in moments. It is no longer possible to make plans.

"I can't go outside, I can't go to college," said Noor, sitting in the kitchen waiting for tea to boil. "If I'm killed, it doesn't even matter because I'm dead right now."

The American military is trying to address the problem. In August, it began the most systematic series of sweeps of Baghdad since the war began, trying to make the worst neighborhoods safe for a return to normal life. It appears to be bearing some fruit, with deaths in the city down about 17 percent in August from July, according to a United Nations report based on morgue statistics.

But violence between the sects here continues at a frantic pace, wiping out ever more of what middle ground remains. And it has left young Iraqis trying to resist its pull frozen in an impossible present with no good future in sight.

The speed of the descent has been breathtaking. A few short months ago, Noor was taking final exams, squabbling with his little brother and hanging out at home with his friends. But violence touched the family's outer edge — his father's business partner was killed on a desert road far from Baghdad because he was a Shiite — and things began to unravel.

Fearing that the man may have divulged details about them, Noor's parents accelerated their plans for Noor and his younger brother to leave Iraq. His brother was moved to the safety of northern Iraq, but Noor was forced to return after British authorities rejected his application for a student visa.

Since coming back, he spends most days in his living room on the computer, listening to the sounds of life outside his gate. He wants to enroll in college here and even had one of his friends sneak him an application, but his parents will not let him go. Campuses are volatile mixes of sects and ethnicities, and sectarian killings of students are no longer rare.

Before the epidemic of neighborhood assassinations began last year, it was a rare middle-class Iraqi who had a peer involved in sectarian killing. But as the killing spread, increasingly larger portions of the population have been radicalized.

For Noor, a secular Sunni who is solidly middle class, the sectarian killing has broken squarely into his circle of friends. A friend from Adhamiya, Baghdad's Sunni Arab center, joined a neighborhood militia after his father was shot to death in front of their home. Noor heard through friends that he had set up a roadside bomb to kill Iraqi troops.

"He hates the Shia because they killed his father," said Noor, speaking in fluent English and gesturing with his hands. "He became a different person. He became a monster."

It is that radicalization that most frightens Noor's mother. Most of the casualties and the perpetrators in the sectarian killing are young men, and with few jobs and no hope for justice through the government, armed gangs and militias are extremely alluring.

"I'm afraid he'll be drawn to certain currents," she said. "There is a lot of anger inside."

Subtler is the changing nature of his friendships. A few of his Shiite friends feel a new passion for their identity, and he now finds it difficult to relate to them. "They changed," he said. "They talk a lot about identity."

"I can't tell them my true feelings," he added. "I started to expect something bad from them."

As little as a year ago, most Iraqis dismissed fears of sectarian war. Iraqis of different sects had always mixed, they argued, and no amount of bombing would change that. But as the texture of the violence changed from spectacular car bombs set by Sunnis to quiet killings in neighborhoods of both sects, few still cling to that belief.

Three days a week, Safe, 21, walks around sleepy. He stands guard with a machine gun three nights a week to protect his block in the ravaged neighborhood of Dora. As a Sunni Arab, he fears Shiite death squads and policemen. Seven of his friends have been detained and beaten. He has attended more than a dozen funerals in recent months for Sunnis who have been killed.

"Sectarian stuff has come into our life from all doors," he said, speaking in quick bursts. "I am afraid of these checkpoints. They tell you five minutes, and keep you for a month."

The constant battle has left a bad taste in his mouth for Shiites who strongly assert their identity. He got into a fistfight with a Shiite student at the medical school where he studies over the meaning of a Muslim holiday. His campus is in heavily Shiite eastern Baghdad, and a professor referred to the healing powers of a sacred Shiite imam during a physiology lecture this year, to the fury of the Sunni students. Even the typical Shiite jewelry, silver rings with smooth round stones, he finds irritating.

"When you see them, you want to throw up," he said, referring to chauvinist Shiites.

Dora, once a mixed middle-class neighborhood, has been among the most lethal for Shiites over the past two years. Shiite residents report brutal killings for offenses as minor as pinning up posters of Shiite saints in shops. Now few Shiites remain.

Safe acknowledged that Shiites were singled out, but said insurgents only went after those working with Americans. Other Shiites received threats for spying on mosques, he said.

(He worked at an American base for two months shortly after the American invasion but was not threatened because those who were issuing them knew him, he said.)

DOJ_NMG_0078197

For Safe, whose father died when he was young and whose mother died of cancer last year, his neighborhood watch group helps him to have a sense of purpose, to feel connected, at a time when young Iraqis are more isolated than they have ever been.

"If something happens, we are all just one hand," he said.

While they serve as useful new social networks, the groups are largely based on sectarian identity, helping to reinforce increasingly homogeneous districts. Safe has no Shiite relatives and no plans to marry. Even if he did, he would never accept a Shiite, he said.

As Baghdad grows increasingly divided into a Shiite east and a Sunni west along the Tigris River, neighborhood life offers few opportunities for young Shiites and Sunnis to mix.

Every morning, Ali Wahid, 27, rides his motorbike past a dusty soccer park in the capital's largest Shiite district, Sadr City, to work in southeastern Baghdad. He holds tightly to his job, a water project that is part of the American effort here, but would never agree to go west of the Tigris, where vast swaths of Sunni neighborhoods are deadly for Shiites like him. A friend, Hamza Daraji, who does odd jobs in Sadr City, said he had not left the district in two years.

Mr. Wahid, sitting cross-legged on the floor of his modest two-story house, says his life has improved since the American invasion. His job has allowed him to pay off debts, buy a house with his brothers and even afford to marry.

Fewer Sunnis are in his life now than there were when Saddam Hussein ruled. In some ways, relations then were easier, he said, because as the ruling class, the Sunnis, were less likely to lash out.

"Before I could joke with Sunnis about Saddam," he said. "Now if I talk against him, I'm afraid they might hurt me later in a secret way."

The Sharqiya Secondary School in central Baghdad began the day with a prayer on Thursday. The new headmaster, a religious Shiite, took the unusual step of telling the entire student body, several hundred girls, that "the first way we hail the Iraqi flag is by giving prayers to Muhammad and his family," referring to the Prophet Muhammad and his family members, whom Shiites consider to be holy. Three Armenian Christians raised the flag.

"We feel desperate, desperate, desperate," said Sena Hussein, an assistant principal whose daughter is a high school senior. The school, once known citywide for its basketball team, no longer has after-school sports, because parents consider the security situation to be too risky. Trophies in a dusty glass cabinet stand a short way from the entrance to the principal's office. Even enrollment is down. The school used to get 150 new students a year. This year it has about 60.

Prospects for higher education for women coming of age in the capital have also dimmed.

Sara, a graceful 10th grader with perfect English and straight A's, will not be allowed to go to college in Iraq by her parents, who fear sectarian killings en route and on campuses themselves. The caution will cut out the mixing of young Iraqi men and women, because college is the first chance they get to be together. High schools in Iraq are single-sex institutions.

"The future is totally unclear for me now," she said, standing in the courtyard of the school as girls buzzed behind her, busily cleaning classrooms. "I don't know what would happen to me in college. Maybe I would get killed."

In a conversation later on her cellphone after a Ramadan dinner, Sara confided that her family was trying to leave the country, but that if they could not get out, she would seriously think about marrying after high school. Her mother married at 24, after she had earned a degree in civil engineering.

"Their time was different in a thousand ways," she said, her young voice suddenly serious. "It's hard for me to accept. There is no dream for me. I can't really think clearly."

She paused and then spoke a familiar refrain: "I really, really want to leave Iraq."

Amid A Kidnapping, Silence (LAT)

By Saif Rasheed And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Witnesses can only hold still and then turn away as a shopkeeper in Baghdad is beaten and abducted. Around Iraq, the death toll climbs.

BAGHDAD — Everyone stayed quiet.

The gunmen ordered witnesses to stand aside and remain still Saturday afternoon as they dragged the shopkeeper known as Abu Ammar away. The victim didn't say a word, though he squirmed and tried to break free.

"Stay where you are," one of the gunmen, a cleanshaven man in his 20s wearing a black bulletproof vest and holding an assault rifle, quietly told the frozen passersby. "Don't move."

The eight plainclothes kidnappers didn't even raise their voices when one of them smashed the shopkeeper's bespectacled face with the butt of an assault rifle. They shooed away a shop employee beseeching them to take along a small plastic bag, possibly filled with the 50-ish victim's medicines, stuffed him into one of two white sport utility vehicles without license plates and drove away from the Colors stationery shop.

Drivers watching from their cars turned their heads and continued on their way. Pedestrians took hold of their loved ones and proceeded with their errands.

It was business as usual in Iraq, where at least 81 people were killed or found slain Saturday around the country.

The victim at the two-story shop, known for its high quality, wide selection and pricey wares, probably was the target of a kidnapping for ransom.

In Baghdad alone, police discovered the bodies of 51 gunshot victims, some killed on the streets and others abducted, blindfolded and brutalized before being shot and dumped in desolate lots.

The 3 p.m. kidnapping was pulled off in central Baghdad's Karada neighborhood, one of the city's safest, less than a mile from military forces stationed in the Green Zone and a few hundred yards from Iraqi police checkpoints and the armed security details of political parties and Western contractors.

It put on view the enormous challenge of restoring security to a country coming undone by multiple layers of violence.

Iraqi sports fans Saturday were mourning Nasser Shamil, the 37-year-old former captain of the Iraqi volleyball team, who was shot and killed Thursday night at his goldsmith shop in a Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad.

Among the 51 bodies found in Baghdad, two were fished out of the Tigris River, both with bullet wounds to the head and signs of torture. An additional five, found blindfolded, handcuffed and shot execution-style, were discovered in a dump 10 miles east of the capital.

At least two more Iraqis were killed by roadside bombs aimed at passing Iraqi police and U.S. vehicle convoys.

To stanch the capital's violence, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki last week announced the creation of neighborhood security committees composed of community leaders. But the plan remains on the drawing board and has yet to be put into practice, politicians said.

"Nothing is concrete now," said Salim Abdullah Jabouri, a spokesman for the main Sunni Arab parliamentary bloc. "Everything is on paper."

U.S. and Iraqi officials struggled to contain violence beyond the capital. A car bomb targeting an army checkpoint in the northern city of Tall Afar killed 14 Iraqis and injured 13.

At least three people were killed and three injured in mortar and bomb attacks in the mostly Shiite city of Hillah, south of Baghdad. Clashes between police and insurgents in downtown Samarra, north of the capital, led to the deaths of two officers and a child caught in the crossfire.

Iraqi police and soldiers, supported by U.S. Army troops and helicopters, intensified operations in several hot spots around the country. More than 14,000 soldiers and police officers sealed off the gritty northern oil city of Kirkuk before conducting house-to-house sweeps in search of weapons and suspected insurgents.

The crackdown has prevented residents from shopping for food during Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of daytime fasting.

"The puzzle in all this is that we do not know when it will be over," said Nozad Qadir, a Kirkuk resident.

Iraqi soldiers launched raids in the religiously and ethnically mixed province of Diyala, northeast of Baghdad, killing at least four suspected insurgents. The bodies of four victims of apparent sectarian violence were discovered in different parts of Baqubah, the provincial capital.

The following is the concluding paragraph of a letter sent by an Army captain struggling to make sense of his recently ended tour of duty in Iraq. Like many who have spent time there, he offers a summation of his experiences. But his stands out for its eloquence. This excerpt follows his discussion of how the United States might withdraw from Iraq by supporting a partition of the country.

. . . So we would leave Iraq, scarred, but hopefully smarter as well. The "long war" is a war of ideas. If Iraq is to teach us anything, it must be that a new idea cannot be beat into a society. I'm a believer in John Stuart Mill's assertion that "All people have the government they deserve," implying that both the choice and its consequences belong to the society as a whole. Rather than putting my faith in the force of arms to transform a society, I put my faith in the force of our ideas. The power of the idea of America had been on the march for half a century -- vanquishing its contrapositive in the form of global communism and gradually changing the face of the world -- until those who didn't really believe it themselves corrupted that idea. "Extraordinary rendition," Guantanamo Bay, and Abu Ghraib have all become shorthand for an America (or an American administration) that lost faith in the power of its own idea. Their hypocrisy seemingly exposed, people who had embraced and were gradually working towards that American idea in the world's most volatile regions were emasculated. These liberals, moderates, progressives and reformers have been overwhelmed by a new generation of extremists determined that an open society in which people were free to express themselves, to make decisions about how to live their own lives, and to have a voice in dictating the laws that would govern them was not a desirable one. What gives me some degree of hope is the ultimate vacuity of this alternative to the American idea. But as long as they can point to the adoo baeed -- the external enemy -- to deflect the blame from their own moral and material bankruptcy, they may stay afloat. If we're able to reassert our idea and to hold it up to people as a real choice, I know this current setback can be overcome. No amount of violence inflicted in the name of freedom, however, will be the force to bring it about.

Respect At Issue For Corpsman, Marines (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON — As a sailor among Marines, corpsman Melson Bacos was an outsider. Now he is poised to be the star witness as Marine Corps prosecutors push to convict seven Marines of murder in the first high-profile Iraq war case to hit Camp Pendleton.

Bacos' court-martial proceeding Friday exposed the complex relationship between combat Marines and the sailors who follow them into battle to patch up their wounds.

In exchange for a light sentence, Bacos has promised to testify against the seven, all charged with murdering an unarmed disabled Iraqi man in Hamandiya in April.

Lawyers say the prospect of his detailed testimony may prod other defendants to cut their own deals.

Sentenced to a year in the brig, the 21-year-old petty officer 3rd class probably will be behind bars for only five more months, after being given credit for good behavior and 142 days already served. Without the plea bargain, the judge said he would have sentenced Bacos to 10 years in prison.

Bacos, with a soft voice and slight build, said he felt powerless to stop the Marines from carrying out a plan to kidnap a suspected insurgent, kill him and then plant phony evidence to make it look as if he'd been caught burying a roadside bomb.

In explaining his actions to the military judge, Bacos said that he pleaded with one Marine to let 52-year-old Hashim Ibrahim Awad go, but the Marine replied with an epithet suggesting Bacos lacked manhood.

Navy corpsman Brandon Snow, testifying on behalf of Bacos, said that it is not easy for corpsmen to be accepted by combat Marines.

"You have to earn that respect and trust as their corpsman," Snow said.

By their nature, Marine infantry troops are clannish. They call each other "grunts" and disdain outsiders as POGs — people other than grunts.

When Marines go into combat, each carries an M-16 assault rifle, a weapon that requires precision handling. Corpsmen, including Bacos, usually carry shotguns, considered a weapon easily handled. Some Marines don't consider the corpsmen to be full members of their teams.

Bacos, the son of Philippine immigrants, enlisted after high school. He said he did not protest the plan to kill an Iraqi on April 26 because he "wanted to be part of the team." But he also said he told another corpsman after the killing that they were different from Marines.

There was no ambivalence when Bacos talked of his first deployment to Iraq with Kilo Company, of the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, during the November 2004 fight in Fallouja.

He said the phrase "corpsman-up," the call for a corpsman to rush to a wounded Marine, still "brings chills to me."

"It brings me memories of Marines who have died," he said.

In possibly the most dramatic moment in the court hearing, Bacos listed from memory the names of nine Marines with his company who were killed in Fallouja. A picture was shown of a memorial service held in Iraq, with nine rifles and nine helmets.

To the judge and later to reporters, Bacos said that by not stopping the April 26 killing he had lost his honor. The only way to regain that honor, he said, was to plead guilty and seek forgiveness.

In March 2003, as Marines crossed into Iraq, each Marine and corpsman received a statement from Maj. Gen. James N. Mattis, then commander of the 1st Marine Division, telling them to "carry out your mission and keep your honor clean."

Mattis is now a lieutenant general and the convening authority in the Hamandiya case and he approved Bacos' plea bargain.

'Secret' Chart Wasn't (WT)

By Terence P. Jeffrey

Bob Woodward's "State of Denial" got scooped on what was presented on national TV as the book's most sensational revelation -- that enemy attacks in Iraq have been escalating.

The Government Accountability Office and the Defense Department beat Mr. Woodward to reporting this information, and reported it in greater detail.

The government's open reporting on the increasing number of enemy attacks also refutes the charge Mr. Woodward made in collaboration with Mike Wallace on CBS' "60 Minutes" on Sunday that the administration kept this "trend" secret to deceive people about how badly the war is going.

Mr. Woodward writes about a May 24, 2006, Joint Chiefs of Staff intelligence assessment classified "Secret." It included two charts indicating enemy attacks in Iraq were escalating. A bar graph (reproduced on Page 472 of the book) indicated that between January and May of this year, average attacks per day had increased from 72 to 113. A line graph (reproduced on Page 473) indicated attacks per month had risen from less than 500 in May 2003 to more than 3,500 in May 2006.

On Page 476, Mr. Woodward concedes that two days after the "Secret" JCS intelligence assessment was circulated in May, the Defense Department published its quarterly report to Congress on the Iraq war and included a similar chart on the attack trend: "Though there was a chart buried in the middle of the 65-page document showing that average weekly attacks were up to over 600, the document put the most positive spin on stability and security."

In fact, where Mr. Woodward's "Secret" graph showed only the trend in the average daily attacks from January to May of this year, the Defense Department's public graph showed the trend in average weekly attacks for six different periods of the war. The latest was February-May of this year, which Defense called the "Government Transition" period, when attacks were more than 600 per week. The report stated plainly, "Overall, average weekly attacks during this 'Government Transition' period were higher than any of the previous periods."

Yet, on "60 Minutes," Mr. Woodward's second chart from the "Secret" JCS intelligence assessment was presented as evidence the administration had tried to cover up this trend. "When you say the Bush administration has not told the truth about Iraq, what do you mean?" Mr. Wallace asked Mr. Woodward.

"I think probably the prominent, most prominent example is the level of violence," said Mr. Woodward. "Not just the growing sectarian violence, Sunnis against Shias that gets reported everyday ... but attacks on U.S., Iraqi and allied forces," Mr. Wallace said in a voiceover as the "Secret" chart flashed on the screen. "Woodward says that's the most important measure of violence in Iraq, and he unearthed this graph, classified secret, that shows those attacks have increased dramatically over the last three years." In another voiceover, Mr. Wallace says, "Woodward says the government had kept this trend secret for years before finally declassifying the graph just three weeks ago."

In fact, over the last 18 months, GAO has published written congressional testimony on at least six occasions that presented a progressively updated graph illustrating the same attack trend in Mr. Woodward's "Secret" graph. These include testimony released on March 14, 2005; Oct. 18, 2005; Feb. 8, 2006; April 26, 2006; July 11, 2006; and Sept. 11, 2006.

The GAO's bar graphs of the attack trend, readily available on the Internet, are superior to the "Secret" line graph Mr. Woodward reproduces in his book because the bars in the GAO's graphs are coded with shading to indicate the percentage of each month's attacks directed at different targets (i.e., coalition forces, Iraqi security forces, civilians, Iraqi government officials and infrastructure).

For example, on April 25, one month before the JCS circulated the "Secret" intelligence assessment cited by Mr. Woodward, GAO published testimony prepared by Comptroller General David Walker that features a bar graph headlined: "Enemy-Initiated Attacks Against the Coalition and its Partners, June 2003 through February." GAO sourced the information to the Multi-National Force-Iraq. Like Mr. Woodward's graph from the May 2006 intelligence assessment, GAO's April 2006 graph shows overall attacks rising from less than 500 in 2003 to about 2,500 in February 2006. Unlike Mr. Woodward's graph, GAO adds the detail that about 1,500 of these February attacks were aimed at coalition forces, while virtually all the rest were aimed at civilians or Iraqi forces. GAO did not downplay this disturbing trend.

In a section with the subheadline, "Insurgency has intensified and sectarian tensions increased," GAO said: "Over the past three years, significant increases in attacks against the coalition and coalition partners, as well as recent increases in sectarian violence, have made it difficult for the United States to achieve its political and security goals in Iraq. The insurgency in Iraq intensified from June 2003 through October 2005, and has remained strong and resilient."

GAO testimony released July 11 updated the attack-trend chart to include data through April, when attacks numbered about 3,300. GAO testimony released Sept. 11 updated the chart through July, when attacks numbered about 4,500 -- or about 1,000 more than the maximum reported by Mr. Woodward, whose chart stopped in May, when JCS circulated the "Secret" intelligence assessment that featured it.

Before and after the "Secret" chart reported by Mr. Woodward, GAO took the same information and posted it on the Internet.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Pledges To Work For School Safety (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 8, 2006

President Bush on Saturday lamented recent "shocking acts of violence" in schools, and promised his administration will do what it can to keep centers of learning safe for students.

The White House is convening a conference on school safety Tuesday. Federal officials, school workers, parents, law enforcement officials and other experts are to gather in Chevy Chase, Md., a Washington suburb noted for exceptional schools.

The conference is being hosted by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. Bush and his wife, Laura, are expected to attend part of it.

"Our goal is clear: Children and teachers should never fear for their safety when they enter a classroom," the president said in his weekly radio address.

In the past two weeks, three schools in three states have been hit by deadly attacks and several others have faced threats.

A gunman killed himself and five girls Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania. A 15-year-old Wisconsin student was arrested Sept. 29 in the shooting death of his principal. On Sept. 27 a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

Schools in Virginia, Nebraska, Nevada, Oklahoma, Oregon and Wisconsin have been closed or locked down in the past week because of threats of violence or guns on campus.

"Laura and I are praying for the victims and their families, and we extend our sympathies to them and to the communities that have been devastated by these attacks," the president said.

Bush also pushed for reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind law, which he says needs some changes. Under the law, schools that get federal poverty aid and fall short of their yearly progress goals for two straight years must offer transfers to students. After three years of failure, schools must offer low-income parents a choice of tutors.

The law is scheduled to be renewed by Congress next year, but some education observers have speculated it may be bumped until as late as 2009, after the next presidential election.

Leading Democrats backed passage of the law, but they now say Bush has not adequately funded it.

The president outlined a series of ways in which the law could be improved, such as by expanding testing in high schools, an idea he has pitched to Congress for two years. He also said he wants the federal government to pay for 28,000 low-income students across the country to transfer to private schools, and has asked for $100 million to pay for the initiative.

"Thanks to this good law, we are leaving behind the days when schools just shuffled children from grade to grade, whether they learned anything or not," Bush said. "Yet we still have a lot of work to do."

Bush Seeks Better Teachers, More Transfers With `No Child' Law (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, October 8, 2006

Oct. 7 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush proposed strengthening the No Child Left Behind law, saying he wants to further improve the quality of U.S. teachers and give parents more options to flee failing schools.

``The No Child Left Behind Act has brought good progress, yet we still have a lot of work to do,'' Bush said today in his weekly radio address.

The law, enacted in 2002, faces renewal next year. It enjoys support among members of both parties, though Democrats have complained that Bush and his Republican congressional allies aren't providing the money promised to improve struggling schools.

Bush's renewed focus on the law, four weeks before congressional elections, prompted a barrage of Democratic criticism about funding and issues such as administration policies for tracking minority children, ensuring school safety and establishing reading curriculum.

``This administration and the Republican Congress have turned the No Child Left Behind Act into a political slogan rather than the solemn oath," said Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, the top-ranking Democrat on the Senate Education Committee.

Kennedy, in a statement following Bush's visit Oct. 5 to a public charter school in Washington, said the law has been under- funded by more than $55 billion since enactment, shortchanging 3.7 million children this year.

Law's Penalties

Under the law, elementary and secondary schools that fall short of testing standards for two straight years must let students transfer to a different school in the district, then pay for tutoring in the third year. After six years, schools face the possible replacement of administrators and teachers.

The law is designed to ensure that all grade-school students reach minimum competency levels in subjects such as math and reading by 2014.

Bush said today that his plan for reauthorizing the law next year will include provisions to ``improve teacher quality, so that every child has an excellent teacher." No state met this year's deadline under No Child Left Behind for using only ``highly qualified" teachers in all classrooms.

Bush also promised today to ``give more options to parents whose children are trapped in struggling schools." Fewer than 1 percent of the nearly 4 million students eligible for transfers in the 2003-04 school year actually exercised the option, according to the Education Department.

Part of the reason for the low transfer rate is the time delay in reporting test results. Most states hadn't reported test results for the last school year by the time classes began this fall.

Charter Schools

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has said the administration hopes with the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind to increase the options for parents in low-performing schools. Her plan includes encouraging more charter schools, which are publicly funded and privately managed alternatives to traditional public schools.

Yet the Education Department reported in August that the nation's $6 billion charter school industry is performing at a lower level than traditional U.S. public schools in both reading and mathematics.

The Friendship-Woodridge Elementary and Middle School in Washington, where Bush visited Thursday, is one of only four, among 34 charter schools in the nation's capital, that currently meet the testing standards established by the No Child Left Behind law.

Representative George Miller of California, the top-ranking Democrat on the House Education Committee, said Bush ``needs to practice what he preaches" concerning accountability.

While Bush is promoting incentive pay for teachers, Republican leaders in Congress have failed to provide the money necessary for states to implement the idea, Miller said in a statement.

Democrat Complaints

Miller also is among a group of House Democrats who wrote last week to Spellings complaining of regulatory changes proposed by her department that would make it more difficult to keep statistics on performance by minority children.

An audit last month by the department's inspector general accused department officials of violating the No Child Left Behind law by steering grants for federally funded reading curriculums toward favored vendors.

Bush said today that he wants to extend the No Child Left Behind law's testing provisions to high schools. Congress has rejected that type of proposal in the past.

In his radio address, Bush also expressed concern for the victims of violence in recent days at U.S. schools, including the attack at a one-room Amish school in Pennsylvania that killed five girls. He plans to hold a conference Oct. 10 with Spellings and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to study possible solutions to school violence.

``I wouldn't expect a lot of policy outcomes and recommendations to come out of this conference," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said yesterday. ``This is a gathering where people will be sharing thoughts, best practices and hopefully coming up with some ideas that can help school districts."

How To Make Schools Safer (TIME)

DOJ_NMG_0078203

By Irwin Redlener, M.D.

Time, October 8, 2006

Nickel Mines, Pa., is not just a small, rural town where bad things rarely happen. It is a place, steeped in Amish culture, where peacefulness and spiritualism are nurtured. When big-city dwellers daydream of somewhere far from the high-intensity stresses — and perceived dangers — of the megapolis, it might be a place like Nickel Mines that comes to mind. Surely that's one of the reasons that America was so shaken this week, when five children were executed in Nickel Mines' one-room schoolhouse.

Incidents like this would be deeply distressing no matter where they occur. But with similar deadly school intrusions in Wisconsin and Colorado in the past few weeks, many parents worry that this is a growing crisis, even if statistical trends regarding school shootings do not necessarily support the idea that this is a problem on the rise. Perception counts — and the perception of schools as safe havens is eroding with each new incident. Making matters worse for parents is the feeling of helplessness in the face of what's seen as a new threat to their children.

So, what to do now? In my view, the most effective antidote to the sense of anxiety and helplessness is a meaningful plan of action. The process must start with accurate, balanced information that is neither hysterical nor overly sugar-coated. Let's start with what we know.

It is not just deranged individuals who can invade a school and threaten our children. In the world of international terrorism, children and schools are considered soft targets, providing high visibility for terrible acts that enrage and demoralize civilized communities. Just two years ago, this reality was confirmed when Chechen rebels invaded an elementary school in the remote Russian city of Beslan, killing more than 150 children and an equal number of teachers and other adults.

The problem is that access to schools almost anywhere in the world is, by the nature of these institutions, relatively easy. Schools are supposed to be places where parents entrust officials to oversee the development and education of their children, not pen them in. Traditionally, openness is unfettered by fear of physical or emotional violence. Turning our schools into armed fortresses would be counterproductive, unrealistic and, for the vast majority of our children, entirely unnecessary.

Still, the federal government's response to concerns about school security has been dismal. In fact, since 2003, federal funds to improve security in our schools have been severely cut back, with fewer than 2% of the nation's school districts having received emergency-response grants from the U.S. Department of Education.

The good news, though, is that we can develop prudent, home-grown strategies that make sense, without turning schoolyards into armed camps. Here are common-sense steps that should be taken now:

— Points of entry to schools and school grounds should be limited and controlled, staffed by an adult trained to determine if potential visitors belong there or not.

— Wireless panic alarms could easily and inexpensively be made available in every school, especially for those responsible for access control. If a situation warranting concern arises, an alarm could be sounded to simultaneously alert the school and local law-enforcement officials.

— As back-up, schools also should have strategically placed telephones for making 911 calls.

— Schools need well-designed disaster preparedness plans that are familiar to staff and students and that have been practiced regularly.

— Relationships between school officials and local law-enforcement and first-responder agencies need to be established long before disaster strikes. Response protocols should be clear and understood by all parties.

— Teachers and students need to become "situationally aware," meaning that they will notice — and report — behavior among their peers that seems concerning, or the presence of people who don't belong in the school at all.

Finally, parents have particularly important responsibilities in making our schools safer. They should talk to their children calmly and reassuringly about the true rarity of these horrific events. But parents should also be the main advocates pushing educators and elected officials to do whatever is necessary to improve the security of the nation's schools. This advocacy needs to take place in every community and be directed toward every level of government.

We will never have perfect systems that can prevent every conceivable act of violence in the nation's vast network of schools. But we can reduce the chances of the next Columbine or Nickel Mines by taking some basic actions now. And if these actions help discourage some terror organization from planning an American Beslan, all the better.

A Very Violent School, Or Just Very Honest About Reporting Its Violence? (NYT)

By Winnie Hu

DOJ_NMG_0078204

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

ROME, N.Y. — The students at Rome Free Academy here in upstate New York do not pass through metal detectors. They are not escorted to class by police officers. And their graffiti-free lockers are not routinely searched for drugs.

But last month, the State Education Department placed Rome on its first "watch list" of dangerous schools, a Top 10 of schools that have repeatedly reported student violence like weapons possession, assaults and arson.

Rome Free Academy, a public high school 45 miles east of Syracuse, stands out on a list dominated by urban schools not just because it is nestled on a high-tech campus on a former Air Force base, but also because the teachers, parents and students here contend that it does not belong on the list.

While no one denies that the school has its share of lunchroom fights, the parents say Rome was unfairly singled out after reporting every single case, as the law requires, while other schools did not.

"Maybe they've been too honest," said Gary DeMatteo, chief of police in this city of 35,000, and the husband of a math teacher at the high school. "It just doesn't make sense any other way."

Few things regarding schools — other than perhaps test scores — are parsed as closely as violence statistics or can provoke as much criticism, dismay and even recrimination within a community. After the 1999 shootings at Columbine High School in Colorado, parents and elected officials nationwide sought to hold schools accountable for the safety of their students with a raft of antiviolence laws that called for better record-keeping, among other things.

(In response to deadly attacks in three schools in three states recently, the White House is convening a conference on school safety Tuesday.)

But many of these laws have been inconsistently enforced, leading to what appear to be lopsided records. In a national list of schools identified last year as "persistently dangerous," the most serious category of violent schools, Pennsylvania accounted for one-quarter of the total, and New York and New Jersey combined to account for another quarter, while a majority of states reported none at all.

Even so, an audit by the New York State comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, in May found that high schools were significantly underreporting school violence.

James Garbarino, a psychology professor at Loyola University in Chicago, is one of many school violence experts skeptical about watch lists that are based on self-reporting, which essentially amounts to an honor system.

"Lots of schools don't want to report because it brings unwanted negative attention," Mr. Garbarino said. "It affects the careers of school administrators and school boards, and it can even affect real estate values. So there's a lot more at work here than just acts of violence."

In Rome, the state watch list made front-page headlines in the local newspaper and brought sharp disavowals from school officials, who have invited parents and members of civic groups to visit Rome Free Academy to see for themselves.

It has also dismayed longtime residents like Kathy Kusch, 45, who moved here a decade ago so her two daughters could attend Rome schools. "I don't particularly like the fights," she said. "But I don't like more the reputation we're getting because it makes it sound like we're not a good place to live."

Under federal and state laws, school administrators have been required since 2001 to report all acts of violence and disruptive conduct during school activities and on school grounds.

State education officials then review two years of the reports and use a weighted system to identify troubled schools as "persistently dangerous," a designation that eases the path for parents to transfer their children to another school. Beginning this year, schools that fall just short of that designation are put on a watch list.

State education officials last month cited a total of 27 violent schools for the current school year, 17 of them "persistently dangerous," the other 10 on the watch list.

All but 7 of the 27 are in New York City. Two are in Rochester, and one is in Buffalo. Besides Rome Free Academy, the others are two programs for troubled young people, the Berkshire Junior-Senior High School in Columbia County and the Martin Luther King Jr. High School in Westchester County; and the Milton L. Olive Middle School in Wyandanch, on Long Island.

The number of schools highlighted is far higher than in any previous year, but is less than 1 percent of the 4,453 public schools in New York State.

In the United States and Puerto Rico, there were 36 schools listed as "persistently dangerous" last year, down from 47 in 2003; this year's national statistics have not yet been released. Of the 36, Pennsylvania had the most, with 9, while Puerto Rico had 8 and Maryland 6. Five were in New York, four in New Jersey, and none in Connecticut.

All the schools on the list reported a number of violent episodes over the last two school years, ranging from 11 to 104 in each year. Rome Free Academy, which has 1,819 students in grades 9 through 12, reported 53 violent episodes last school year, 8 fewer than the school year before.

School records show that five of those episodes were confiscations of weapons: a switchblade and four penknives. The remaining 48 cases were fights, 2 leading to serious injury. In the first such instance, a student received medical treatment after a fight on a school bus. In the second, a student became upset in class and threw a textbook over his shoulder, striking the teacher.

"I would even dare say that was accidental," said Mark Benson, the school's principal. "But by the way I understand the reporting, we are required to report it."

Complaints about inconsistent reporting have increasingly drawn the attention of state officials. Mr. Hevesi's audit criticized the State Education Department's handling of school violence reporting, finding that 10 of 17 high schools — Rome was not in the sample — failed to report at least one-third of their violent and disruptive events.

For example, the audit cited 780 unreported cases at Albany High School, including 106 assaults that resulted in physical injury. The school, which is not on the state's watch list, tightened security last week after a student was stabbed. School officials, however, dispute the assertion they have failed to report violent cases.

School officials across the state say the reporting process is overly subjective and confusing. First, they must decide whether a confrontation is serious enough to report, and then they must choose among vaguely defined categories. For instance, if a student is scratched in a fight, should that be reported as an "assault with physical injury" or as a "minor altercation"? Or should it be reported at all?

Take, for example, Mount Vernon High School in Westchester County, which has 2,600 students. Officials there did not report a single assault resulting in a physical injury for the 2004-5 school year; Rome Free Academy reported 54. "I think that Rome probably overreported," said Ellen Garcia, who reviews school violence reporting for the Mount Vernon City School District. "And there's a chance Mount Vernon underreported."

To address such discrepancies, state officials have visited 25 schools since June to review records, and plan another 75 visits by June 2007. They held training sessions for 1,500 superintendents, principals and school workers in August, and have requested more money to hire 70 auditors and other staff to monitor school violence reports.

Asked about Rome, Greg Bayduss, the state official who oversees school violence reports, said, "The State Education Department has devoted considerable resources and taken the initiative to address concerns that have been voiced in order to create an environment where all schools are reporting in a consistent and uniform manner."

In Rome, the high school is a source of pride in a down-on-its-luck city that was built on a copper industry long since faded away. In 1995, the closing of Griffiss Air Force Base led to an exodus of military families and businesses that further crippled the community; the gleaming new high school opened on its grounds in 2002. Today, Rome is perhaps best known as the home of two state prisons.

The predominantly white high school, where more than one-third of the students qualify for free or low-cost lunches, has a graduation rate of 78 percent, just above the statewide average of 77 percent.

The school's new home is a brick-and-glass showpiece in a business and development park, the frame of the military base's chapel incorporated into the cafeteria.

Joelle Taylor, who was school board president when the school moved from an old building downtown, said fighting increased shortly afterward because students were no longer allowed to leave school during the day, so violence that might have occurred off campus moved on campus.

In response, the district secured a $7.8 million federal grant last year for violence prevention, and drew on it to pay for a police officer, a probation officer and a substance abuse counselor at the high school. The district spent two years developing a policy, which takes effect this fall, that broadly defines violence as "any word, look, sign, or act that hurts a person's body, feelings or things."

At Rome Free Academy, the sectional sofas in the lobby have been replaced with wood benches so students are less inclined to linger. A flier above a water fountain advertises a new anger management group. And students sent to the principal's office for fighting are often redirected to an outdoor obstacle course where they have to work together to complete assigned tasks.

During a school open house last week, Mr. Benson, the principal, reassured parents that the school was safe. "I'm not sure what the state is hoping to accomplish with this list," he said afterward. "It's gotten us bad publicity, and it certainly doesn't help."

Elizabeth Monahan, the senior class president, said that the student newspaper would protest the school's inclusion on the watch list in editorials, and that her relatives now asked if she felt threatened at school.

"It makes me very sad because we work so hard to portray ourselves as a really good school," said Ms. Monahan, 17, a fourth-generation Rome Free Academy student.

Conflicting Accounts Leave Plot Holes In Foley Saga (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

House Ethics Committee and FBI Will Try to Sort Out Who Knew What -- and When

Despite countless hours of TV coverage and reams of newspaper reporting on the House's handling of the Mark Foley page scandal, numerous fundamental questions remain unanswered as the FBI and the House ethics committee begin their first full week of inquiries.

Gaps and inconsistencies in the public accounts include such basic matters as when House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his top aides first learned of concerns about Foley's relationships with male pages, and what they did about it. Also unclear is which GOP officials decided that only two members of the six-person House Page Board should confront the Florida lawmaker.

And accounts differ on whether the two board members knew the exact contents of e-mails Foley sent last year to a teenage boy in Louisiana. Those messages alarmed the boy and his parents and set into motion the events that eventually would uncover far more sexually graphic messages to other former pages, triggering Foley's abrupt resignation a week ago.

Armed with subpoena power, investigators for the FBI and the ethics committee will pursue scores of questions, almost surely including:

Who decided to keep word of the Louisiana e-mails closely held, so that only a handful of House Republicans -- and no Democrats -- knew of them?

Various accounts agree that only two people -- Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the Page Board, and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, also a board member -- confronted Foley in November 2005 about the messages. But none has definitively said who decided that only those two should handle the task.

A Sept. 30 "internal review" released by Hastert's office says that aides to Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) alerted Hastert's aides to the e-mails. Among those dealing with the matter were Hastert's deputy chief of staff, Mike Stokke, and his in-house counsel, Ted Van Der Meid.

Stokke contacted Trandahl, who then contacted Shimkus. The review says Trandahl and Shimkus "immediately met" with Foley. But it does not say who chose the meeting's participants, and why other Page Board members -- including Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.), Rep. Dale E. Kildee (D-Mich.) and Sergeant-at-Arms Wilson "Bill" Livingood -- were never alerted.

Some lawmakers say Capito, Kildee and Livingood might have urged queries to current and former pages, which could have turned up accounts of Foley's unusual friendliness to the youths and his sexually explicit messages to some of them. Such accounts were quietly traded among pages, former pages and some House staff members, according to recent news reports.

Did Trandahl and Shimkus know exactly what the e-mails to the Louisiana boy said?

Hastert's internal review indicates that the two men did not know the e-mails' precise language when they sat down with Foley, because Alexander's staff refused to divulge it at the boy's parents' request. That may have put the two men at a disadvantage when confronting Foley, who assured them that the messages and his intentions were innocent.

Shimkus has said Alexander's staff did provide him with the text of the e-mails before he confronted Foley. In them, Foley requested a photo of the boy, then 16, and asked what he wanted for his birthday. The boy told an acquaintance he found the request "sick, sick, sick."

How did House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) handle word of the Louisiana e-mails?

Hours after Foley resigned Sept. 29, Boehner told The Washington Post that he had heard last spring of some contact between Foley and a 16-year-old boy. He said he mentioned it to Hastert, who assured him "we're taking care of it." Soon after The Post asked the speaker's staff for comment on the remarks, Boehner called the paper and said he could not recall whether he had spoken to Hastert about the matter.

On Tuesday, Boehner told a Cincinnati radio station: "I believe I had talked to the speaker, and he told me it had been taken care of. My position is, it's in his corner, it's his responsibility."

Did Hastert know about the e-mails to the Louisiana boy?

Reinforcing Boehner's initial comments, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) -- chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee -- says he learned of the e-mails from Alexander this year and told Hastert about them. "I took logical, common-sense steps of notifying my supervisor," Reynolds told the public radio program "On Point" Thursday. "My supervisor was the speaker of the House."

Hastert says he does not recall such conversations with Reynolds or Boehner, but he does not dispute that they may have occurred. He says that Stokke and Van Der Meid did not tell him about the e-mails and that there was no reason for them to do so. Hastert says he does not recall hearing of concerns about Foley's dealings with teenagers until the day Foley resigned.

Was Hastert's staff alerted to earlier concerns about Foley's behavior toward teenage pages?

Kirk Fordham, who served as chief of staff to Foley and later to Reynolds, says that in 2003 he repeatedly asked Hastert's staff to help put a stop to the Floridian's inappropriate attention to male pages on Capitol Hill. Fordham says that he appealed especially to Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and that Palmer discussed the matter with Foley in a Capitol meeting.

A congressional staff member with personal knowledge of Foley and his actions has told The Post that Fordham's account is accurate. But Palmer has said through a spokesman that Fordham's account is untrue.

Lawmakers Face Scrutiny In House Probe (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, October 8, 2006

The House's investigation of a page sex scandal has only one certainty: Former Rep. Mark Foley will escape punishment by his peers.

It is the Florida Republican's sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage former male pages that have ignited what has become a pre-election firestorm.

Congress only can punish current members, officers and employees. Foley resigned on Sept. 29, but is under investigation by federal and Florida authorities.

If the House ethics committee finds evidence of a Republican cover-up, many people could be in jeopardy, facing consequences that range from a mild rebuke in a committee report to a House vote of censure or expulsion.

Unlike the committee's usual practice of identifying the investigative target at the outset, this probe is wide open. Anyone who knew of Foley's salacious messages before the story broke at the end of September has reason for concern.

"At this point, what we're launching is an investigation into this whole affair, without a specific target," said California Rep. Howard Berman, the senior Democrat on the 10-member committee divided evenly among Republicans and Democrats.

"But because Mark Foley has left the Congress, we don't have the authority to discipline him in any way. The reason what happened is relevant is because there are people now who have responsibilities, and we're gathering the facts which are related to his conduct to make judgments," Berman said.

A second committee member, Rep. Judy Biggert, R-Ill., said House Speaker Dennis Hastert's prominence in questioning about who knew what and when about Foley's conduct toward pages and Hastert's closeness to her will not be problematic.

Hastert's leadership political committee gave Biggert $6,000 for her 2002 campaign and his re-election committee gave her $1,000. Her district also adjoins Hastert's.

"We're looking at a great number of people, not just one specific person," Biggert said. "The facts will lead to us to who, if there is someone, who perhaps did a cover-up."

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a group that monitors congressional ethics, wondered whether the committee can conduct an impartial investigation without an outside counsel. The committee rejected that idea, as it has done occasionally in other high-profile cases involving House leaders.

"Published reports have clearly indicated a number of House members were aware of the incident with the House page," Wertheimer said, referring to less suggestive e-mails Foley sent to a former page from Louisiana. "You would expect the committee to make clear they would be looking at those members. That doesn't mean they would reach any conclusion."

He noted the committee did not specify who it will interview. Hastert has said he was not aware of Foley's inappropriate conduct until the story broke publicly late last month.

"The House ethics committee process is a secret process so we don't know what's going to go on," Wertheimer said.

The committee was in turmoil from the start of the current Congress in January 2005 through last May, when it finally announced a number of investigations.

Bitter partisan arguments broke out in early 2005 when Hastert, at the request of former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, replaced Republicans on the committee who had voted for reports critical of DeLay's conduct.

Then Hastert's hand-picked chairman, Rep. Doc Hastings, R-Wash., and the committee's top Democrat, Rep. Alan Mollohan of West Virginia, argued to a stalemate over staff and rules for investigations.

It was only after Mollohan — under his own ethics cloud involving business deals — stepped down from the committee that the partisan squabbles ended. Berman took over as ranking Democrat and established a good working relationship with Hastings.

In a burst of activity last May, the two leaders announced a flurry of investigations — focusing on Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, with links to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and on the Democrat at the center of a separate bribery probe, Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana.

Ney agreed in September to plead guilty to two criminal charges in the congressional corruption probe spawned by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Jefferson, also the subject of a criminal investigation by the Justice Department, has denied any wrongdoing.

Former Foley Aide Expecting To Testify Before House Panel (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 7 — A former senior aide to Mark Foley expects to go before the House ethics committee next week and testify under oath that he alerted the speaker's office as early as 2003 to inappropriate contact with teenage pages by Mr. Foley, his lawyer said Saturday.

The former aide, Kirk Fordham, will also tell the panel that Scott Palmer, the longtime chief of staff to Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, later met with Mr. Foley to talk about his troubling interest in pages, though Mr. Fordham did not attend that meeting, said Timothy J. Heaphy, Mr. Fordham's lawyer.

"He continues to stand by his claim that he alerted Scott Palmer to this incident with Foley, and he knows there was a subsequent meeting with Foley and Palmer," said Mr. Heaphy, who contacted the ethics committee on Friday to offer Mr. Fordham as a witness. "Kirk is confident and ready to go under oath."

Mr. Palmer has denied having such a discussion with Mr. Fordham, who was a top aide to Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, until January 2004. The speaker's office has said it had no inkling of Mr. Foley's contact with pages until the family of a former page in Louisiana complained about a communication to their son from Mr. Foley in the fall of 2005.

A chronology assembled by the speaker's office said that neither Mr. Hastert nor Mr. Palmer were ever made aware of that e-mail message, which led to a warning to Mr. Foley to cease communication with the youth but no other action. Mr. Hastert said he had no knowledge of Mr. Foley's activities until just before the lawmaker resigned on Sept. 29 after the disclosure of other, sexually explicit electronic messages to former pages. The resulting political and legal uproar is overshadowing the final weeks of campaigning for the midterm elections.

The speaker's office said Saturday that it would be up to the ethics committee, which began an expansive investigation on Thursday, to sort through the conflicting accounts.

"The House Standards Committee is investigating this matter, and we are confident in its ability to determine the real facts," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Mr. Hastert.

The ethics committee intends to reach out to a circle of people in Mr. Hastert's office who may be able to confirm or deny if a meeting took place between Mr. Fordham and Mr. Palmer.

One person emerging as a subject of interest is Christy Surprenant, the former director of administration in the speaker's office, who was Mr. Palmer's assistant. Ms. Surprenant, who later worked for President Bush's campaign in her native Minnesota, could not be reached for comment on Saturday.

Following the initial denial from Mr. Palmer, a second senior Congressional aide, who asked not to be named because of the ethics committee investigation and a separate inquiry by the Justice Department, on Friday offered corroboration of Mr. Fordham's claim that he had met with Mr. Palmer.

At the time of Mr. Foley's resignation, Mr. Fordham was the chief of staff to Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, whose re-election has been complicated by the Foley scandal. Mr. Fordham left Mr. Reynolds's office last Wednesday as he became a central figure in the case.

On Saturday, Mr. Reynolds began broadcasting a television advertisement in his district apologizing for the Foley matter but saying he had seen none of the messages. He also canceled a planned Sunday national television appearance. Mr. Heaphy said investigators for the ethics committee were receptive to his offer to make Mr. Fordham available. "We haven't fixed a time and place, but they indicated they want to interview him," he said, saying he expects the panel to move quickly. "They welcomed the contact."

Mr. Fordham met for about two hours last week with the F.B.I., which is investigating whether a federal crime was committed. The ethics panel's inquiry focuses on how the House handled the matter and whether there was adequate response to any suggestion that Mr. Foley was stepping over the line with pages.

The question of what the speaker's office was told and when is important because the leadership has defended its response to the initial Louisiana e-mail by saying it was only "overfriendly" and did not set off any alarms, a defense that could be undercut had there been earlier discussions about Mr. Foley and House pages.

Mr. Hastert took responsibility last Thursday for the page scandal in an appearance that Republicans hoped would quiet calls for his ouster. He promised to take action if the ethics committee found any staff members had been negligent.

"If it's members of my staff or they didn't do the job, we will act appropriately," Mr. Hastert said. "If it's somebody else's staff, they ought to act appropriately as well."

Tables Turned On Hastert's Go-To Team (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

The speaker's designated problem-solvers find themselves in a bad spot in the Foley scandal.

WASHINGTON — When a complaint about Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate interest in a teenage former page was brought to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office last year, it ended up on the desks of two of the Illinois Republican's most trusted lieutenants.

The two men — Hastert's chief political advisor and his senior legal counsel — along with Hastert's longtime chief of staff, are the speaker's go-to team to resolve problems.

Today, what this trio of senior aides knew about Foley's interest in teenage pages and what they did about it may determine whether the story remains a sexual scandal or grows into one of broader deception and coverup, as Hastert's critics have charged.

Fiercely loyal to the speaker and the Republican Party, veteran aides Scott Palmer, Mike Stokke and Ted Van Der Meid have for years helped Hastert tend to his Republican flock — and protect its members when they run into trouble.

According to several current and former congressional staffers, the group played a central role in the effort to rewrite House rules so then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay could retain his leadership post even if he were indicted. The team also helped engineer the elimination of a congressional subcommittee critical of the cost of a construction project favored by Hastert and others.

The speaker's office has acknowledged that Deputy Chief of Staff Stokke and counsel Van Der Meid fielded a complaint last fall that Foley had been sending provocative e-mails to a former page in Louisiana. And Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, is facing accusations that he was alerted to Foley's behavior by a senior Foley aide as early as 2003.

Now, leaders of the House Ethics Committee — which has been charged with investigating the Foley case — say they plan to look broadly at how House leaders handled the issue.

If they do, that may prove troublesome to the speaker and his party, said congressional scholar Norman Ornstein, a critic of Hastert's leadership. "To an awful lot of people around Capitol Hill, when they look at Palmer and Van Der Meid, they see Ehrlichman and Haldeman," Ornstein said, invoking the names of two principals in the Watergate scandal of a generation ago.

Hastert's office has repeatedly denied any suggestion of a coverup since Foley's resignation Sept. 29 amid reports that he sent sexually explicit messages to former pages.

Palmer said he never received any warning about Foley three years ago. And the speaker has maintained that Stokke and Van Der Meid appropriately forwarded the complaint they received to officials who oversaw the page program.

None of Hastert's aides responded to interview requests for this report.

Being a political problem for Hastert is an odd position for Palmer, Stokke and Van Der Meid.

The three aides, each of whom has decades of experience in politics, are usually the men who take care of problems for a speaker who often leaves the nitty-gritty job of managing House business to others.

"It's been one of the secrets of his success," former Rep. Bill Paxon, a New York Republican who chaired the National Republican Congressional Committee in the early '90s, said of the effectiveness of the Hastert team.

Palmer, 55, has been with Hastert the longest, working with the then-wrestling coach during Hastert's initial run for the Illinois state Legislature in 1980. He came to Washington with Hastert in 1986, and was by his side when Hastert took the speaker's gavel in 1998.

Highly focused, determined and sometimes quick to anger, Palmer is widely considered among the most powerful chiefs of staff in the speaker's office in decades.

"Very few things happened or went through the speaker's office without Scott having some level of involvement…. He is Denny's alter ego," one former House Republican aide said.

Like many current and former congressional staff members who still do business with the speaker, the aide asked not to be identified while talking frankly about Hastert's staff.

Stokke, 45, joined Hastert's team in 1997 after spending his 20s and early 30s working in Illinois politics.

A native of a small town in central Illinois, Stokke is more laid-back than Palmer, people who know the two men say. But Stokke plays a pivotal role for a speaker who travels widely around the country to help raise money and campaign for members of the caucus.

"He's the guy who travels with Hastert when he does the rubber-chicken circuit," said another former Hastert aide. "He views everything through the political prism … knows all the races."

Van Der Meid, 49, became Hastert's chief legal advisor in 1999 after 15 years on Capitol Hill as a staffer and counsel to the House Ethics Committee that is now investigating the Foley case.

A tactician with a lawyer's appreciation for the power of legislative rules and structures, Van Der Meid is also seen as highly partisan. And when trouble arises, those who have worked with him say, he is often deployed to deal with it.

One very big problem that confronted the speaker's office two years ago was DeLay.

Under investigation in Texas for violating campaign finance rules, DeLay was facing indictment at the end of 2004. He had already been admonished twice by the House Ethics Committee, whose chairman, a conservative Colorado Republican, surprised many by backing the condemnation of the powerful majority leader.

And because of a rule enacted by Republicans a decade earlier, DeLay faced the prospect of having to give up his leadership post if indicted.

Hastert's senior aides responded forcefully to protect DeLay, according to people familiar with the planning. Working with DeLay aides, the Hastert team helped make a change in the rules that would allow DeLay to keep his post if indicted. Hastert then pushed the rule through the House on a party-line vote.

Under fierce criticism from Democrats and many government watchdogs, the speaker ultimately reversed himself.

But Hastert's team didn't return everything to the way it was. In February of last year, the speaker removed the chairman of the Ethics Committee, Rep. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.), who had rebuked DeLay.

It wouldn't be the only time that the speaker's office maneuvered to quiet a problem.

Hastert's aides also helped orchestrate the elimination of a congressional subcommittee that expressed concerns about the skyrocketing costs of the massive visitor's center being built underground on the east side of the Capitol, according to a former committee staff member.

Scott Lilly — who spent 31 years on Capitol Hill, mostly working for Democrats on the powerful House Appropriations Committee — said he repeatedly saw Van Der Meid working to quell criticism of the multimillion-dollar project, which is prized by Hastert and several other congressional leaders.

"There really seemed to be a pattern here of ignoring problems or sweeping them under the rug," said Lilly, who now works for the progressive Center for American Progress.

A Hastert spokesman said Friday he couldn't comment on the elimination of the subcommittee.

It is still unclear what Palmer, Stokke and Van Der Meid did with the complaints about Foley.

Several people who worked with the three said it was inconceivable that they would have brushed aside something as serious as a congressman making inappropriate advances on teenagers under the speaker's care.

"They wouldn't have tolerated it," one former associate said.

But at least some outside observers say if the past is a guide, investigators should look closely.

"The instinct, which is very strong in the Republican caucus, is to stand by their own," said Ron Peters, a University of Oklahoma political scientist who has written extensively about the House of Representatives. "What we see with the Foley episode may be a distant cousin, or maybe not so distant, of what happened with DeLay."

Ex-Page Tells Of Foley Liaison (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

The young man says the then-congressman eyed males in the program. He says he was 21 when he and the Florida Republican had sex.

A former House page says he had sex with then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) after receiving explicit e-mails in which the congressman described assessing the sexual orientation and physical attributes of underage pages but waiting until later to make direct advances.

The former page, who agreed to discuss his relationship with Foley with the Los Angeles Times on the condition that he not be identified, said his electronic correspondence with Foley began after he finished the respected Capitol Hill page program for high school juniors. His sexual encounter was in the fall of 2000, he said. At the time, he was 21 and a graduate of a rural Northeastern college.

"I always knew you were a player but I don't fool around with pages," declared one instant message from Maf54, a screen name Foley used in exchanges that have become public involving male former pages.

The former page's account is consistent with Foley's assertion that he did not have sexual relations with minors, an issue that will be key to determining whether he committed crimes. The legal age of consent varies from state to state; in the District of Columbia, where the pages live in supervised dormitories, it is 16.

Yet the former page's exchanges with Foley offer a glimpse of possible predatory behavior by the congressman as he assessed male teenagers assigned as House errand-runners.

In the messages, Maf54 described how years earlier, he had looked to see whether the former page had an erection in his tight white pants while the then-teenager was working near the congressman. Maf54 also speculated about the sexual attributes of other males in the same page class, including the observation that one young man was "well hung."

Foley abruptly resigned his House seat Sept. 29, after the disclosure of sexually oriented messages to former pages. Other messages were subsequently divulged, and questions concerning how much House Republican leaders knew about Foley and his interest in pages are being investigated by the House Ethics Committee. Foley is now in seclusion in an alcohol treatment facility, and his lawyer has declined to answer questions about specific pages.

The FBI has begun contacting former pages, and at least one — a deputy campaign manager for Rep. Ernest Istook, an Oklahoma Republican who is running for governor there — has hired a criminal defense lawyer, according to a published report. Istook issued a statement last week urging the media to protect the young man's privacy after his name was briefly posted on the ABC News website.

The former page interviewed by The Times said he had not been contacted by the FBI or the House Ethics Committee. He agreed to talk to The Times only if his identity was protected, because of his fear that exposure could hurt his job prospects.

The Times found the former page after others identified him as someone whose contacts with Foley went beyond graphic messages. At an interview, the former page brought a computer containing his communications with Foley, and allowed a Times reporter to review them. The young man, who now manages a suburban office of a national franchise, says that he is gay and that he had only one sexual encounter with Foley before the contacts abruptly ended. The Times agreed not to publish the year of his page class to protect his identity.

The young man said that while serving as a page, he and his fellow pages gossiped frequently about Foley's overly friendly behavior but did not complain about him to program supervisors or other members of Congress. They nicknamed him "Triple F," for "Florida Fag Foley." One evening, four of the boys made an unannounced visit to Foley's home.

"We knocked on his door and he let us in. Nothing happened, but he was very friendly," the former page said.

Foley's flirtations made the young man feel important at a time when he was struggling with his emerging sexuality. "It seemed cool that he was taking an interest," he said. "I knew he was gay, and he was attracted to me."

After leaving the program, the former page began receiving messages from Foley. He is uncertain how Foley knew his college instant-message name, but assumed the congressman had access to a directory listing former pages' whereabouts.

The exchanges quickly became provocative. In one 2000 message, Maf54 inquired about the length and direction of the youth's erection.

"I always thought you were gay," Maf54 commented.

"Is it obvious?" the former page asked.

Ultimately, the young man said, he had a sexual encounter with Foley at the congressman's Washington home.

Then 21, he was in Washington as an intern in an unrelated program.

The two had wine and pizza on a backyard patio and then retired to a spare bedroom, he recalled.

The former page, who served during Foley's first term, said that he believed Foley became bolder in his behavior during his decade in Congress.

"He clearly has used his position, but who hasn't?" the former page said. He still follows protocol in referring to the former congressman as "Mr. Foley."

He said Foley was really two very different people: a legislator "really devoted to his cause," and a sexual being.

He and other former pages were surprised that it took so long for Foley "to get caught," he said.

"It most saddens me because of the damage it could do to the program," the young man said of the page system. "It was the most spectacular year of my life. I would love to do it all over again."

Foley Case Upsets Tough Balance By Capitol Hill's Gay Republicans (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 7 — Every month or so, 10 top staff members from Capitol Hill meet over dinner to commiserate about their uneasy experience as gay Republicans. In a wry reference to the K Street Project, the party's campaign to build influence along the city's lobbying corridor, they privately call themselves the P Street Project, a reference to a street cutting through a local gay enclave.

For many of those men and other gay Republicans in political Washington, reconciling their private lives and public roles has required a discreet existence. But in the last week, the Mark Foley scandal has upset that careful balance.

Since Representative Foley, Republican of Florida, resigned after it was revealed he had sent sexually explicit electronic messages to male pages, gay Republicans in Washington have been under what one describes as "siege and suspicion."

Some conservative groups blamed the "gay lifestyle" and the gathering force of the "gay agenda" for the scandal. Others equated homosexuality with pedophilia, a link that has long outraged gay men and lesbians.

Conservative blogs and Web sites pointed out that gay staff members played principal roles in investigating the Foley case, suggesting that the party was betrayed by gay men trying to hide misconduct by one of their own. In the meantime, a group of gay activists, angered by what they see as hypocrisy by gay Republicans, have begun circulating a document known as The List, a roster of gay Congressional staff members and their Republican bosses.

"You can see where it would be easy for some people to blame gays for something that might bring down the party in Congress," said Brian Bennett, a gay Republican political consultant. He was a longtime chief of staff to former Representative Robert K. Dornan, Republican of California, who regularly referred to gays as Sodomites.

"I'm just waiting for someone in a position of authority to make this a gay issue," Mr. Bennett said of the Foley case.

The presence of homosexuals, particularly gay men, in crucial staff positions has been an enduring if largely hidden staple of Republican life for decades, and particularly in recent years. They have played decisive roles in passing legislation, running campaigns and advancing careers.

Known in some insider slang as the Velvet Mafia or the Pink Elephants, gay Republicans tend to be less open about their sexual orientation than their Democratic counterparts. Even though the G.O.P. fashions itself as "the party of Lincoln" and a promoter of tolerance, it is perceived as hostile by many gay men and lesbians. Republicans have promoted a "traditional values" agenda, while some conservatives have turned the "radical gay subculture" into a reliable campaign villain. And there are few visible role models in the party; Representative Jim Kolbe of Arizona is the only openly gay Republican in Congress.

As the blame from the Foley case has been parceled out in recent days, some people in Washington suggested that the Republican leadership's inadequate response to alarms about Mr. Foley was borne of squeamishness in dealing with a so-called gay issue. Meanwhile, some Republican staff members worried that several gay men caught up in the scandal would be treated unfairly.

They include Kirk Fordham, Mr. Foley's onetime chief of staff who resigned Wednesday as an aide to Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, Republican of New York, and Jeff Trandahl, formerly the clerk of the House of Representatives, a powerful post with oversight of hundreds of staffers and the page program. The two men were among the first to learn of Mr. Foley's inappropriate communications. Along with the Republican leadership, they have been criticized for failing to act more aggressively to stop the congressman's behavior, and possibly covering up for Mr. Foley.

Mr. Fordham and Mr. Trandahl did not hide their homosexuality, and they were well known in Washington's gay community. (Neither returned phone calls seeking comment.) Others, though, strenuously protect their private life.

"You learn to compartmentalize really well," said one Republican strategist who, like many gay Republicans interviewed for this article, would speak only anonymously for fear of adversely affecting his career.

Mr. Fordham's history illustrates the potential tensions between private life and professional rhetoric. After leaving Mr. Foley's office in 2004, he worked as finance director for the campaign of Senator Mel Martinez, Republican of Florida. In that race, a Martinez campaign flier accused a political rival of favoring the "radical homosexual lobby" by supporting hate crimes legislation that included protections for gay men and lesbians.

One of the inevitable facts, said Mr. Bennett, the former Dornan aide, is that "there are just going to be some days when it's hard to be a gay Republican."

When asked why he remains in the party, Mr. Bennett gave an answer common to gay Republicans: he said that he remained fundamentally in sync with the small government principles of the party and its approach to national security, and that he was committed to changing what he considers its antigay attitudes.

"I'm fighting hard, every day," said Mr. Bennett, who was among a small group of gay Republicans who met with George W. Bush during his 2000 presidential campaign.

Like Mr. Bennett, other gay staff members wind up working for politicians they consider infamous for their inflammatory remarks and hostility to their cause.

Robert Traynham, the top communications aide to Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, endured the fallout from an interview with The Associated Press in 2003 in which Mr. Santorum seemed to equate homosexuality with bestiality, bigamy and incest, among other things. Mr. Traynham had been openly gay for years, but that was not widely known in his professional life — until a gay rights advocate revealed his sexual orientation last year. Mr. Traynham confirmed the report, and Mr. Santorum issued a statement in support of his aide.

In contrast to what many view as the right's increasingly antigay rhetoric, members of both parties say there has been a growing tolerance for gay men and lesbians within the Republican ranks.

"There's been a change from 20 years ago when people used to be hyperconscious of staying in the closet," said Steve Elmendorf, an openly gay Democratic strategist who was the chief aide to former Representative Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri, who served as the Democratic leader. "Now there's more of an evolution to a 'don't ask, don't tell' rule."

An addendum could be "don't flaunt." "You just don't wear it on your sleeve, bottom line," said one gay Republican staff member.

"I always made a point of dating women," said Mr. Bennett, who disclosed that he was gay after his tenure with Mr. Dornan.

Others point out that advancing the beliefs and careers of the boss is a priority, and staff members are expected to stay in the background. "Discretion is what most members expect from their staff, no matter who you are," said Tracey St. Pierre, who was chief of staff for former Representative Charles T. Canady, Republican of Florida.

"For many conservative Republicans, just being gay in itself is an act of indiscretion," said Ms. St. Pierre, who is gay but was not open about it until shortly before leaving Mr. Canady's office. When she worked with him in the mid-1990's, one of his chief causes was legislation that would ban same-sex marriage. Ms. St. Pierre, who works for a federal agency, considers herself an independent now.

The code of behavior largely extends to Republican politicians themselves, a point underscored by Mr. Foley, who just this week publicly acknowledged that he was gay. He appeared in public with women whenever possible and held parties at his home, which one guest described as decorated with photographs of himself with attractive women.

Mr. Foley had always refused to discuss his sexual orientation, a topic that drew increasing attention as he considered a bid for the Senate in 2004. Amid intensifying rumors about his personal life, he decided not to run.

Despite Mr. Foley's silence, people on Capitol Hill assumed he was gay. "It was commonly known on Capitol Hill by staff and members," said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois. "People have their own lifestyles as long as they mind their own business and play by the rules."

Joe Scarborough, a former Republican congressman from Florida who served with Mr. Foley, said, "If you're a gay Republican, you have to act like a Republican." Mr. Scarborough, who is now the host of "Scarborough Country" on MSNBC, said "acting like a Republican" entailed going out on the campaign trail "talking about guns, chewing tobacco and riding around in a pickup truck."

He contrasted that with gay Democrats, "who can strut around and still get a standing ovation." He cited the case of former Representative Gerry E. Studds, a Democrat of Massachusetts who is openly gay, who became embroiled in a sex scandal involving a page and still won re-election. And Representative Barney Frank, another gay Democratic Massachusetts congressman, has attained almost iconic status among gay men and lesbians.

Gay members of both parties describe the Foley matter as something that could jeopardize the role that gay men and lesbians have assumed in Republican politics.

One gay Republican campaign strategist said he feared that conservatives would "play to the base" and redouble their efforts to vilify homosexuals. "It's one of the places the party goes when it's in trouble," he said. "A lot of us are holding our breath to see how this plays out."

Fear And Loathing In The GOP (WP)

By Byron York op-ed

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Even in the grand tradition of scapegoating in American politics, J. Dennis Hastert's current plight stands out. The former high school coach-turned-accidental speaker of the House spent last week as the unlikeliest of fall guys for a sex scandal that involved a closeted gay Republican congressman, underage male House pages and unseemly instant messages. As fear and loathing spread through panicky preelection Republicans, Hastert looked like a goner, then a survivor, then a goner again and then, well, who knows.

"I was inclined at first to believe that Denny Hastert should resign," conservative activist Paul Weyrich told me on Wednesday.

But then Weyrich heard from Hastert, in one of the dozens of calls the speaker made last week. ("He called me, I didn't call him," Weyrich stressed.) Hastert explained that he hadn't known about Foley's graphic sex talk with a teenage House page. And the speaker argued passionately, Weyrich said, that he had properly handled the so-called "overly friendly" e-mail from Foley to another former page. Ultimately, Weyrich was convinced. He would not call for Hastert's resignation.

Hastert's defense strategy has worked -- so far. But the Foley affair has exposed deep fissures within the GOP a few weeks before midterm elections; when the story broke, everyone seemed to be in a different place. Some are in what one top House aide calls the "knee-jerk" camp -- those who called for Hastert's resignation right away. Others are in a camp awaiting more evidence. Still others are in the smell-a-rat camp, suspecting that Democrats were behind the whole thing. And finally, some are in the this-is-proof-of-America's-moral- decline camp, condemning Republican and Democratic leaders alike. No one camp was able to take control, thus allowing Hastert to continue as the longest-serving Republican speaker in history.

On Thursday -- the same day that the House ethics committee announced an investigation and issued dozens of subpoenas for documents and testimony -- the speaker held a news conference. "The bottom line," he said, "is that we're taking responsibility, because ultimately, as someone has said in Washington before: The buck stops here."

At least until November. The Foley scandal has become very much about Hastert, the Republican leadership and the party's permanence in power. Toward the end of our conversation, Weyrich pointed to the post-Watergate election of 1974, when Republicans took a horrendous beating. GOP pollster Richard Wirthlin, Weyrich explained, coined the phrase "the embarrassed Republican vote," referring to those party members who were so appalled by events that they didn't vote.

"I think we may see the embarrassed Republican vote back again," Weyrich said.

One might assume that Hastert's supporters were most worried about the knee-jerk camp. And they were, early last week, when the conservative Washington Times published its editorial "Resign, Mr. Speaker."

But a few days later, the pro-Hastert forces came to believe that the knee-jerkers had done the speaker a favor.

In the normal course of a Washington scandal, as they explained this scenario to me, many days and many revelations would have to pass before a Republican would become so bold as to float the idea of dumping Hastert. By coming out so quickly against him, the Washington Times and its allies forced conservatives to take sides right away. Most of them, uncertain about the evidence, cautiously sided with Hastert.

"What the Washington Times did, in my mind, is they advanced it," the top House aide told me. "The question was, 'Do you think the Washington Times is right, or are they overreacting?' "

As it turned out, few chose to support resignation, and Hastert survived the initial challenge.

But the good news for the speaker may be temporary, because his support among conservatives is infinitely complicated by his political baggage. It's no secret that conservatives are unhappy with the performance of many GOP officeholders in Washington, from President Bush on down. In particular, they don't like the party's abandonment of fiscal discipline and its failure to restrain the growth of government. They've been complaining for quite a while now, but the Foley scandal has given them a new reason to take shots at the Republican leadership.

When I called David Bossie -- a former Hill investigator who heads an organization called Citizens United and favors Hastert's resignation -- he asked what I thought about the speaker's performance. I told him I wasn't sure. "You're not sure about Hastert on spending?" he asked. "Or on earmarks, or on the utter failure of leadership since he fell into the speakership?"

Bossie seemed genuinely appalled by Hastert's handling of the Foley matter, but he listed other reasons why conservatives are unhappy with Hastert's House. Many conservatives would probably support a change in leadership should Republicans maintain control of the House in November. But they just don't want to rock the boat now, a few weeks before the elections

If we win, they say, then we'll get a new speaker. And if we lose, it's not our problem.

As the week went on, a lot more Republicans joined the smell-a-rat faction. Although they conceded problems with the way the leadership had handled Foley, they were suspicious of how the information came out in dribs and drabs, keeping the story alive day after day. Some of it seemed to originate on a Web site, http://stopsexpredators.blogspot.com , that no one knew much about. Although they didn't have any solid evidence, some Republicans suspected that Democrats were behind it. The speaker was among them. "Hastert believes that with everything in him," Weyrich told me.

Others regarded the Foley matter as a cultural issue as much as a political one. Last Monday, the leaders of a coalition of conservative organizations called the Arlington Group held a conference call to discuss Foley. It included Weyrich, Focus on the Family Chairman James Dobson, American Values President Gary Bauer, Family Research Council President Tony Perkins and American Family Association Chairman Donald Wildmon, among others.

The men agreed that they didn't know enough about the scandal to condemn anyone in the GOP leadership. But they thought that the leadership had gone easy on Foley because, sensitive to charges that Republicans are intolerant, they did not want to be seen as gay-bashers. The coalition members asked Weyrich to draft a statement.

"We are concerned that the early warnings of Mr. Foley's odd behavior toward young male pages may have been overlooked or treated with deference, fearing a backlash from the radical gay rights movement because of Mr. Foley's sexual orientation," the statement said. "It appears that the integrity of the conservative majority has given way to political correctness, trading the virtues of decency and respect for that of tolerance and diversity."

Wildmon later told me that the Foley scandal represents something of a crossroads for the GOP. "Part of the problem Republicans have right now is they have to make up their minds what kind of party they are going to be," he said. "Are they going to be a party of values voters, or are they going to be a party that is for diversity and all the other good buzzwords?"

For all his protestations -- "I'm just a little bitty old preacher in Mississippi" -- Wildmon is an intensely political strategist. But others on the conference call seemed truly dismayed by both parties. "I am not an R, and I am not a D," Phil Burress, president of the Ohio-based Citizens for Community Values, which is affiliated with Focus on the Family, told me.

"Values voters gave up on that a long time ago," he said. "We are thoroughly disgusted with Congress and the way they are conducting business."

White House stonewalling and the Jack Abramoff scandal

REMEMBER WHEN President Bush promised to restore honor and integrity to the Oval Office? He doesn't either, it would seem. A report by the House Government Reform Committee, based on three years of e-mails and billing records from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's former law firm, detailed how Mr. Abramoff and his team billed clients for hundreds of contacts with White House officials and dispensed coveted tickets to sporting events and concerts to favored officials, including adviser Karl Rove and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, then the White House political director.

A particular recipient of Mr. Abramoff's favors was his former assistant, Susan B. Ralston. She had gone to the White House to work for Mr. Rove but stayed in close touch with her former boss -- more than half of Mr. Abramoff's 66 contacts with the White House were with her. Mr. Abramoff turned to her as a conduit to Mr. Rove and others, seeking her help in placing allies in government or obtaining other favors, not always successfully. Ms. Ralston, in turn, used Mr. Abramoff as a personal Ticketmaster service, taking free tickets to Bruce Springsteen and Andrea Bocelli concerts, Capitals, Wizards and Orioles games. When Ms. Ralston was looking for four floor seats for a Wizards game -- valued at $1,300 -- Mr. Abramoff emailed back, "For you? Anything!"

You might think a White House worried about honor and integrity would want to look more closely at Mr. Abramoff's dealings. You might think it would be concerned about whether Ms. Ralston violated the rules that prohibit administration officials from taking gifts valued at more than $20, though there is an exception for gifts based on preexisting friendships. You might think it would want to make clear that -- whether technically permitted by the rules or not -- this is unacceptable behavior from government officials.

Not this White House, which has been resolutely incurious about Mr. Abramoff's activities and equally unwilling to provide information about it -- making it impossible to know how many of the reported contacts are classic Abramoff puffery and how many real. "Nothing more will come from the report, no further fallout from the report," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Friday.

Ms. Perino's comments were occasioned by Friday afternoon's announcement that Ms. Ralston was resigning. Not, mind you, because she did anything wrong but because, as Ms. Perino said, "she did not want to be a distraction to the White House at this important time." White House lawyers won't bother to figure out whether Ms. Ralston violated the gift rules, officials said, because she's leaving anyway -- and, according to counselor Dan Bartlett, "without any animosity from us." Indeed, Mr. Bartlett said, "She's been a tireless worker for the president, and we will be sad to see her leave."

A White House even a little concerned about honor and integrity might have managed to summon up a tiny hint of criticism -- not to mention a promise to make sure its employees behave in a way that befits the term public servant. A White House with nothing to hide would release information about Mr. Abramhoff's his meetings and contacts with its officials.

Despite Ruling, Voters Are Told To Provide ID (AP)

By The Associated Press

The Associated Press, October 8, 2006

ATLANTA, Oct. 7 — Tens of thousands of Georgia voters recently received letters telling them they must show a photo ID to cast a ballot on Nov. 7, even though a judge recently struck down the requirement.

DOJ_NMG_0078216

The State Board of Elections mailed more than 300,000 of the letters, about 20,000 of them after the judge issued his ruling on Sept. 19.

But Claud L. McIver, the Board of Elections vice chairman, said he did not expect voters to be confused.

"Just walk in the door," Mr. McIver said Friday.

For months, lawyers have been battling in state and federal court over the new ID law. Supporters, primarily Republicans, have said the law is needed to prevent voter fraud.

Opponents say it is intended to discourage voting by members of minorities, the poor and the elderly, who are less likely to have a driver's license or other photo identification.

Last month, a state judge declared the law unconstitutional because it established a voting requirement not contained in the Georgia Constitution. After that ruling, state officials said voters would be able to cast a ballot merely by presenting something like a utility bill or a Social Security card.

Mr. McIver said he let the last 20,000 letters go out because he was confronted with two different rulings: the state judge's order and a federal judge's decision to block the law but to consider reinstating it before Election Day.

Mr. McIver said the board was trying to minimize confusion by talking with county registrars and updating its Web site. The are no plans to send out additional mailings or to make public service announcements; Mr. McIver said there was not enough money in the budget to do that.

Some groups are working to counteract possible confusion. The Georgia Coalition for the People's Agenda said it planned an automated call campaign next week to the 305,000 voters who received letters.

American Elections And The Grand Old Tradition Of Disenfranchisement (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

The House of Representatives struck a major blow against democracy last month. It passed a bill that would deny the vote to anyone who shows up at the polls without a government-issued photo ID. The bill's requirements are so onerous and inflexible that they could prevent millions of eligible voters without driver's licenses — who are disproportionately poor, minority or elderly — from casting a ballot.

With that vote Congress joined a growing number of states that are erecting new barriers to voting. Republican-dominated legislatures and election officials have adopted absurdly difficult registration rules. They have removed eligible voters from the rolls with Katherine Harris-style purges, and required voters to buy ID cards to vote, a modern form of poll tax.

These new voting laws are disturbing, but they should not be surprising. The story of American voting is usually told as one of steady expansion: constitutional amendments extending the franchise to freed slaves, women and 18-year-olds, and Supreme Court rulings and federal laws eliminating voting obstacles for Southern blacks. But racial and religious minorities, women and the poor have historically had to fight not just to get the right to vote, but to stop it from being taken away.

America has a hidden history of disenfranchisement. It has operated, as a Harvard professor, Alexander Keyssar, recounts in his valuable history, "The Right to Vote," on the expected lines of class, race, ethnicity and religion, and often for partisan gain. Right now, we are in another period of what Professor Keyssar calls "backsliding." Minorities and the poor — and everyone who cares about American democracy — have to stand up for a principle that should by now be beyond debate: universal suffrage.

Long before the Constitution guaranteed women the right to vote in 1920, some women had already had the franchise and had it taken away. New Jersey, which gave women the vote in its state Constitution in 1776, disenfranchised them in 1807. Pennsylvania, which let blacks vote after the Revolution, took away their right to vote in the 1830's.

Immigrants were another common target of disenfranchisement laws. In 1840, New York — which, like most states, did not require pre-Election Day registration — adopted a registration law that applied only to New York City, aimed at the growing Irish Catholic population. The lower classes were another target. In the 1800's, New Jersey adopted "sunset laws" that required the polls to close before factories let out for the day. In the 1800's and early 1900's, many states took the vote away from "paupers."

Disenfranchisement was often motivated by partisan politics. In the South, at the end of Reconstruction, white Democrats pushed through poll taxes and literacy tests to reduce the black Republican vote. In the North, it was Republicans putting up the barriers, like New York's 1921 constitutional amendment imposing a rigorous literacy test, aimed at keeping hundreds of thousands of Yiddish speakers from voting.

Poll taxes and literacy tests are unconstitutional today, but the forces of disenfranchisement have come up with creative new methods. In 2004, the Ohio secretary of state, Kenneth Blackwell, ordered election officials to reject any voter registration form that was submitted on less than 80-pound paper. The edict disproportionately hurt poor and minority voters by interfering with registration drives aimed at them.

This year, Florida adopted new rules for voter registration drives that were so onerous — and carried such draconian punishments for mistakes — that the League of Women Voters of Florida announced that for the first time in 67 years it would not register voters.

Election officials are still wrongly purging eligible voters from the rolls. Four years after Ms. Harris's error-filled purge of felons, her successor as Florida secretary of state developed another error-filled felon list. She abandoned it only after news media pointed out that, oddly enough, it included 22,000 blacks, a group that votes heavily Democratic, but just 61 Hispanics, a group that tends to vote Republican in Florida. Just last week, a court struck down another error-filled voter roll purge, in Kentucky.

The voter ID laws that have been enacted recently have been set up not to verify voters' identities, but to stop certain groups from voting. Georgia's law — whose sponsor was quoted in a Justice Department memo as saying that if blacks in her district "are not paid to vote, they don't go to the polls" — required people to pay for voter ID cards, until the courts held that to be an illegal poll tax. When it took effect there was not a single office in Atlanta where the cards were for sale.

The current wave of laws began after 2000, when the presidency was decided by just 537 votes. With today's closely divided electorate, there is more strategic value than ever in disenfranchising people who fall into groups likely to support the other party. To a disheartening degree, this new wave is supported almost entirely by Republicans and opposed only by Democrats.

The opposition should be bipartisan. Disenfranchisement undermines not only American democracy, but also the whole idea of America, by illegitimately excluding some people from their rightful place in it.

Abraham Lincoln understood this. In 1859, after Massachusetts Republicans pushed through a requirement that immigrants wait two years after becoming citizens to vote, a group of German-Americans asked Lincoln what he thought of the law — which mere partisanship should have led him to support. "I am against its adoption in Illinois, or in any other place, where I have a right to oppose it," he responded. "Understanding the spirit of our institutions to aim at the elevation of men, I am opposed to whatever tends to degrade them."

U.S. Attempting To Reshape Fishing Rules (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

But How Much to Tighten Reins?

NEW BEDFORD, Mass. -- Working fishing boats cram this city's docks, brightly painted vessels with names like "Let It Ride" and "Fearless." But tied up alongside them are plenty of rusting vessels that have not shipped out in years, stark reminders of the sea's fickle bounty.

Once the nation's foremost whaling town, New Bedford has reemerged as a fishing capital. Riding a boom in the fishery for scallops and other shellfish, its catch sold for $207 million last year at dockside, more than that of any other U.S. port. But cod and other once-plentiful species remain scarce despite a decade of efforts to restore depleted stocks.

Congress, meanwhile, is preparing to rewrite the nation's fishing rules in a bid to improve the much-criticized system for managing fisheries, and that worries Debra Shrader. The director of a fishermen's advocacy group here called Shore Support, she fears the fishing community will pay the price for rebuilding fish populations.

"If they studied us nearly as much as they studied the other biomasses, they would realize what they're doing to us," said Shrader, whose group co-wrote a report last year showing that full-time employment for area fishermen dropped 20 percent between 1993 and 2002. "None of these species are on the verge of extinction, but our communities are."

As lawmakers consider the most comprehensive revision of fisheries regulation in a decade, the argument is focused on how drastically to limit fishing when fish populations decline or crash. The combatants do not divide along the usual partisan lines; the fight over rewriting the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act pits environmentalists against fishermen, the Senate against the House and coastal regions against one another.

The outcome may determine how many fish will be left in the ocean decades from now and who will be around to catch them.

"The perception among fishermen is that things are getting worse and worse, which is true," said Joshua S. Reichert, who heads the Pew Charitable Trust's environmental program. "We've been steadily driving toward the edge of a cliff and taking meticulous notes along the way."

The nation is also in the midst of a debate over how to regulate fishing in international waters. The administration pledged last week to push for a moratorium on destructive bottom-trawling on the high seas, but environmentalists such as Reichert question whether U.S. negotiators are really pressing the point at the United Nations.

No one questions that increasingly sophisticated fishing technology has devastated many prized fish stocks. In the decade since the current management program began, 74 fish stocks have been formally declared "overfished," and plans have been drawn up to rebuild 67 of them. But so far, fewer than 5 percent have been replenished, a recent study found.

Biologist Andrew A. Rosenberg, lead author of the study in the journal Frontiers in Ecology and the Environment and a professor at University of New Hampshire, said it will take stricter limits, such as those in the pending Senate bill, to bring these species back.

"You need a clean catch limit, and you have to have consequences," said Rosenberg, who was deputy director of the National Marine Fisheries Service from 1998 to 2000.

There are sharp variations across the country, however. In New England, more than a third of native fish stocks are overfished by federal standards, and cod stocks are at 10 percent of the recommended level. By contrast, just 3 percent of Alaska's stocks are overfished.

These disparities have intensified criticism of the eight fishery management councils that enforce the current law. The councils set regional catch limits, subject to federal approval, based on scientific recommendations from federal, state and academic scientists.

Congress passed Magnuson-Stevens 30 years ago in an effort to kick foreign fishing fleets out of U.S. waters, not to conserve species. The act was later amended to include conservation, but the Bush administration and many lawmakers agree it has failed to do the job, and they favor tighter rules.

"The president wants a Magnuson-Stevens bill that ends overfishing, that ensures our fisheries get rebuilt," said James L. Connaughton, Bush's top environmental adviser, although he declined to take sides between the Senate and the House version, which would establish less stringent controls.

Part of the problem is a lack of good data. "Basically, the technology for estimating the abundance of a fish population is still a fishnet," said Brian J. Rothschild, a professor of marine science and technology at the University of Massachusetts at Dartmouth, next door to New Bedford.

At the moment, several regional councils allow catches above the scientifically recommended levels on the theory that deeper cuts will hurt fishing interests too much. Scientists told the Gulf of Mexico council this year that the red snapper catch would have to be held to 5 million pounds to allow the population to recover immediately, and a limit of 7 million pounds would restore it by 2009. Instead, the council endorsed a catch limit of 9.1 million pounds.

"The law does not give the government the authority to step in and end overfishing," said the Fisheries Service's chief scientific adviser, Steven Murawski. "Even though we've made good progress, we haven't reached the goal post."

The Senate-passed bill, written by one of the act's original authors, Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), would require the councils to adhere to scientifically determined catch limits and to reduce future catches anytime industry exceeds the quotas.

Stevens, who said in an interview that Alaska's fisheries have thrived in part because the industry complies with scientists' recommendations, added that if other regions "accept scientific guidance, we'll end overfishing."

The House bill, by Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.), which is slated for a floor vote in November, also calls for limits based on the "allowed biological catch" calculated by scientists. But it would allow overfishing to continue for two years under rebuilding plans, and it might extend the current 10-year deadline for replenishing depleted stocks in some instances to ensure a fishing community's infrastructure remains viable.

Sarah Chasis, who directs the advocacy group Natural Resources Defense Council's ocean initiative, called these provisions "conservation rollbacks" that will hurt fishermen in the long run. "If you rebuild these stocks in a timely way, the net economic value is really significant," she said.

But Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who represents New Bedford and worked with Pombo on the bill, considers even a 10-year rebuilding timetable arbitrary. In some instances, he said, more modest catch reductions over a longer time period could preserve local jobs and allow stocks to rebound eventually.

"We're not talking about permanent damage to the air or water," Frank said. "We're talking about an extension of overfishing. That's possible."

New Bedford's fishermen acknowledge that they have depleted some of their most valuable stocks, including the once-teeming species that gave nearby Cape Cod its name, and that fishery closures have helped some species rebound.

In the mid-1990s, federal officials closed one-third of Georges Bank, east of Cape Cod, to give scallops and groundfish such as haddock a chance to recover. Scallops did so dramatically -- a scallop boat can now scoop up $120,000 worth in two trips -- and haddock is also back. But the cod, which is more mobile and has a different life span, has yet to recover.

David Harrington switched from being a scalloper to being a ship engine mechanic more than a decade ago when regulators began to impose scientific standards on the fishery; now he thinks he may have acted too hastily. "I thought they were going to ruin it, and you know, they did a great job," he said.

But many local fishermen remain dissatisfied with federal managers, saying they open and close fishing areas without sufficient notice. "You're nervous when you're going out that you're in the wrong place," said Tom Manley, who has been fishing for scallops since he graduated from high school 28 years ago. "They need to listen to the fishermen more."

Some Massachusetts fishermen say attitudes toward conservation are shifting. John W. Pappalardo, who was elected chairman of the New England regional council last week, fished for cod until "there really weren't any left." He noted that with fishermen's support, the council approved rules for herring that bar "pair trawling," in which two ships tow a net between them and scoop up massive catches.

"It's not like a light switch, where we used to be in darkness and now we're illuminated," said Pappalardo, who is based in Chatham, Mass. "It took us many years to screw things up, and it's going to take a few years to unravel things."

EPA Kicks Up A Dust Storm With New Regulation (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, October 8, 2006

Dust happens.

That's according to Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, who says the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has gone overboard on a regulation over dust. The Virginia Republican and others say the agency has set an impossible standard for the agriculture industry.

"I am deeply concerned and troubled by the direction the EPA is taking to regulate dust and coarse particulate matter," Mr. Goodlatte told a subcommittee on conservation, credit, rural development and research hearing on pesticide programs.

"What we are talking about here is dust, and despite the best efforts of farmers to minimize the impact of their operations on the environment the reality is: dust happens," Mr. Goodlatte said.

The EPA amended its national air quality monitoring requirements late last month, which re-creates a national network to monitor six common pollutants: level ozone, carbon monoxide, nitrogen dioxide, sulfur dioxide, lead and particle pollution or dust.

The rule addresses fine particles of 2.5 micrometers in diameter, and inhalable coarse particles of 10 micrometers. A micrometer is 1/1,000th of a millimeter, and there are 25,400 micrometers in an inch. The new rule limits the amount of such particles in a cubic meter of air to a cumulative 150 micrograms over an entire 24-hour period -- the approximate concentration of one gram of a liquid (or 1/28 of an ounce) in 2½ Olympic-sized swimming pools.

The National Cattleman's Beef Association denounced the rule as "an impossible concept in naturally dusty and rural landscapes."

Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican and chairman of the Finance Committee, has invited EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson to visit his family's farm during the fall harvest.

"This will give you the opportunity to see what America's farmers are confronted with when harvesting. This visit will allow you to show me first hand how a farmer is to contain dust on their farm while combining," Mr. Grassley said in a Sept. 26 letter.

"I think the administrator is certainly willing to do what he can to help the senator help him address the concerns of his agriculture constituency," said John Scholl, Mr. Johnson's agriculture adviser.

The EPA program was first set up in 1987 to improve air quality with 54 machine monitors in cities and rural areas; the new program adds 75 monitors.

Jessica Emond, EPA spokeswoman, said 20 of the new monitors will be placed in rural areas.

"We understand certainly that any time you deal with particulate matter, it's a given that dust and dirt are an inherent part of operations," Miss Emond said.

Tamara Thies, director of environmental issues for the cattlemen's group, says this is the first time rules under the Clean Air Act have targeted "fugitive dust" in rural areas.

"When dealing with agriculture, you're dealing with dust -- crops are grown in dirt," Miss Thies said.

"The science does not show there is a health effect from dust, but the EPA has chosen to regulate it anyway," Miss Thies said.

The new rule says such ambient air monitoring systems play a critical role in the nation's air quality management.

"Exposure to particle pollution is linked to a variety of significant health problems. Particle pollution also is the main cause of visibility impairment in the nation's cities and national parks," the rule said.

A Bet On Ethanol, With A Convert At The Helm (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0078220

By Alexei Barrionuevo
The New York Times, October 8, 2006
DECATUR, Ill.

BACK in 1999, when she was the head of refining at Chevron, Patricia A. Woertz told a group of energy officials that it was "time to stop mixing agricultural policy with fuels policy."

In that same speech, at a fuels conference in Washington, Ms. Woertz also publicly expressed worry about the "unintended consequences" of a federal mandate requiring the use of corn-based ethanol in gasoline.

Today Ms. Woertz is standing on the other side of the gasoline debate, wholeheartedly supporting the growth of ethanol, the fuel the oil industry loves to hate but has had to learn to live with. In May, she took over as the chief executive of Archer Daniels Midland, the giant agricultural company that also happens to be the biggest ethanol producer in the country.

A.D.M. spent nearly three decades pushing relentlessly for the use of ethanol in gasoline, lobbying Congress and the White House and rousing farmers. But only in the last few years, amid record-high oil prices and government mandates to use ethanol, has this clear, colorless fuel — a form of ethyl alcohol — finally begun to catch on, transforming it from a dream into almost a religion in the Midwestern states that produce corn.

Ethanol has been a boon to A.D.M.'s fortunes, helping it to achieve record earnings last year of $1.3 billion on sales of $36.6 billion. While the company does not break down the sources of its profit, analysts say ethanol could make up 40 percent of A.D.M.'s net income in fiscal 2007, about double what it meant to the company last year.

With that bigger profit potential has come greater volatility in A.D.M.'s stock, which lately has mirrored more closely the rise and fall of energy prices. That has caused some analysts to caution its investors to go slow on the company.

"For the bulk of the company's history, the vast majority of their profits came from crushing products like corn to feed the world," said Eric Katzman, an analyst at Deutsche Bank. But a greater proportion of A.D.M.'s earnings will come from biofuels in the future, he said, as a large portion of the $2.4 billion the company plans to invest in the next two years is energy related.

So far, that capital is devoted to sustaining corn as the preferred crop for producing ethanol. While ethanol can be made more cheaply from sugar cane, as it is in Brazil, lobbying by A.D.M. and farm-state politicians has helped corn win out as the crop of choice for ethanol in the United States. It did not hurt that the powerful American sugar lobby helped to erect trade barriers keeping out cheaper imported sugar and cheaper imported ethanol.

MOST politicians originally saw ethanol as a way to help farmers to make more money from their corn crop. Now it is being seen by policy makers, including President Bush, as a partial antidote to the nation's reliance on foreign oil. To achieve that vision of energy independence will require much more ethanol, and many agricultural experts have begun to worry about the food-for-fuel trade-off of using so much corn — more than 60 percent of which is used to feed livestock, an important American export — to produce fuel. And corn is one of the most energy-intensive and water-intensive crops to grow anywhere.

But A.D.M. has been slow thus far to be a party to research that might sway ethanol production away from corn and into crops that require less water and fossil-fuel based fertilizers; one such crop is switchgrass, a tall prairie grass that is highly drought resistant. Some outside experts call A.D.M.'s strategy shortsighted.

"I am sure A.D.M. shareholders want the company to be economically viable for the next 20 to 25 years, not just for the next 5 to 10," said Clayton K. Yeutter, a former secretary of agriculture and United States trade representative. "If ethanol is going to be a significant part of A.D.M.'s profits, they should have as much interest in finding the lower-cost inputs as anyone would."

Sitting in a conference room in A.D.M.'s global headquarters, Ms. Woertz, 53, did not dwell on the risks of A.D.M.'s focus on corn as the primary source of ethanol. She promoted ethanol's growth potential, saying she sees the fuel making up 10 percent of the country's gasoline supply, by sometime next decade, up from about 4 percent this year.

The idea that ethanol could one day replace more than half of gasoline is not out of the realm of possibility, either, she said, but will require successful development of ethanol from agricultural waste like corn stalks, or hardy grasses like switchgrass. The technology to efficiently produce this so-called "cellulosic" ethanol is most likely many years away. In any event, "We will be there when it's there," she said. "We want to intersect the future and still be a big player in the bio-energy world."

She said she saw little contradiction in her previous concern about the fuel — a worry that she said was tied to federal clean air standards for tailpipe emissions and the debate over how to meet them. Refiners, she said, wanted to be told what the emissions standards were and to allow their scientists to find a way to meet them, rather than to have a specific gasoline formulation dictated by regulators.

"Things have evolved," she said, and the oil industry and ethanol producers "have come to work much more closely on the fuel supplies for this country."

Many analysts saw the hiring of Ms. Woertz as a signal that A.D.M. wanted to become the Exxon Mobil of ethanol. Indeed, her energy experience helped win her the job, A.D.M. officials said. But they added that she was also selected because her background as a strategic planner at Chevron gave A.D.M.'s board members the confidence that she could chart a vision for the company's future.

"We needed someone that was a proven and capable strategist," said Kelvin R. Westbrook, the board member who led the search process. Her energy experience "was a valued part of her background but by no means was it a determining factor."

Ms. Woertz arrives at a favorable time in the company's 104-year history. A.D.M. paid $400 million last year to settle the last of a pile of lawsuits stemming from a price-fixing scandal in the mid-1990's involving lysine, an animal feed additive. Three top executives were sent to prison over the scandal, including Michael D. Andreas, A.D.M.'s former executive vice president and the son of Dwayne O. Andreas, the chief executive who led the company for 27 years.

At the same time, prices are rising for high-fructose corn syrup and other products that A.D.M. processes from corn, soybeans and wheat. And the demand for ethanol is forecast to soar as federally mandated fuel formulations take effect. Congress passed a law last year requiring refiners to increase their use of ethanol to 7.5 billion gallons by 2012, from 4 billion this year.

The future looks even better, if that is possible. While the federal government has mandated greater ethanol use in the United States, European governments are pushing for higher use of soybean-based biodiesel in the fuel supply. A.D.M. is one of the world's biggest producers of both of those fuels.

A.D.M. is also the world's largest producer of food and animal feed. The company, which adopted the slogan "Supermarket to the World" in the 1990's, says it makes enough to feed 300 million people, as well as many millions of cows, chickens and pigs.

WHEN Ms. Woertz looks to the future, she sees the twin trends of a growing population that needs additional food — with a diet that increasingly demands protein — and the quest for alternative sources of energy to oil.

She said A.D.M. was "uniquely positioned" to benefit from growing global demand for both food and fuel. "We have the technologies, we have the assets and we have the infrastructure," she said.

That optimism is apparent in A.D.M.'s latest annual report, the first to feature Ms. Woertz. Its title is "We See Opportunity."

How exactly A.D.M. will go about capitalizing on its opportunities remains to be seen. Ms. Woertz says senior managers are working on a plan, to be unveiled to analysts in November, that will outline the company's biofuels strategy over the next decade.

While the plan is still being drafted, Ms. Woertz said that it clearly would involve a stronger push by A.D.M. to develop ways to make ethanol from grasses and agricultural waste — cellulosic ethanol. She hinted that the plan might involve partnerships with venture capitalists like Vinod Khosla, the founding chief executive of Sun Microsystems, who is investing in companies working on cellulosic ethanol and other alternative fuels, and stumping for ethanol all over the country.

In August, Ms. Woertz invited Mr. Khosla to sit in on a meeting in Chicago of A.D.M.'s strategic planning committee, where he briefed the executives on cellulosic ethanol opportunities.

"We have discussed opportunities we could pursue together," Ms. Woertz said of Mr. Khosla. "All of this question about the longer term is something we absolutely have under way and there will be more to come."

In Decatur, Ms. Woertz and two other top executives at the company made it clear that A.D.M.'s plans, for the moment, revolved mostly around getting ethanol from corn. The company has little concern about the amount of corn being harvested for biofuels, even as it is set to commercialize a promising new technology to produce biodegradable plastics that will use even more corn.

Ms. Woertz and the other A.D.M. executives said they believed that the genetic modification of corn seed, which has led to a 75 percent increase in corn yields since 1980, would continue to keep pace with growing demand for nonfood products like ethanol. That stands in stark contrast to the concern of some agriculture executives — notably Warren R. Staley, chief executive of Cargill, an A.D.M. rival — that if the ethanol boom were left unchecked, it would eventually raise food prices and hurt America's grain exports.

At A.D.M.'s main research center, a converted high school here in Decatur, two company executives seemed unfazed by that concern. Mark G. Matlock, senior vice president for research and development, said A.D.M. was trying to wring more ethanol out of unused parts of the corn crop. He said he was less optimistic about the near-term economics of producing ethanol from switchgrass, an idea promoted by President Bush in his State of the Union address this year. While switchgrass is cheaper to grow than corn, it would be more costly to convert to ethanol, partly because the country lacks the machines to harvest and transport switchgrass efficiently as a crop.

"From a strategy standpoint it made the most sense to look at the existing corn streams that we are handling through our network of everything from country elevators to processing facilities," said Edward A. Harjehausen, the senior vice president for food and feed ingredients. The company is involved in a research project with the Energy Department to take the corn fiber stream and convert as much of the cellulose as possible to additional ethanol.

The way the A.D.M. executives see it, by focusing on waste streams already coming out of its corn-processing plants, the company can avoid the "chicken and egg" problems that other companies may face in trying to make cellulosic ethanol from new crops like switchgrass: farmers may be hesitant to grow the grass until there is a market for the crop, but companies will be reluctant to create a market and build separate processing plants until they see a ready supply of raw material.

"Everyone has this vision in the end of a billion tons of biomass generating all of our fuel needs," Mr. Matlock said. "That is the far vision. So we focus on those intermediate steps to get to the vision."

Ms. Woertz is a fresh start for a company that had been run by four families for a century. The families once controlled more than half its board seats and still control some 10 percent of A.D.M.'s stock, analysts said. That insular grip on power allowed the company to make long-term bets, which paid off handily. In the 1970's, for example, A.D.M. invested heavily in factories to make high-fructose corn syrup, a low-cost corn-based sweetener that later replaced sugar in Coke and Pepsi and hundreds of other foods.

A.D.M. fell into the biofuels business later in the decade, when the company tried to solve a problem with seasonal overcapacity in its corn syrup plants by producing something else from abundant corn supplies: ethanol. That set off a two-decade-long lobbying and public-relations effort by the elder Mr. Andreas to win broader acceptance for ethanol as a fuel.

CRITICS, noting ethanol's shortcomings like its lower energy content versus gasoline and the fact that it receives a 51-cent-a-gallon subsidy, say that while the marketing campaign has been good for the company, it has been bad for the country. "A.D.M.'s role in the ethanol debate has largely been to provide the narrative that the politicians need to justify the handouts they want to give to farmers anyway," said Jerry Taylor, a senior fellow at the Cato Institute who has been critical of ethanol.

The ethanol promotion campaign was hurt when the lysine price-fixing scandal torpedoed A.D.M.'s reputation. Secret audio tapes made by a former executive, Mark E. Whitacre, in the early-1990's revealed a scheme by top A.D.M. executives to fix the global price for lysine with executives from Japanese, French and Korean competitors. Michael Andreas and Terrance S. Wilson, the head of corn processing, were both sentenced to two years in prison for their roles in the scandal. Mr. Whitacre was sentenced to nine years for embezzling $9.5 million at the same time he was helping the government to investigate his bosses.

Since the scandals shook public confidence in A.D.M., the board has been overhauled with independent outsiders like Mr. Westbrook, who joined in 2003 and is chief executive of Millennium Digital Media, a broadband services company. Ms. Woertz's hiring continues the trend.

"The board was cognizant of the fact that A.D.M.'s image had approached a Mafioso level over the last few decades with all the scandals," said John M. McMillin, a longtime analyst for the Prudential Equity Group. "I am not sure she understands the difference between a soybean and a rapeseed, but she knows people and has identified the people within the company to trust."

Ms. Woertz's energy background, especially in refining, has helped her grasp quickly the basics of A.D.M.'s agricultural business. Oil refiners take a barrel of crude oil and process it into a slate of products like gasoline and jet fuel. A.D.M. takes a bushel of corn or soybeans and spits out dozens of food products on the other side.

Mr. Westbrook and analysts agree that she also brings a human touch that was lacking at A.D.M. in the past. A divorced mother of three grown children, she quickly embraced the idea of moving to Decatur, a sleepy city of 78,000. Other candidates hoped to commute to work from Chicago, some 180 miles away, Mr. Westbrook said.

SHE is also comfortable with bold initiatives. A.D.M. once controlled more than 60 percent of ethanol production, but today it controls less than 25 percent after the building of a number of farmer-owned ethanol plants in recent years. A.D.M. is planning to recapture some market share by adding 550 million gallons of ethanol capacity over the next two years, pushing up its total by 50 percent, to 1.65 billion gallons.

Ms. Woertz is also fascinated by aspects of A.D.M. that have nothing to do with biofuels, especially the company's push to commercialize technology that uses corn starch to make plastics that, theoretically, at least, are biodegradable.

At one point, she reached behind her chair and pulled a clear plastic bag from her purse containing several green plastic items, including golf tees. "This is made from corn, so it is a corn and starch stream, and you can dial up or dial down the biodegradability," she said, showing off a tee. "People throw their spoons out the window from McDonald's. Ours will biodegrade."

But for now, it is ethanol, the fuel she once questioned, that is giving Ms. Woertz the spotlight. She is set to make her first public speech since becoming C.E.O. at a conference promoting biofuels on Wednesday in St. Louis, where she will be joined by Mike Johanns, the secretary of agriculture; Samuel W. Bodman, the energy secretary; and Charles O. Holliday Jr., the chief executive of DuPont. President Bush has been invited and may speak on Thursday.

One person who has reviewed Ms. Woertz's speech said it would focus on the "innovation, investment, partnership and vision" needed to ensure that biofuels "fulfill their promise in meeting global needs for sustainable supply, energy security and environmental improvement."

Oil Giants Put Energy Into Other Resources (LAT)

By Elizabeth Douglass

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Firms are dabbling in a diverse range of projects, including one in which microbes eat grease to help produce electricity.

Inside two half-million-gallon tanks built in the 1950s, a team of microorganisms is preparing to munch its way into the annals of energy innovation.

Late this month, the microbes will start transforming truckloads of restaurant grease into electricity for a water pollution control plant in Millbrae, Calif. The one-of-a-kind setup relieves the city and area eateries of a fatty disposal headache while saving energy. And it has come with the help of a surprising backer: Chevron Corp.

"You don't think of a big energy company being involved in anything but gasoline," said Dick York, superintendent of the Millbrae plant. "But Chevron is really trying to diversify. Working together, we've brought forward a project … that puts waste to work."

It's a small undertaking for a company that takes in millions of dollars in profit each day from selling oil and natural gas, not saving them. But it's part of a growing portfolio of projects backed by some of the biggest oil companies to wring energy from the sun, wind, water and waste.

Royal Dutch Shell has become one of the world's largest developers of wind farms and is part owner of two in California. Chevron operates massive geothermal plants in Indonesia and the Philippines. And BP is a partner in hydrogen power plants proposed for Carson and Scotland.

Energy executives point to such endeavors as proof that oil companies are part of a global push to rein in pollution and boost alternatives to oil and natural gas.

"We think it's important to get things done when it comes to climate change," BP Chief Executive John Browne said in an interview. "If you weigh in the balance what we've done, and what we continue to do, I think it amounts to something very significant."

Critics dismiss the efforts as "greenwash" — using environmentally friendly programs to draw attention away from unfriendly activities.

"If you look at what they are doing in terms of any kind of renewable fuel, it's swamped by a factor of 100 by what they are doing to continue to exploit fossil fuel resources," said Roland Hwang, vehicles policy director at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "If they want to have real green credentials, they need to support real policies to ensure that we can develop cleaner fuels [and] they have to support emission standards on global warming pollution."

Hwang sees Proposition 87, which would tax California oil producers to fund biofuel research, as a test of the oil companies' resolve. "They've failed miserably. They're fighting it tooth and nail," he said.

The measure's supporters say it would reduce dependence on foreign oil and create jobs in new energy ventures; opponents say it would increase oil prices and fund a state energy-research bureaucracy with no guarantee of results.

San Ramon, Calif.-based Chevron, the state's largest oil producer, is the most vigorous opponent, spending an estimated $22 million to persuade voters to reject Proposition 87 in November. Other big contributors are Aera Energy, a joint venture of Royal Dutch Shell and Exxon Mobil Corp., and Westwood-based Occidental Petroleum Corp.

In addition, none of the oil companies stood with California as it embarked on its groundbreaking move to reduce greenhouse gases. The state's ambitious Global Warming Solutions Act, signed into law Sept. 27, faced resistance from the region's largest oil industry trade associations.

"I think critics are reasonable in saying, 'Where's the walk behind the talk?' " said Nicholas Eisenberger, managing principal at GreenOrder, a New York environmental strategy and marketing firm. But, he added, "these resource-based questions, they don't get solved overnight."

A Chevron spokesman declined to discuss the company's oil tax stance, but Chief Executive David O'Reilly recently explained Chevron's opposition to the greenhouse gas law.

"We support the first step of measuring" greenhouse gases, O'Reilly said in an interview. "I think it would be better, from a state competitiveness standpoint, if we could get a similar approach to dealing with carbon emissions across the whole country." He said California "ought to be careful about launching off something in the state that divides us from the rest of the country."

BP's renewable-energy efforts have been the most visible, in part because its "Beyond Petroleum" advertising campaign has for years been highlighting the firm's accomplishments.

The London-based company is a leader in harnessing the sun's power. Its solar subsidiary is a top manufacturer of solar panels and equipment and it has installed solar systems in 100 countries. In California, the company has funded solar research at Caltech, installed a solar power system at a water pumping station in Vallejo and sold home solar systems through Home Depot.

Late last year, BP created an alternative energy subsidiary and pledged to invest $8 billion in the unit over the next decade — a commitment that dwarfs those of other oil companies. And recently, the company stepped up its wind-energy activities, announcing an alliance with Clipper Windpower Inc. and the purchase of Greenlight Energy Inc., a U.S. company with plans for 39 wind projects.

"Step by step, I think we've achieved a lot," CEO Browne said. "We have a lot more to do, both in the practical — changing the way we do business — and in inventing new businesses and new products."

But BP's efforts have also underscored the difficulties inherent in trying to reshape a company's image and focus when its profit, operations and heft are still in the oil business. A series of major mishaps have provided an uncomfortable contrast to — or mockery of, some environmentalists say — the company's professed devotion to clean energy and corporate responsibility.

Last year, an explosion killed 15 people at its Texas City, Texas, refinery, where federal investigators later cited the company for a list of "egregious and willful" safety violations. In Alaska, where BP is a significant petroleum producer, an oil leak this year was followed by a shutdown of key pipelines because of extensive corrosion, which critics said could have been avoided with proper maintenance.

In California, BP recently agreed to an $81-million settlement over claims that it illegally spewed toxic gas from its Carson refinery for nearly a decade. It also paid a $225,000 fine for nearly 300 air pollution violations at the Port of Long Beach and had 43,000 gallons of gas oil spill from a pipeline in the port.

"There's been this interesting dynamic around all the things that have happened with BP," said Eisenberger of GreenOrder. "In the environmental community, they're wondering, 'Do we yell at these guys or do we hold our fire?' And there's been a little of both."

Browne was contrite in an interview a few days before the Alaskan pipeline corrosion problem emerged.

"I regret everything that's happened," he said. "Our franchise is built on what we do, and that also includes how we respond to our own issues."

Exxon Mobil, the world's largest publicly traded oil company, has long been a lightning rod for critics of the industry's record on greenhouse gas and renewable energy issues. The Irving, Texas-based company has responded by pointing to energy-efficiency and emissions-reduction reducing projects as well as research that could improve existing fuels and vehicles.

But its efforts are relatively meager on the renewable energy front, consisting primarily of hydrogen-power research projects and a $100-million grant to fund research of solar, hydrogen, biomass and other energy technologies at Stanford University's Global Climate and Energy Project.

Exxon spokesman Russ Roberts said that the company's focus remained mostly on traditional forms of energy because it believes that the ability of renewable power sources to meet the world's needs "is very limited."

Even so, "we are doing things in alternative energy," Roberts said. "Just because we're not as visible as those other [oil companies] doesn't mean we're not doing it. We're just doing it in a different way." The company couldn't provide spending figures on alternative energy ventures.

European rival Royal Dutch Shell has invested $1 billion in alternative energy since 2000. It has installed hydrogen fueling stations in five countries and joined with Ottawa-based biotechnology firm Iogen Corp. to make ethanol from straw.

"We're getting quite a bit of experience in the renewables and alternative energy field," John Hofmeister, president of Houston-based Shell Oil Co., said in a interview. "We think that, over time, people will judge us by our deeds, not by our words."

He characterized Shell's spending on alternative energy as "the right amount for what we know and what the market is ready for."

"We will do more as we prove out the commerciality of these renewables or alternative forms of energy, and we will do more as we find the technology breakthroughs to make things happen," Hofmeister said.

At Chevron, funding for renewable-energy and energy-efficiency projects topped $1.5 billion from 2000 to 2005. The company said it expected to spend $2 billion more from 2006 through 2008 on such projects.

In addition to the Millbrae grease-to-energy project, which is an undertaking by Chevron Energy Solutions, Chevron subsidiaries have installed large commercial hydrogen fuel cells and teamed with California on hydrogen fuel tests, invested in a Texas biodiesel plant and last month pledged as much as $25 million over five years to fund research at UC Davis into next-generation biofuels.

"We have a lot of activity underway in alternatives and in energy conservation, and I think all of that is compatible with getting things done and testing them in a pragmatic way, rather than talking about them and saying this is a big issue," O'Reilly said.

At the Millbrae plant, supervisor York couldn't be happier. He credits Chevron with finding a way for the wastewater plant to produce its own power and at the same time collect and put to use 4,000 pounds per day of the kinds of kitchen grease that has for years clogged and damaged its sewer pipes.

"We've gotten calls from as far away as Singapore … grease is a universal problem," York said. Their solution, he added, "is a natural process that we've learned to enhance."

Come opening day, the $5.5-million project will include a 24-hour automated drop-off system for grease haulers and two giant waste tanks teeming with 19 kinds of microorganisms. In digesting the mix, the organisms will create methane gas that will power — along with natural gas — a 250-kilowatt microturbine.

That electricity will heat the tanks and other operations, replacing a smaller generator that emits more pollutants. The system also will save Millbrae the cost of buying power.

"We're excited about it, and we know it's going to work," York said. What's more, he added, "packaging energy in new ways is beneficial. We can't keep going back to the old oil well."

U.S. Rules Allow The Sale Of Products Others Ban (LAT)

By Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Chemical-laden goods outlawed in Europe and Japan are permitted in the American market.

OAKLAND — Destined for American kitchens, planks of birch and poplar plywood are stacked to the ceiling of a cavernous port warehouse. The wood, which arrived in California via a cargo ship, carries two labels: One proclaims "Made in China," while the other warns that it contains formaldehyde, a cancer-causing chemical.

Because formaldehyde wafts off the glues in this plywood, it is illegal to sell in many countries — even the one where it originated, China. But in the United States this wood is legal, and it is routinely crafted into cabinets and furniture.

As the European Union and other nations have tightened their environmental standards, mostly in the last two years, manufacturers — here and around the world — are selling goods to American consumers that fail to meet other nations' stringent laws for toxic chemicals.

Wood, toys, electronics, pesticides and cosmetics are among U.S. products that contain substances that are banned or restricted elsewhere, particularly in Europe and Japan, because they may raise the risk of cancer, alter hormones or cause reproductive or neurological damage.

Michael Wilson, a professor at UC Berkeley's Center for Occupational and Environmental Health, said the United States is becoming a "dumping ground" for consumer goods that are unwanted and illegal in much of the world. Wilson warned earlier this year in a report commissioned by the California Legislature that "the United States has fallen behind globally in the move toward cleaner technologies."

The European Union, driven by consumers' concerns, has banned or heavily restricted hundreds of toxic substances in recent years, invoking its "precautionary principle," which is codified into law and prescribes that protective steps should be taken when there is scientific evidence of risks to public health or the environment.

Meanwhile, the Environmental Protection Agency and other federal agencies have relied on voluntary steps from industries rather than regulations, saying the threats posed by low levels of chemicals are too uncertain to eliminate products valuable to consumers or businesses.

In the absence of U.S. regulations, some international corporations, including Hewlett-Packard, Dell, Mattel, Revlon and Orly International, have declared that all their products, no matter where they are made or sold, will comply with EU standards, the most stringent chemical laws in the world.

"We don't operate to different standards in different parts of the globe, regardless of differing environmental standards," said John Frey, manager of corporate environmental strategies at Palo Alto-based Hewlett-Packard.

But many U.S. and foreign companies do.

Some toys, nail polishes and other beauty products are made with plastic softeners and solvents called phthalates that the EU has banned as reproductive toxins. Several of U.S. agriculture's most popular herbicides and insecticides, including atrazine, endosulfan and aldicarb, are illegal or restricted to emergency uses in other countries. And a few electronic items, including Palm's Treo 650 smart phone and Apple's iSight camera, were pulled off shelves in Europe this summer because of lead components but are still sold here.

Industry groups say their products have undergone rigorous reviews in the United States and are not only legal here but safe. They say some governments, particularly the EU, have overreacted and banned chemicals with little or no evidence of a human health threat.

"Consumers can remain confident about using their cosmetics given their oversight by the Food and Drug Administration, the extensive research on their safety and long history of safe use," the Cosmetic, Toiletry and Fragrance Assn. said.

The EPA hasn't eliminated any industrial compounds since it sought unsuccessfully to ban asbestos 18 years ago. Unlike EU policies, U.S. law requires the EPA to prove a toxic substance "presents an unreasonable risk of injury to health or the environment," consider the costs of restricting its use and choose "the least burdensome" approach to regulate industry.

"The dumping problem is concentrated in a few product sectors. But these sectors happen to be really ubiquitous in the everyday lives of Americans. Chemical risks are being spread all over the country in ways that are invisible to consumers," said Alastair Iles, an international chemical policy expert who was a research fellow at UC Berkeley and still works with faculty there on consumer issues.

Last year alone, China exported to the United States more than half a billion dollars' worth of hardwood plywood — enough to build cabinets for 2 million kitchens, a sixfold increase since 2002. Though China sends low-formaldehyde timber to Japan and Europe, Americans are getting wood that emits substantially higher levels of the chemical.

One birch plank from China, bought at a Home Depot store in Portland, gave off 100 times more formaldehyde than legal in Japan and 30 times more than allowed in Europe and China, according to July tests conducted by a lab hired by an Oregon-based wood products manufacturer. Formaldehyde exposure has been shown in human studies to cause nose and throat cancer and possibly leukemia, as well as allergic reactions, asthma attacks, headaches and sore throats.

With no government standards, monitoring or labeling, U.S. consumers cannot easily identify chemical-free products.

"I'll guarantee you that no one tells a customer building a $75,000 kitchen that their cabinets contain plywood from China that will off-gas formaldehyde," said Larry Percivalle of Oakland-based EarthSource Forest Products, a distributor that sells low-formaldehyde and sustainably grown wood.

In the wood industry, even though low-cost, chemical-free substitutes are available, much of the plywood, fiberboard and particleboard sold in the United States is manufactured with adhesives, or glues, that contain formaldehyde, said Michael Wolfe, a wood products consultant in Emeryville, Calif.

The only formaldehyde standard for wood in the U.S. is one that applies just to subsidized, low-income housing. U.S. companies voluntarily meet it for all products, though it allows 10 times more formaldehyde than Japan's standards.

California may step in. The Air Resources Board is considering standards roughly equivalent to Europe's for 2008 and Japan's for 2010 through 2012.

The air board estimates that one of every 10,000 Californians is at risk of contracting cancer from breathing average formaldehyde levels found in homes and offices.

"We have a problem that needs to be addressed, we have technology to do it, and there is no requirement for it to happen. Nationally, no one is stepping forward, so we think this is an area where we can," said Mike Scheible, the air board's deputy executive officer.

Columbia Forest Products, which spent $8 million to switch all its factories to nontoxic glues made of soy flour, says it is being hurt by the lack of U.S. standards for wood.

"While I believe in free trade, I also believe that everybody ought to be held to the same standard," said Harry Demorest, the Portland-based company's president and chief executive. "It's particularly galling and frustrating in the Chinese case, when they're taking our market with products that have high formaldehyde content when we know full well that they can produce it with lower formaldehyde."

Despite its capital investment, Columbia, which is North America's largest producer of hardwood plywood and veneer, has not raised its prices to compensate because the soy glues are as inexpensive as formaldehyde glues, Demorest said.

The state air board estimates that switching to formaldehyde-free glues like those required in Japan would increase the price of a sheet of particleboard from today's $7 to about $9 in 2010.

California's proposal is opposed by nearly all wood producers, who say it could drive them out of business if they are forced to do what Columbia did.

"The entire industry is not ready to make this change. Today we could not be competitive by changing resins," said Darrell Keeling, a general manager at Roseburg Forest Products in Oregon.

Keeling said his company makes some low-formaldehyde products but most customers aren't interested because they cost more.

"Even though people talk green and think green, they won't demonstrate their commitment to it with their wallet," he said. "More regulation and more bureaucracy is not the best way to drive change."

But selling products with risky chemicals to Americans while removing them for consumers elsewhere is shortsighted, said Robert Donkers, the European Commission's Environmental Counselor in Washington, D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0078227

"If companies decide to wait and see rather than innovate, they will lose the market," he said. "American consumers follow closely what is happening in other parts of the world. So they can say, 'Hey, you make them in Europe, why don't you sell them to us?'

"Legally, you can still use these chemicals, but you're not doing your company any favors."

Banned Elsewhere, Compounds Still Used In U.S. (LAT)

By Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Although chemical bans overseas have prompted some manufacturers to reformulate all their products worldwide, many toys and cosmetics are exceptions.

Europe banned or restricted six phthalate compounds in toys. In beauty products, Europe has eliminated 900 compounds, including two phthalates, suspected of causing reproductive disorders, cancer or genetic mutations.

The U.S. toy industry said seven years ago, when the European Union first banned some phthalates, that it would voluntarily remove them from products for babies and toddlers. But last year, 15 of 18 vinyl bath toys, teethers that babies chew on and other toys purchased at U.S. stores contained the chemicals, according to tests by the activist organization U.S. Public Interest Research Group. One plastic book labeled "phthalate free" contained phthalates.

Low levels of phthalates, used mostly to soften plastic, are in the bodies of nearly all Americans tested. Animal studies and some human research show that they block testosterone and cause reproductive abnormalities in male newborns.

Federal officials have concluded that the low doses in toys and cosmetics pose little risk. The Toy Industry Assn. does not track the chemicals, saying "the choice to use phthalates in toys sold in the United States is up to the individual manufacturer."

Mattel, which owns Fisher-Price, says all its products will comply with the EU rules by the end of this year.

In cosmetics, some companies, including OPI Products, the largest maker of manicurists' products, have kept nail polishes with the phthalate DBP on U.S. shelves for two years after the EU's 2004 ban. OPI this fall changed course and said it soon will be DBP-free to save the cost of making two formulas.

Orly International, which sells nail lacquer in 66 countries, decided to be "better safe than sorry" and immediately removed DBP from all formulations, said marketing director Mia Jenner.

"If they remove it there, why shouldn't we remove it here?" she said. "It's a no-brainer."

Anger Drives Property Rights Measures (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

PICABO, Idaho — Cheeks chapped, patience thinned, Katie Breckenridge had no trouble making up her mind about an Idaho ballot measure that would make the government pay property owners if zoning rules reduce the value of their land.

“Do I think this is almost swinging the pendulum back too far in the other direction? I do,” said Ms. Breckenridge, 61, a rancher just in from tending to cattle and quarter horses. “But do I think we’ve got to do something to bring the balance back to property rights? I do, and I’m going to vote for it.”

More than a year after Suzette Kelo and several of her neighbors in New London, Conn., lost their battle against eminent domain in the United States Supreme Court, the backlash against the ruling has made property rights one of the most closely watched ballot issues nationwide.

Already, 30 state legislatures have enacted restrictions on eminent domain in response to the court ruling. Now voters here and in 11 other states will consider property rights measures in November, making it the election’s most prevalent ballot issue.

Most of the measures would limit eminent domain to some degree, while others, in Western states, would go further, imposing new restrictions on government’s ability to enforce zoning laws, even if those laws are intended to reduce sprawl and improve safety.

In the Kelo case, the Supreme Court ruled that government could transfer private land from one owner to another for the sake of economic development. But the court made a point of saying states were free to change their laws.

Even opponents of the ballot measures concede that support for them appears strong in public opinion polls. They predict years of court fights if the measures pass.

“This thing is an abomination, the way it’s written, the way it’s being sold,” Nils Ribi, a City Council member in nearby Sun Valley who opposes the Idaho measure.

DOJ_NMG_0078228

Supporters of the ballot efforts in the West — often called "Kelo-plus" — say they want to stop so-called regulatory takings, the idea that government effectively takes private property when zoning laws limit how it can be used.

Opponents say the regulatory-takings initiatives are essentially a ruse, that they are trying to exploit anger over the Kelo decision and eminent domain to roll back zoning regulations that are critical to controlling growth, protecting the environment and preserving property values.

The more far-reaching proposals in the West — in Idaho, Arizona, California and Washington State — are citizens' initiatives supported by signature petitions, and they are often supported financially and logistically by national libertarian groups.

This House Is My Home, a group based in Boise that is sponsoring the Idaho measure, Proposition 2, is among groups in several states that have received strong financial help from Fund for Democracy, headed by Howard S. Rich, the New York real estate investor who is chairman of the libertarian group Americans for Limited Government. As of late June, Fund for Democracy had given at least $237,000 to This House Is My Home, about two-thirds of the money raised by the group. The next filing deadline is Oct. 10.

"We are essentially a 'networking station' that brings together grass-roots activists, donors and community leaders who share a common interest," John Tillman, president of Americans for Limited Government, said in an e-mail message. "In this case, that common interest is in restoring property rights for the average citizen."

Affluent outsiders have been drawn to Idaho in recent decades, lured by technology jobs, mountain recreation and abundant sunshine. Boise, the capital, has boomed, as has Sun Valley, where newcomers from California build second homes not far from ranchers who herd sheep over the Sawtooth Mountains. About two-thirds of Idaho land is under federal control, and frustration runs deep in rural areas with newcomers who, after buying their piece of paradise, try to restrict land use further in the name of preservation and environmentalism.

"Katie's family, my family, they did this great job of developing this country," said Rob Struthers, 59, Ms. Breckenridge's partner in life and work. "Now all these people come in and say, 'Wow, what a beautiful place.' But they don't trust us to keep it that way. Instead of rewarding us, they're penalizing us."

In an era of sun-splashed subdivisions, land here can be a farmer's greatest asset. Mr. Ribi, the councilman, expressed some sympathy for farmers who have been "down-zoned" under a new county plan.

But Mr. Ribi, a venture capitalist, is trying to galvanize opposition to the initiative by tapping the same independent streak that may make some anti-government Idahoans interested in the measure.

"These are guys on the right wing who always want local control and all of a sudden they're saying let's let these guys from Washington, D.C., and outside think tanks have control," Mr. Ribi said. "That's why I think we've lost perspective."

If the Supreme Court ruling in the Connecticut case inflamed passions for property rights, the initiatives in the Western states are more directly rooted in events in Oregon. In 2004, Oregon voters passed a measure that allowed property owners to file claims that zoning restrictions had hurt their property value. That law, known as Measure 37, requires government to either pay for the lost value or waive the zoning rules if an owner makes a successful claim.

About 2,400 claims totaling more than $5.6 billion have been filed since the measure was upheld in court this spring, according to the Oregon Department of Land and Conservation Development. "Not a penny" has been paid to property owners, said Sheila A. Martin, director of the Institute of Portland Metropolitan Studies at Portland State University. Local governments, lacking money to pay, have simply waived the zoning rules.

But while Measure 37 grew out of frustration with Oregon's famously strict zoning rules, Idaho does not have such comprehensive restrictions. Even if some rural landowners are frustrated with new zoning rules, said Stephanie Witt, director of the Center for Public Policy at Boise State University, "It's not like people are rebelling against this really restrictive growth management law."

The Castle Coalition, a property rights group that has fought for eminent domain overhauls, does not list a single "eminent domain abuse" case in Idaho on its Web site. It calls Idaho "one of the best states in the country for protecting owners from eminent domain abuse."

John Eaton, government affairs director for the Idaho Association of Realtors, said the initiative "blows up the stability that we have right now."

"We're the property rights people but we're not going to support this," he said. "This is crazy."

Ms. Breckenridge, dusty boots on the mat by the door, was not ready to predict how the vote might go up in swank Sun Valley or down in urban Boise. Closer to home, however, she was confident.

"Everybody that's connected to the land is going to vote for it," she said, "because there's an anger, a rising anger."

IMMIGRATION:

In New York Immigration Court, Asylum Roulette (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

Tears streaked Meizi Liu's face in 2003 as she told an immigration judge in New York of being forcibly sterilized in China. The judge, Jeffrey S. Chase, had won awards as a human rights advocate before his appointment to the bench in 1995. But now he had 1,000 pending cases, and he had heard it all before.

He insisted that she was lying, ridiculed her story and, when she would not recant, denied her petition for asylum.

The tables turned after appeals by Ms. Liu and others reached federal court this year. In scathing decisions, the court rebuked Judge Chase for "pervasive bias and hostility," "combative and insulting language" and remarks "implying that any asylum claim based on China's coercive family planning policies would be presumed incredible."

It is always judgment day in the windowless courtrooms where immigrants plead to stay in the United States. But these days, as never before, the nation's 218 immigration judges are also being judged, even as they struggle to complete 350,000 cases a year amid an immigration debate that promises to send them many more.

Appeals courts criticize some judges by name, citing abusive behavior and bad decisions. Studies highlight stark disparities in judgment, like 90 percent of asylum cases granted by one judge and 9 percent down the hall. Faced with mounting criticism, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales vowed to introduce yearly performance evaluations of the judges, who are Justice Department employees. The Harvard Law Review urged a campaign to turn the five worst judges into "media villains" to motivate reform.

Yet a more complicated picture emerges in the federal building in Lower Manhattan. There, Judge Chase, who colleagues say is chastened since being rebuked, is one of 27 immigration judges searching for ways to handle 20,000 cases a year, driven as much by scarce resources and escalating demands as by quirks of personality and power.

In asylum cases, the wrong decision can be a death sentence. In others, banishment hangs in the balance, with the prospect of families split up or swept into harm's way. But before they can consider the merits of a case, judges must cope with an intricate web of laws, changing conditions in distant lands, and a mix of false and truthful testimony in 227 tongues vulnerable to an interpreter's mistake as small as pronouncing "rebels" like "robbers."

As the caseload has grown, spurred in part by stepped-up enforcement, so has the pace demanded by "case completion goals" set in Washington.

To stay afloat, New York judges schedule 30 to 70 cases at a time, hold 4 contested hearings a day and decide more than 15 cases a week, all without law clerks, bailiffs, stenographers or enough competent lawyers.

"The court is a stepchild of the whole immigration system," said Sandra Coleman, who spent years on the immigration bench in Miami. "They want to make the judges the villains, and there are judges who are villains, I don't deny that. But the problem is the system."

Many federal judges agree. "I fail to see how immigration judges can be expected to make thorough and competent findings of fact and conclusions of law under these circumstances," John M. Walker Jr., chief judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, told the Senate Judiciary Committee in April, urging that the number of immigration judges be doubled.

With one of the largest caseloads among the nation's 53 immigration courts, and with nearly half its cases concerning asylum, New York illustrates the crunch that judges face in many big cities where complicated matters crowd the docket.

Caseloads exploded in the 1990's. In 2000, an unpublished report by a Justice Department evaluation team warned that New York judges were "reaching the point of exhaustion and burnout."

The report urged a slower pace and an increase in the staff-judge ratio to three to one from two to one. Instead, an evaluation last year found that the ratio had slipped even lower.

Justice Department rules do not allow immigration judges to speak to reporters. But weeks of observation, court records and interviews with lawyers, clerks, interpreters and immigrants show that the judges are coping in very different ways, with far-reaching consequences.

Patricia Rohan, who keeps a twinkling Statue of Liberty lamp in her chambers, is recognized after 24 years on the bench as a model of soft-spoken fairness and efficiency.

On a recent weekday, with 575 cases pending, she patiently took notes as a man who shells fish explained why deportation to Gambia would put his Bronx-born daughters at risk of genital mutilation. She gently questioned an Ecuadorean cleaning woman of 55 who avowed that love, not a green card, had prompted her marriage to an American 15 years after she immigrated illegally. Teasing out supporting evidence in both cases, Judge Rohan dictated favorable decisions into an aging tape recorder.

Other judges have a different approach. Sandy K. Hom, appointed in 1993, is also invariably polite, but so quick and predictable in his denials of asylum — 91 percent in recent years, compared with Judge Rohan's 25 percent — that lawyers regularly advise people assigned to him to move to another state.

Given his speed, he has the fewest pending cases, about 345. But many of his decisions have been rejected on appeal, including one in which he denied asylum to a widowed Armenian Christian and her children and ordered them deported to Iraq, arguing that since Saddam Hussein's ouster, they had no reason to fear religious persecution.

In another case, records show, he mixed up the medical documents presented by Janeta Kutina, a 69-year-old Latvian woman of Jewish heritage, confusing the deaths of her father and her husband, both victims of anti-Semitic violence. Then, the appeals court found, he cited his own mistake as evidence that her account was inconsistent.

Down the hall and at the other end of the spectrum, Margaret McManus grants asylum at the highest rate in the country — 90 percent — but at the price of what Kevin Kerr, president of the clerks' and interpreters' union local, complains is a chaotic calendar with 931 pending cases. She typically reschedules cases until petitioners can secure supporting documents, pursue other avenues or find lawyers.

A judge's fact-finding is much harder without a lawyer to speak for those facing deportation, who are not entitled to court-appointed counsel. Many get what the 2000 Justice Department report called "the high-volume, low-margin, piecework approach" practiced by "an unsavory subculture" of "travel agency" lawyers. Nor do government lawyers know each case.

Judge Chase's trajectory illustrates why those judges unable to come to terms with the system's deficiencies may risk losing their judicial bearings.

As a young immigration lawyer, he joined rallies on behalf of Chinese asylum-seekers and gave other lawyers videotaped lessons on asylum.

"Some of the judges will have their minds made up before they enter the courtroom, depending on the country an immigrant is from," Mr. Chase, whose wife immigrated from Iran, told a Newsday reporter in 1995. "A judge needs to start each case with a clean slate and listen to the lawyer and the applicant. Rather than have that look on his face of 'Why are you wasting my time?' "

But before long, incredulous tirades became his trademark in many Chinese asylum cases, according to court records and interviews with a dozen lawyers. Openly frustrated with a pattern of boilerplate claims that he suspected had been concocted by smugglers, he applied his own tests of honesty.

In September 1999, at the first court appearance of Guo-Le Huang, who said his wife had been forced to have an abortion in her last month of pregnancy, Judge Chase rejected the man's assertion that he was not working because he lacked papers.

"That is the most ridiculous thing I have ever heard," Judge Chase said, setting the tone he would take with Mr. Huang over two years. "I'm not going to waste my court time on this case." He questioned why Mr. Huang lived in a Hispanic neighborhood, interrupted an account of persecution with sarcasm and berated him for giving up his firstborn for adoption because she was a girl, calling the act "sexist" and "inhumane."

In the harried world of immigration court, many lawyers seemed to accept his tactics as an idiosyncratic tool, not unlike the long wooden claw that another judge, lacking a clerk, uses to hand down documents. And, statistics show, Judge Chase granted 42 percent of the 2,729 asylum requests he heard through 2004, including 250 of 943 from China.

"He's trying very hard to get to the truth," said one lawyer, Robert Murtha. "A lot of these people, if you look behind the foolish lies they're telling, they really do have a case. But the lawyer that they go to adapts their story to conform with the pattern, and it does drive him crazy."

Another lawyer, Peter Lobel, described Judge Chase as a "deeply caring man," whose approach was " 'I don't care what your claim is, just be honest with me.' " But he added, "He got so it was like an interrogation."

Several lawyers credited Judge Chase with unusual generosity to petitioners who admitted to falsehoods — no help to those who maintained they were telling the truth. Ms. Liu, now 39, the asylum-seeker who told of being forcibly sterilized, testified that family-planning cadres in China subjected her to painful uterine surgery when her second child was a baby. She fled in 2000, leaving her children in hopes of reunion in America.

"The judge said, 'You have been lying all day, but if you admit to lying, I will grant your case,' " Ms. Liu recalled through an interpreter. "I was very angry, because everything I said was true."

In 2003, she appealed his denial to the Board of Immigration Appeals, the internal review body. But a year earlier, its reviews had been sharply curtailed when John Ashcroft, then attorney general, cut board membership to 11 from 23 and set tight deadlines to reduce a large backlog. Single board members issued 50 decisions a day, typically one-sentence rulings affirming denials.

Like Ms. Liu, many of those who received such decisions turned to federal court. Second Circuit filings jumped 53 percent; it is finding merit in 20 percent of the immigration appeals, returning them for revision.

Ms. Liu's case was remanded in February, and lawyers say Judge Chase tried to change. But in July, the 2001 Huang case caught up with him, in a blistering Second Circuit decision prominently published in The New York Law Journal.

Mr. Lobel described the judge as devastated and braced for more: "He said, 'I learned my lesson, but some of these cases are still in the pipeline.' "

Ms. Liu is still waiting, too, and worrying about which judge will decide her family's fate.

New Wall Not Expected To Stop Migrants (AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Rising from the Pacific surf and zig-zagging along the border for 14 miles, Tijuana's border fence has done little but push illegal migrants into the Arizona desert and feed the smuggling industry since it went up in 1994.

Today, as the U.S. prepares to build a high-tech barrier with 700 miles of extra fencing, motion detectors and remote controlled devices, smugglers are already figuring out how to beat the new security.

Even before President Bush signed the $1.2 billion funding bill Wednesday to strengthen busy crossing points, border patrol figures indicated that smugglers have been hiding more migrants in vehicles, or diverting them across one of the most inhospitable sections of the border — a mountainous stretch of searing desert near Yuma, Ariz.

Some experts predict smugglers could turn to boats and tunnels, two methods popular with drug smugglers but seldom used by migrant traffickers.

"It doesn't matter what they do. There isn't a wall that can stop people because there will always be someone who finds a way to cross," said 37-year-old Jose Lopez, a construction worker who said he had just been deported to Tijuana after being detained in San Francisco.

Because he has three children still in the U.S., Lopez is considering crossing again, even though he risks three years in jail because of prior arrests for carrying fake ID.

No amount of border security will stop illegal immigration; the reality is that roughly half the estimated 12 million undocumented foreigners in the United States entered on bona fide visas and stayed after they expired.

While the interview process for visas has become tougher, it has failed to stop these so-called "overstays" from reaching for the American dream.

If they cannot get a visa, there's a smuggling business that moves millions of people from Mexican towns to employers throughout the United States.

The increased enforcement that began with Operation Gatekeeper in 1994 — and produced the corrugated metal and chain-link fence — dramatically cut illegal border crossings in the Tijuana-San Diego area, but overall, they kept their pace. Total arrests along the nearly 2,000-mile border with Mexico has ebbed and flowed since then but changed little: 1.3 million in 1995, compared with 1.2 million in 2005.

Trafficking has flourished; the average price for being smuggled through a port of entry in the Tijuana-San Diego area — usually in the trunk of a car or using false or borrowed documents — shot up from $300 in 1994 to $2,500. Crossing through the Arizona desert can cost up to $1,800.

Jose Ramos, a professor and researcher at the Tijuana-based Colegio de la Frontera Norte, a think-tank focused on border affairs, expects smugglers to charge even more as they look for new ways to cross.

"These organizations will have to innovate, become more sophisticated, and for the migrant that will mean an even higher cost," Ramos said. "It wouldn't surprise me if smugglers began crossing migrants through underground tunnels or began using boats."

In Altar, a Mexican farming town of 7,000 and a gathering point for those heading to Arizona, hundreds of men carrying backpacks and jugs of water mill around the town's plaza. They are waiting for their smugglers to drive them to the final staging area, Sasabe, which borders on the sparsely populated Tohono O'odham Indian reservation on the U.S. side.

Hiking for days through snake-infested desert under a broiling sun, some don't survive. Still, the paths through the desert near Sasabe are less hostile than the terrain near Yuma, which is expected to become the next big crossing area.

Other migrants are locked in the back of tractor-trailers, stuffed in hollowed-out dashboards or hidden in car engines, risking suffocation and heat exhaustion.

From Oct. 1, 2005, to Sept. 15 of this year, 426 people died while illegally crossing the border, and the Colegio de la Frontera Norte says the death toll since 1994 is about 3,700.

"More walls will make it more difficult for migrants to cross, but they will keep trying, even if they risk dying," said Luis Kendzierski, a priest who directs a Tijuana migrant shelter.

Often, migrants too tired or poor to attempt another crossing end up staying just south of the border. Ramos said Tijuana's population has more than doubled to about 1.3 million since the U.S. crackdown began.

"This has created all sorts of problems for Tijuana, and many other border cities where this happens, because they lack the necessary public services," he said.

Jesus Villalobos, 31, deported from Los Angeles a week ago, plans to hire a smuggler before crossing again — as soon as possible, to beat the new security measures.

"I need to get back because my daughter is there, my life is there," Villalobos said while resting at a migrant shelter in Tijuana.

"It's already dangerous to cross, and with another wall it will only get more dangerous and expensive."

Associated Press reporter Luis Perez contributed to this story from Tijuana.

A Country Of Newcomers (LAT)

By William H. Frey

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Americans need a more rational discussion of immigration, which is the driving force for population growth.

NEARLY 30 years ago, President Lyndon B. Johnson stood before the U.S. Census Bureau's Population Clock to proclaim the arrival of the 200-millionth American.

But don't expect President Bush to do the same when the 300-millionth American is anointed within a week or so.

This time around, because of the milestone's connection with the politically charged issue of immigration, and because of the backlash immigrants have generated in much of the country, the president most likely will remain quiet.

Because the truth is, it is immigration that is driving the growth of the U.S. population. In fact, odds are that the 300-millionth American will be the child of immigrants or an immigrant himself — as likely as not born or residing in Los Angeles. Right now, about half of U.S. population growth in any given year or month is attributable (through migration or natural increase) to Latinos, the vast majority of whom are either first- or second-generation Americans. To celebrate this fact publicly just a few weeks before the midterm elections would be tantamount to rolling the political dice.

The volatility of this issue has much to do with the culture clash that this 300-millionth American symbolizes: He or she is arriving, after all, in a profoundly different mainstream America than 30 years ago.

At the heart of of this mainstream are the baby boomers, who now comprise most adults over age 40. This much-ballyhooed generation came to embody the image of middle America during the second half of the last century. Conceived during the prosperous post-World War II period, they brought a rebellious, progressive sensibility to the country in the 1960s and '70s and beyond. With the help of the programs of the Great Society, they became the most well-schooled generation to date and the epitome of America's largely white suburban middle class with which most of today's adults now identify.

Yet, the boomers also came of age at a moment when the U.S. was becoming more insular than it had been before; they, in fact, had less exposure to immigrants and foreign wars than their parents. From 1946 to 1964, the years of the boom, the immigrant share of the U.S. population shrunk to an all-time low (under 5%), and those who did arrive were largely whites from Europe.

Despite their interest in righting domestic wrongs, such as racial discrimination, and bursting glass ceilings, boomers did not have much interaction with people from other countries.

Perhaps it should come as no surprise then that the once liberal baby boomers — who now constitute the core of middle-aged middle America — should be resistant to the country's new younger generation, increasingly made up of first- and second-generation Latin Americans and Asians.

This is especially the case as these newcomers spill out to a heartland which, until recently, was strewn with modern-day "Leave It to Beaver" communities — a dispersal that has spawned about 500 largely anti-immigrant bills introduced in the first half of this year, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

What used to be thought of as white flight on the part of the previous generation, which flocked to the suburbs during the 1950s and '60s, is now taking the form of "white fright." Indeed, a Pew Research Center survey in March shows that more than half of the population over 50 believes that immigrants are a burden because they take housing, jobs and healthcare.

Yet, there is actually little need to worry about immigration. It adds a needed youthful element to a population that would become stagnant if it had to rely on the far-below-replacement fertility of the nation's aging native-born whites. Their infusion into the workforce will be especially useful to retiring boomers who wish to be supported in their golden years.

The low immigration years, through which most of today's adult population grew up, were atypical in our history. The "pull yourself up by the bootstrap" attitudes of the early 20th century foreign-stock generations, who survived the Depression and World War II, created the circumstances that made way for the baby boomers.

THE SAME KIND of can-do attitudes are evident among early 21st century immigrants and their children, who show a willingness to work hard, learn English, move to the suburbs and achieve the American dream.

Today's immigration debate is both emotionally and politically charged, but a more rational discussion is possible once the dust settles after the November elections. Such a discussion should move beyond the immediate illegal immigration rancor and focus on how best to provide our newcomers and their children a pathway to the middle class — the same path we and our parents were handed.

Meanwhile, let's celebrate the arrival of the 300-millionth American, be he from across the border or born to a Latino mother here in Southern California. He may not be a boomer, but he is our future.

The 300 Millionth Footprint On U.S. Soil (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

By one count, more than half of all the people who have ever lived in the United States are living today. And their ranks are expanding. On any given day, 11,000 babies are born and 3,000 immigrants arrive, outnumbering the people who die or emigrate.

At the current rate, the person who tips the population past 300 million will emerge in a week or so.

The recent surge of immigrants actually makes America's diversity closer to what it was in 1915, when the 100 millionth arrived, than in 1967, when the 200 millionth was born (chances are nearly even that a baby born today will be Hispanic). At all three milestones, the nation was either on the verge of war or already in one.

An American born today will most likely have fewer siblings, delay marriage and other trappings of adulthood, retire later and live longer.

There's a good chance that the 100 millionth did not live long enough to witness the birth of the 200 millionth. The 300 millionth will be only at the midpoint of life when, according to today's estimates, the 400 millionth is born, sometime around 2050.

Getting A Handle On Illegal Immigrant Crime Difficult (HC)

By Peggy O'hare

Houston Chronicle, October 8, 2006

Numbers are sketchy, but some experts agree group adds strain

The slaying of Houston police officer Rodney Johnson by a Mexican national who returned here after being deported has cast another uncomfortable spotlight on the estimated 400,000 illegal immigrants living in the Greater Houston metropolitan area.

Making up about 10 percent of the area's population, this demographic — alternately scorned as freeloaders and defended as hard workers seeking better lives — accounts for 7 percent to 9 percent of those caught up in the local criminal justice system as inmates or defendants.

While various agencies acknowledge such statistics are incomplete, the numbers nonetheless indicate that immigrants living here without authorization have an impact on Harris County's courts and jails, as well as the state's prisons.

Even a single-digit assessment of 7 percent to 9 percent of the people flowing into the doors of these various entities can involve thousands of people and millions of dollars each year.

"I believe it has created a tremendous burden on the criminal justice system," said U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Austin, who hosted a congressional subcommittee hearing on the immigration controversy in Houston six weeks ago. "Any percentage of illegal aliens coming in the United States with a criminal history is unacceptable, whether it's 1 percent or 10 percent. All you have to do is talk to the family of Rodney Johnson to verify that."

Still, academics who have studied the immigrant population for years caution against making sweeping judgments of a vast population segment they say is unfairly suffering public wrath for the actions of a few.

With the number of deportations at an all-time high, they question critics' assessment of how Houston should control this burgeoning population.

DOJ_NMG_0078234

"The laws are very tough already. I'm not sure there needs to be a toughening-up of the laws," said Joseph Vail, director of the University of Houston Law Center's Immigration Clinic, which represents indigent migrants in immigration matters.

"There may need to be a more effective use of the laws. But the laws already are very tough, and they've been that way since 1996," he said, referring to the passage of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, which vastly expanded the number of offenses that can lead to deportation.

While Vail questions how accurate the estimated numbers of illegal immigrants might be, he understands the volatility surrounding the issue, especially considering the recent outrage over Johnson's death.

"Any alien who's here unlawfully and is arrested or convicted of a crime and has to be incarcerated at taxpayer expense is a burden," Vail said.

Costing millions of dollarsA paucity of statistics makes it difficult to assess how much impact illegal immigrants actually have on public safety and the criminal justice system.

But the inmate populations in the Harris County Jail and state prisons — and the nearly 81,000 defendants referred to the county's local Pretrial Services each year — offer some clues.

According to testimony from Harris County sheriff's Maj. Michael O'Brien at a recent U.S. House subcommittee hearing hosted by McCaul in Houston, the Sheriff's Department spent more than 15 percent of its budget in the most recent fiscal year to investigate, arrest, process, incarcerate and provide medical care to illegal immigrants.

At the time, O'Brien testified, this amounted to more than $41 million, but sheriff's officials said Friday that the actual cost attributed just to those who willingly admitted to being in the U.S. illegally was probably closer to $28 million.

The Texas Department of Criminal Justice, meanwhile, estimated it cost $132 million to incarcerate illegal immigrants in its prisons during the 2005 fiscal year, according to testimony given by a TDCJ official at McCaul's hearing.

Both agencies recovered only a fraction of the money spent through a federal grant program designed to help state and local governments with the costs of incarcerating the undocumented.

Under the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program administered by the U.S. Department of Justice, Texas' state prison system recovered more than $18.5 million — just 14 percent of what it spent locking up undocumented immigrants in its facilities that year.

The Harris County Sheriff's Department, meanwhile, recovered about 10 percent of its costs from the same federal program — or about $2.7 million — which left the rest of the bill to be shouldered by taxpayers.

Harris County received the second-highest payment of any governmental agency in Texas, second only to the prison system.

Records provided by the federal funding program show Harris County locked up 972 illegal immigrants for at least four days in its jail facilities throughout the fiscal year, along with 3,104 other inmates whose immigration status was unknown. Those who spent less than four days in jail weren't counted.

Courts feel impact, tooThe Texas prison system, meanwhile, incarcerated 7,863 undocumented migrants in that same time period, along with 3,852 more inmates whose immigration status remained in question.

A survey of the state prison system's total population on May 31 revealed that nearly 7 percent of the inmates — 10,376 people — said they were foreign citizens, said TDCJ spokeswoman Michelle Lyons.

Slightly more than 4 percent of those locked up in state prisons at that time — 6,612 inmates — have been ordered turned over to federal immigration authorities' custody once they finish serving their state sentences at TDCJ, Lyons said.

Undocumented immigrants also have an impact on Harris County's courts. About 16 percent of those defendants interviewed by Harris County Pretrial Services last year — almost 13,000 of the nearly 81,000 questioned — reported they were not U.S. citizens, said director Carol Oeller.

More than 7,500 of those defendants — about 9 percent of all those interviewed — acknowledged they came here without authorized documentation, Oeller said.

That latter percentage is not much of a change from years past, she said.

Pretrial Services officers do not seek to enforce immigration laws or alert federal authorities of an undocumented immigrant's presence, Oeller said.

"During the course of a defendant interview, we ask, 'Are you a U.S. citizen?' If they say no, the officer will say, 'What documents do you have to be in this country?' We don't see the papers," Oeller said. Based on their answers, defendants are recorded in the court files as legal residents, undocumented immigrants or guests with visas or work permits.

"From our perspective, there are Supreme Court and lower court case laws that say someone who is a non-U.S. citizen is entitled to the same due process as a U.S. citizen," she said.

Years-long debateOne of the country's leading experts on the undocumented-immigrant population's size estimates there are nearly 400,000 such people living in the Greater Houston metropolitan area — making up about 10 percent of the total population.

Jeffrey Passel, a senior research associate at the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington, D.C., estimated that 11.1 million undocumented immigrants were living in the U.S. in March 2005. He concluded that Texas ranked second among states having the most undocumented immigrants, estimating 1.4 million to 1.6 million lived in the Lone Star State at that time.

While such numbers will always be subject to debate, academics and politicians say the undocumented-immigrant population likely will remain an explosive issue for years to come.

"Illegal immigrants are the Willie Horton of the 2006 elections," said criminologist Ramiro Martinez, a visiting scholar who recently arrived at the UH Center for Mexican American Studies to research how Latinos impact Houston crime.

(Horton, a convicted murderer who raped a woman while on furlough from prison, was the focus of a controversial political ad during the 1988 presidential campaign.)

Despite the numbers, Martinez expects to find Latino homicides and violent crimes are lower than expected in areas of Houston having large immigrant populations.

That's because studies across the country have shown the number of immigrants in a community rarely influences the level of crime — and indicate areas with high concentrations of immigrants are safer, he said.

As Exemptions Grow, Religion Outweighs Regulation (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

At any moment, state inspectors can step uninvited into one of the three child care centers that Ethel White runs in Auburn, Ala., to make sure they meet state requirements intended to ensure that the children are safe. There must be continuing training for the staff. Her nurseries must have two sinks, one exclusively for food preparation. All cabinets must have safety locks. Medications for the children must be kept under lock and key, and refrigerated.

The Rev. Ray Fuson of the Harvest Temple Church of God in Montgomery, Ala., does not have to worry about unannounced state inspections at the day care center his church runs. Alabama exempts church day care programs from state licensing requirements, which were tightened after almost a dozen children died in licensed and unlicensed day care centers in the state in two years.

The differences do not end there. As an employer, Ms. White must comply with the civil rights laws; if employees feel mistreated, they can take the center to court. Religious organizations, including Pastor Fuson's, are protected by the courts from almost all lawsuits filed by their ministers or other religious staff members, no matter how unfairly those employees think they have been treated.

And if you are curious about how Ms. White's nonprofit center uses its public grants and donations, read the financial statements she is required to file each year with the Internal Revenue Service. There are no I.R.S. reports from Harvest Temple. Federal law does not require churches to file them.

Far more than an hourlong stretch of highway separates these two busy, cheerful day care centers. Ms. White's center operates in the world occupied by most American organizations. As a religious ministry, Pastor Fuson's center does not.

In recent years, many politicians and commentators have cited what they consider a nationwide "war on religion" that exposes religious organizations to hostility and discrimination. But such organizations — from mainline Presbyterian and Methodist churches to mosques to synagogues to Hindu temples — enjoy an abundance of exemptions from regulations and taxes. And the number is multiplying rapidly.

Some of the exceptions have existed for much of the nation's history, originally devised for Christian churches but expanded to other faiths as the nation has become more religiously diverse. But many have been granted in just the last 15 years — sometimes added to legislation, anonymously and with little attention, much as are the widely criticized "earmarks" benefiting other special interests.

An analysis by The New York Times of laws passed since 1989 shows that more than 200 special arrangements, protections or exemptions for religious groups or their adherents were tucked into Congressional legislation, covering topics ranging from pensions to immigration to land use. New breaks have also been provided by a host of pivotal court decisions at the state and federal level, and by numerous rule changes in almost every department and agency of the executive branch.

The special breaks amount to "a sort of religious affirmative action program," said John Witte Jr., director of the Center for the Study of Law and Religion at the Emory University law school.

Professor Witte added: "Separation of church and state was certainly part of American law when many of today's public opinion makers were in school. But separation of church and state is no longer the law of the land."

The changes reflect, in part, the growing political influence of religious groups and the growing presence of conservatives in the courts and regulatory agencies. But these tax and regulatory breaks have been endorsed by politicians of both major political parties, by judges around the country, and at all levels of government.

"The religious community has a lot of pull, and senators are very deferential to this kind of legislation," said Richard R. Hammar, the editor of Church Law & Tax Report and an accountant with law and divinity degrees from Harvard.

As a result of these special breaks, religious organizations of all faiths stand in a position that American businesses — and the thousands of nonprofit groups without that "religious" label — can only envy. And the new breaks come at a time when many religious organizations are expanding into activities — from day care centers to funeral homes, from ice cream parlors to fitness clubs, from bookstores to broadcasters — that compete with these same businesses and nonprofit organizations.

Religious organizations are exempt from many federal, state and local laws and regulations covering social services, including addiction treatment centers and child care, like those in Alabama.

Federal law gives religious congregations unique tools to challenge government restrictions on the way they use their land. Consequently, land-use restrictions that are a result of longstanding public demands for open space or historic preservation may be trumped by a religious ministry's construction plans, as in a current dispute in Boulder County, Colo.

Exemptions in the civil rights laws protect religious employers from all legal complaints about faith-based preferences in hiring. The courts have shielded them from many complaints about other forms of discrimination, whether based on race, nationality, age, gender, medical condition or sexual orientation. And most religious organizations have been exempted from federal laws meant to protect pensions and to provide unemployment benefits.

Governments have been as generous with tax breaks as with regulatory exemptions. Congress has imposed limits on the I.R.S.'s ability to audit churches, synagogues and other religious congregations. And beyond the federal income tax exemption they share with all nonprofit groups, houses of worship have long been granted an exemption from local property taxes in every state.

As religious activities expand far beyond weekly worship, that venerable tax break is expanding, too. In recent years, a church-run fitness center with a tanning bed and video arcade in Minnesota, a biblical theme park in Florida, a ministry's 1,800-acre training retreat and conference center in Michigan, religious broadcasters' transmission towers in Washington State, and housing for teachers at church-run schools in Alaska have all been granted tax breaks by local officials — or, when they balked, by the courts or state legislators.

These organizations and their leaders still rely on public services — police and fire protection, street lights and storm drains, highway and bridge maintenance, food and drug inspections, national defense. But their tax exemptions shift the cost of providing those benefits onto other citizens. The total cost nationwide is not known, because no one keeps track.

When Values Collide

Few Americans dispute the value of protecting religious liberty. The framers of the Constitution opened the First Amendment of the Bill of Rights with language preserving religious freedom with two clear goals in mind, constitutional scholars agree.

First, they wanted to assure that everyone, even members of small and possibly unpopular sects, could practice their faith without fearing the kind of persecution that many had experienced in their home countries, where a dominant religion was allied with the state. Just as important, the framers wanted to prevent the government from ever being captive to a particular religion or set of beliefs at the expense of people of other faiths.

Over the last two centuries, many scholars say, this tradition of religious freedom and tolerance, a radical concept in the 18th century, has helped this country avoid the spasms of sectarian violence that have erupted in countries from Ireland to India and attracted immigrants bringing talents from across the world.

Some legal scholars and judges see the special breaks for religious groups as a way to prevent government from infringing on those religious freedoms.

"Never forget that the exercise of religion is a constitutionally protected activity," said Douglas Laycock, a law professor at the University of Michigan who has written and testified in support of greater legislative protection for religious liberty. "Regulation imposes burdens on the free exercise of religion. Exemptions lift those burdens." He added, "That is constitutionally a good thing."

DOJ_NMG_0078237

Precious as protecting religious freedom is, however, there are cases where these special breaks collide with other values important in this country — like extending the protections of government to all citizens and sharing the responsibilities of society fairly.

Religious organizations defend the exemptions as a way to recognize the benefits religious groups have provided — operating schools, orphanages, old-age homes and hospitals long before social welfare and education were widely seen as the responsibility of government.

But while ministries that run soup kitchens and homeless shelters benefit from these exemptions, secular nonprofits serving the same needy people often do not. And rather than just rewarding charitable works that benefit society, these breaks are equally available to religious organizations that provide no charitable services to anyone.

Similarly, religious nonprofit groups that run nationwide broadcasting networks, produce best-selling publications or showcase a charismatic leader's books and speeches can take advantage of exemptions that are not available to secular nonprofit groups — not to mention for-profit companies — engaged in the same activities.

Any government oversight of religious groups must fit within the First Amendment's command that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

For most of the past half-century, courts interpreted the first part of that clause as a barrier to government action that seemed to treat religious groups more favorably than secular ones, legal scholars said. But today, many lawyers agree, courts are taking a more accommodating view of government actions that benefit religious groups.

The willingness of the federal courts to accept these arrangements increased considerably under the influence of William H. Rehnquist when he was chief justice of the Supreme Court, said Derek H. Davis, until recently the director of the J. M. Dawson Institute of Church-State Studies at Baylor University in Waco, Tex.

"Clearly, we're going to be in this accommodative mode for some time," added Mr. Davis, who sees Chief Justice Rehnquist's successor, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. as likely to follow in Chief Justice Rehnquist's footsteps on cases affecting religious groups.

The problem is, efforts to protect the free exercise of religion can clash with efforts to assure that religion is not favored by the government.

Besides regulatory exemptions and special tax breaks, some of which have been in place for decades, religious organizations have recently become eligible for an increasing stream of federal grants and contracts from state and federal governments. This policy shift began in 1996 under President Clinton, and has continued with greater force under President Bush. Known in the Bush administration as the Faith Based Initiative, it has drawn considerable attention in political, religious and academic circles.

But the broader tapestry of regulatory and tax exemptions for religious groups has gone largely unacknowledged. Indeed, some religious leaders and politicians — focusing not on these special accommodations but on issues like the display of religious icons on public land — argue that religious groups in America are targets of antagonism, not favoritism. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, in introducing a legislative agenda last July, said, "Radical courts have attempted to gut our religious freedom and redefine the value system on which America was built."

In March, hundreds of people and a number of influential lawmakers attended a conference called "The War on Christians and the Values Voter in 2006" in Washington and applauded the premise that religion was under attack.

Society "treats Christianity like a second-class superstition," Tom DeLay, then a Republican representative from Texas, told the crowd. "Seen from that perspective, of course there is a war on religion."

The argument that religious groups are victims of discrimination drew a sigh from Ms. White, the day care director in Alabama, where licensed day care centers are finding it harder to compete with unlicensed faith-based centers that do not have to comply with expensive licensing requirements.

James E. Long, a deputy attorney general for Alabama's department of human resources, acknowledged that licensed day care operators have complained time and again that the exemption is unfair. "But I am unaware of any bill ever having been introduced" that would eliminate it, Mr. Long said. "That would be a very contentious issue. I'm sure the churches would want to be heard on that."

Breaks for Social Services

On an early summer day at the Harvest Temple Church of God in Montgomery, a lively group of older children tossed soccer balls around a dim, cool gymnasium. In a smaller room to the side, staff members rocked sleeping infants and comforted cranky toddlers.

This bustling church-based center, next to the church sanctuary in a well-tended middle-class neighborhood, covers its costs and helps support the work of the church, the church pastor said.

"We have talked about getting licensed before in the past, but it would cost us quite a bit of money," Pastor Fuson said. The staff would probably be large enough to meet state standards, he said, but the center would need costly renovations to upgrade the facilities.

Ms. White, whose licensed program, Auburn Daycare Centers, has become nationally accredited during her tenure, understands how demanding the state requirements are. Her centers in Auburn have to comply with them, down to the specific toys required for each age group.

As in many states, these regulations were a response to conditions that had put young lives at risk. In Alabama alone, almost a dozen children died in day care facilities in the two years before the state began upgrading its licensing requirements in 2000.

Ms. White said the root problem in Alabama is that there is not enough state aid for working families who need good day care. But given the state's limited resources, she said, it seems unfair that subsidies are available to unlicensed centers as well as licensed ones — a view shared by the Federation of Child Care Centers of Alabama, which has lobbied for greater financing and universal licensing.

Some churches in Alabama have voluntarily obtained licenses. The Rev. Paul B. Koch Jr., of First Christian Church in Huntsville, whose day care center is licensed, thinks licensing for such programs is appropriate and raises the quality of care. "But the Christian Coalition is still strong in Alabama and this is an issue for them," he said.

John W. Giles, president of the state's Christian Coalition, confirmed that his organization supported the exemption, noting that state oversight would be intrusive and was unnecessary "because the pastors and congregations are your quality control." Although most of the unlicensed centers are run by Protestant churches or ministries, the exemption covers all faiths, from an Islamic preschool program in Huntsville to a Catholic parish center in Tuscaloosa.

Eleven other states — including Utah, Maryland, Illinois and Florida — also have exempted religious child care programs from at least some of the rules that apply to other nonprofit programs, according to the National Child Care Information Center in Fairfax, Va.

One state that has dropped off that list is Texas.

In 1997, George Bush, who was the governor, pushed through legislation that exempted faith-based day care centers and addiction treatment programs from state licensing, allowing them to be monitored instead by private associations controlled by pastors, program directors and other private citizens. Other laws enacted on his watch steered more state financing to these "alternatively accredited" institutions.

Fewer than a dozen child care centers and about 130 addiction treatment programs took advantage of this new alternative, according to subsequent studies. But several of these later became the focus of state investigations into complaints of physical abuse. A study by the Texas Freedom Network Education Fund, a nonprofit research organization that opposed the faith-based initiatives, found that "the rate of confirmed cases of abuse and neglect at alternatively accredited facilities in Texas is more than 10 times that of state-licensed facilities."

In spring 2001, the Texas Legislature quietly allowed the alternative accreditation program for day care centers to lapse.

Two leading First Amendment scholars, asked about faith-based day care licensing exemptions like these, said they were unfamiliar with the practice but thought it sounded legally dubious. "I think what you describe is unconstitutional," said Ira C. Lupu, a law professor at George Washington University and the co-director of legal research for the Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy, an independent project of the Rockefeller Institute of Government.

Professor Witte, the director of Emory University's Center for the Study of Law and Religion, said in an e-mail response that he "would frankly be surprised to find even this Supreme Court going that far."

However, when a group of licensed day care centers challenged the Alabama law in a federal court in mid-2001, arguing that it deprived them of their constitutional right to equal protection before the law, the group lost.

Judge Myron H. Thompson of United States District Court, who ruled on the case, said the state could have adopted the arrangement to avoid church-state entanglements or simply to accommodate the free exercise of religion. Indeed, he cited four other federal cases, all decided since 1988, that had upheld similar exemptions for day care centers in other states.

In Judge Thompson's view, it is "well settled" constitutional law that "the possible economic inequalities that might result from religious exemptions such as day care licensing exemptions" are not a violation of anyone's equal-protection rights.

Exemptions From Zoning Rules

"When you fly in to Denver at night, you can always pick out Boulder," said Ben Pearlman, an athletic young lawyer who grew up there. "It's the only one with big patches of darkness around it."

As one of Boulder County's three governing commissioners, the soft-spoken Mr. Pearlman talks about protecting the county's spectacular beauty as if it were a sacred trust. In 1978, the county limited intensive development to already urbanized areas, buffered by large swaths of prairie and farmland. The landscape therefore now stands in stark contrast to the spreading carpet of subdivisions, office parks and malls in neighboring counties around Denver.

To Alan Ahlgrim, the mellow and mesmerizing preacher who founded Rocky Mountain Christian Church in eastern Boulder County in 1984, those encroaching subdivisions look like spiritual vineyards, full of families ready to be transformed by his church's call for them to become "blessed to be a blessing" to others.

"The church has never grown fast enough to suit me," Pastor Ahlgrim said with a grin that showed he was almost, but not quite, serious.

But the church, one of more than 200 in the county, did grow fast enough in the last 22 years — from about three dozen families in 1984 to more than 2,200 people today — to burst from its original building and five subsequent expansions approved by the county.

Today, its enthusiastic young congregation is once again bumping up against the walls of its 106,000-square-foot home, which sits on 55 acres in an agricultural buffer zone around the small town of Niwot. It is holding multiple services to handle the overflow congregation, but its Sunday school space is full, with some classes spilling out into hallways and temporary buildings set up in a parking lot.

Yet church members cringe at the notion of turning away newcomers. "Who do you say no to? Do you hang a 'no vacancy' sign out front?" asked Guy Scoma, a young father who visited the church as a lonely widower and stayed on when he met, then married, his wife, Kaarin.

The church wants to almost double the size of its facilities so it can accommodate up to 4,500 people. The church could then provide a new children's wing, more rooms for adult classes and a gymnasium with room for two basketball courts or potluck suppers for 1,000. The new wings, linked to the existing building by spacious galleries, would be surrounded by more than 1,200 landscaped parking spaces, 60 percent more than today.

But the county's land-use plan and zoning rules for the agricultural buffer zone where the church stands would limit any construction on the site to a single residential building. So the church cannot build without the approval of the Boulder County commissioners. And in February, after an emotional public hearing attended by more than a thousand people, Mr. Pearlman and his two fellow commissioners said no.

"People are always trying to develop their properties to the limits of the law and sometimes beyond," Mr. Pearlman said. But the worst suburban sprawl is the consequence of "lots of little decisions that have this cumulative effect," he continued. "We're trying to resist this death by a thousand cuts, and preserve the land where we can."

Like the leaders of large, fast-growing churches across the country confronting zoning restrictions on their expansion plans, Pastor Ahlgrim is unhappy. The decision "is severely restrictive to our mission," he said. Like worshiping, teaching and gathering for fellowship, the practice of sharing with the community — in this case, allowing certain outside groups to use the church when it's available — is "vital to our mission," he continued. "When one of your core values is generosity and you are restricted from sharing what you want to share — what God has provided — we consider that to be a severe limitation."

The church had no choice but to go to court, he said.

The church has sued the county under a federal land-use law enacted by Congress and signed by Bill Clinton in 2000 to protect religious organizations from capricious or discriminatory zoning restrictions by local governments. The unusual law came after a decade-long bipartisan tug-of-war between Congress and the Supreme Court.

Before 1990, the court had generally held that any government restriction on religion must serve a compelling public interest in the least burdensome way — a standard known as the "strict scrutiny" test. But in one Oregon case dealing with two Native Americans' sacramental use of peyote, an illegal drug, the majority concluded that there was nothing unconstitutional about states expecting citizens to comply with valid, neutral and generally applicable laws — like those criminalizing peyote — even if compliance conflicted with religious beliefs.

This "Smith decision," Employment Division v. Smith, provoked a fierce reaction that has energized the drive for more legislative protections for religion ever since. In 1993, under pressure from a broad coalition whose members ranged from the Anti-Defamation League to the Southern Baptist Convention to the American Humanist Association, Congress adopted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, which restored the "strict scrutiny" test to any federal, state or local government action affecting religious practice. A new tool had been added to the First Amendment emergency kit, although no one was quite sure how to use it.

Then the Supreme Court tugged back. In 1997, it ruled that the religious freedom act could not be applied constitutionally to the states. In reaction, 13 states have subsequently adopted similar measures of their own. But Congress thought the decision left room for it to address zoning restrictions and, separately, religious restrictions imposed on prisoners.

In 2000 Congress adopted and Mr. Clinton signed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, which restored the "strict scrutiny" test to local zoning decisions, making it easier for churches to challenge those decisions in court. The act also made it easier for prisoners to challenge restrictions on their religious practices.

The provisions that apply to prisoners have been upheld, but the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the land-use provisions that Rocky Mountain Christian Church is invoking in its lawsuit against Boulder County. One of the church's allies in the fight is the Justice Department's civil rights division, which is defending the law's constitutionality in cases around the country.

Defenders of the law say that some cases invoking its protections have addressed actions by local governments that seem to reflect blatant religious bias. For example, Rabbi Joseph Konikov of Orlando, Fla., successfully sued his local government under the law in 2002 after county officials repeatedly cited and fined him for holding small worship services in his suburban home, in violation of a zoning provision later found to be an unconstitutional burden on religious freedom.

"It was like Communist Russia," said Rabbi Konikov, who said his grandfather had fled the Soviet Union to escape religious oppression. He has continued to hold services in his home. "It was very satisfying to see that, at the end, our Constitution and our American values and freedoms came through for us."

Other zoning challenges, all invoking the 2000 law, have been filed by a Sikh society that wants to build a temple in a low-density residential area of Yuba City, Calif.; a Hindu congregation seeking permission to expand its temple and cultural center on a busy highway in Bridgewater, N.J.; and a Muslim organization that has been trying for years to build a mosque on land that the local government in Wayne Township, N.J., now wants to buy for open space.

Seeking a Protective Balance

Critics of the 2000 law argue that the First Amendment itself has long prohibited religious discrimination in zoning, and that such zoning decisions could have been challenged just as successfully in the courts if the law had never been passed.

When Congress considered the law, "what was actually being discussed was 'How do we make sure churches don't get discriminated against,' " said Marci A. Hamilton, a law professor at the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University in Manhattan and the author of "God vs. The Gavel: Religion and the Rule of Law" (Cambridge University Press, 2005), which calls for closer scrutiny of some religious exemptions, especially those affecting land use and family law.

"Unfortunately, the answer was to give such an expansive remedy that not only are they not getting discriminated against, but they are now capable of discriminating against all other landowners," added Professor Hamilton, who is advising Boulder County in its case.

The financial stakes in the Boulder lawsuit are large.

Under the 2000 law, if the county loses, it will have to pay not only its own legal bills but also those of the church. If the church loses, it will sacrifice the money it has spent on legal, architectural and public relations fees, but it will not be required to pay the county's legal bills. And unlike the county, it could seek free legal help from various religious advocacy groups, although it has not yet done so.

While a county victory might provide other local governments with a template for defending against similar challenges, some lawyers fear that if Boulder County, with its long history of careful land-use planning and its environmentally demanding voters, cannot successfully argue that preserving open space is a "compelling public interest," few local governments could.

"Religious institutions have realized that land-use authorities are vulnerable to the threat of litigation," David Evan Hughes, the deputy county attorney, asserted in the county's court filings. Without greater clarity from the courts, he continued, the new law's reach "will expand to the point where religious institutions are effectively dictating their own land-use regulations."

Like most Boulder County residents, several church members said they cherish the open space preserved by the county's past land-use decisions. But they think the county was wrong to reject the church's proposal.

Lanny Pinchuk, a church member who formerly served on the county planning board, praised all that the county has done to preserve the environment. "But you can't keep people from coming to the religious institution of their choice," he said. "I feel that is just, well, un-American."

Church leaders and members said their current proposal was the "forever plan," the last expansion the church would make on this site.

But they all struggled to explain why it is an unconstitutional burden for them to have to turn away newcomers now when, if they continue to grow, they will inevitably have to turn away people when their "forever" building is full.

"At some point, we're going to have to say we can't accommodate any more; I mean, we're not going to have a 100-story building over there," said Gerry Witt, a founding church member who has recently put his house on the market so he and his wife, Carole, can move to a less developed area on the western slope of the Rockies.

"So is there any limit?" He thought a moment, then answered his question. "Yes," he said. "There's God's limit. When he says, 'You're at your limit,' that's when we will stop."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Aircraft Carrier George H. W. Bush Christened (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

A ceremony honoring one of the Navy's own comes amid growing dissent over his son's course in Iraq.

NEWPORT NEWS, Va. — George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush, the most famous father-son act in American politics since the Adamses, saluted one another at a rain-drenched, shore-side ceremony Saturday, as an aircraft carrier was christened in the name of the father, a naval aviator who survived a direct strike by Japanese antiaircraft fire over the Pacific 62 years ago.

Doro Bush Koch, the former president's daughter and the current president's sister, smashed a bottle of sparkling wine against the bow of the vessel, and declared: "I hereby christen thee USS George H.W. Bush. May God bless all who sail her."

There were Bush family, friends, political supporters, longtime advisors and members of the administration of the first President Bush, some of whom have also served the second Bush presidency.

But against the backdrop of the reunion on a barge tied up at the bow of the vast vessel ran an undercurrent of the troubles facing the present Bush administration.

On the stage just yards from the ship's bow were two Presidents Bush, the current and former first lady and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whose direction of the war is drawing increasing criticism. Next to Rumsfeld was Sen. John W. Warner, the Senate Armed Services Committee chairman from Virginia who last week became the most prominent Republican officeholder to publicly question the course of the Iraq war.

In the audience was Colin L. Powell, the retired Army general who served the first President Bush as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the second as secretary of State. His disagreements with the current president over the Iraq war are slowly surfacing.

Two other key members of the first Bush foreign policy team — former national security advisor Brent Scowcroft, and Bush's secretary of State and White House chief of staff, James A. Baker III — were seated nearby. Vice President Dick Cheney, who was the first President Bush's Defense secretary, was not present.

Without mentioning the war but sending an unmistakable signal, the senior Bush declared: "I am very proud of our president. I support him in every single way, with every fiber in my body."

He did not, however, say he agreed with every decision his son had made.

The ceremony took place amid renewed questions about the complicated relationship of the father and son, famously competitive and proud and yet never shy about demonstrating their love for each other, as they did again Saturday.

The most recent questions were prompted by a report that the elder Bush and his wife, Barbara, felt that their son had taken the wrong approach in dealing with Saddam Hussein and Iraq.

Bob Woodward, the author and Washington Post editor, writes in his new book, "State of Denial," that Barbara Bush said that her husband was "losing sleep" over Iraq. In addition, Woodward also wrote that Scowcroft, a close friend of the senior Bush, thought that the younger Bush's presidency was, in some respects, a "disaster."

White House officials have bristled at the idea that there is any daylight between the father and son on Iraq policy — or on anything, for that matter, except a competitive round of golf or a chase for the bluefish that run in the Gulf of Maine off the family compound in Kennebunkport.

Without specifying to which statements he was referring, Scowcroft moved earlier in the week to distance himself from the Woodward book. In a declaration eventually distributed by the White House, Scowcroft said that statements attributed to him in Woodward's book "did not and never could have" come from him.

Notwithstanding any possible differences among those at the gathering, the day belonged to the senior Bush and his wife, Barbara, with plenty of family respect and a dose of teasing. He was choked up as he recalled reading, as an officer and thus censor, the letters crewmen with whom he served sent home during World War II — and a bit irreverent when a thunderclap interrupted his speech and he said: "I'm finishing, Lord. I am finishing, Lord."

The younger President Bush said of the new vessel: "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable." He added, "As a matter of fact, [she] probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

For the senior Bush, the moment was especially fitting, given his Navy service. On Sept. 2, 1944, he set off from the deck of the carrier San Jacinto to attack Japanese installations on the Pacific island of Chichi Jima, north of the equator. His Avenger was hit by Japanese fire, and with his engine aflame, he managed to drop his bombs over the target and fly several miles off shore before bailing out. Two others in the plane died.

He spent several hours in an inflated raft in the ocean before he was rescued by the submarine Finback.

"On that day over Chichi Jima, a young American became a war hero and learned an old lesson: With the defense of freedom comes loss and sacrifice," the younger President Bush said, transferring by implication the World War II experience to the battles the military is fighting today.

The San Jacinto, which was decommissioned in 1947 and turned over for scrap in 1971, was a floating shadow compared with the carrier George H.W. Bush. The new ship's displacement will be roughly 100,000 tons, approximately 10 times that of the San Jacinto. It is the 10th and, if the Navy's plan holds, the final carrier in the Nimitz class. The ship is scheduled to be delivered to the Navy in late 2008.

"President Bush," the younger President Bush said. "Your ship has come in."

Aircraft Carrier Is The Bushes' Latest Namesake (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Va., Oct. 7 — It was a rare and poignant moment, one that moved President Bush to tears.

Not the current President Bush, but the first, who was joined Saturday at a shipyard here by dozens of political luminaries and his extended clan — including the son he calls "the president" — to christen a Navy aircraft carrier bearing his name.

The christening of the George H. W. Bush, the latest and last in the Navy's line of Nimitz aircraft carriers, took place under rainy skies, punctuated by thunderbolts so sharp that at one point, the elder Mr. Bush interrupted his speech, looked skyward and said: "I'm finishing, Lord! I'm finishing!" He seemed to burst with pride as he pronounced the occasion "any naval aviator's dream come true."

Though it was a day mostly of reminiscences for the 41st president of the United States, who joined the Navy fresh out of high school and became a decorated pilot in World War II, the elder Mr. Bush also took the occasion to do something he does not often do: comment on the administration of the 43rd president.

"I am very proud of our president," the 82-year-old father said forcefully of his son. "I support him in every single way with every fiber in my body."

The scene was an unusual tableau, both political and personal, for the two Bushes, whose aides have been at odds, and not always beneath the surface, over the war in Iraq.

The audience included some who served both 41 and 43, as the presidential pair are known. Colin L. Powell and James A. Baker III, former secretaries of state, were there, as was Andrew H. Card Jr., who served as transportation secretary for the first President Bush and is the former chief of staff to the second.

But it was also a family reunion for America's current ruling political dynasty. On the stage sat two presidents, two first ladies and a governor, all named Bush. Mr. Card, who was invited to join the current president aboard Air Force One for the trip, described it in deeply personal terms, saying the elder Mr. Bush was like a father to him, the current president like a brother.

"The president is going there not only as the president and commander in chief," Mr. Card said. "He's going there as a very proud son."

Built at the Northrop Grumman naval shipyard here, the George H. W. Bush will not be ready to sail until 2008. Its hulking frame — 1,100 feet long, with a 4.5-acre flight deck — was festooned with red, white and blue bunting, a picture of the elder Mr. Bush attached to its bow.

The current president's sister, Dorothy Bush Koch, who has just published a biography of the elder Mr. Bush titled "My Father, My President," performed the christening honors, whacking a bottle of sparkling wine across the hull as her father and brother looked on.

President Bush introduced "our dad," recounting his father's flying career. His speech touched on light moments, like the time his father was reprimanded for flying too low over a circus ("I was grounded for causing an elephant stampede," he quoted the elder Mr. Bush as saying), and on somber ones, among them the shooting down of his father's plane. Two crew members died; the elder Mr. Bush earned the Distinguished Flying Cross.

But it was the first President Bush, his step a tad slower than in years gone by, his voice a tad shakier, who stole the show. He held hands with his wife, Barbara, belted out the words to "God Bless America" and happily patted his son on the shoulder. In his speech, he grew tearful as he described his duties as a young officer whose job included censoring the mail sent by shipmates.

"I learned a lot about human nature, and I learned a lot about the hearts and dreams of these kids," the elder Mr. Bush said, looking down in an effort to collect himself. He stopped for more than a few seconds, then continued in a throaty voice, "I would see these letters written, and I would count my own blessings."

New Aircraft Carrier Christened In Honor Of George H.W. Bush (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Oct. 7 -- Despite a steady downpour that chilled thousands gathered Saturday in the shipyard here, President Bush and his father, George H.W. Bush, basked in the warm embrace of extended family and friends as they celebrated the christening of a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier named after the former president.

The 41st president of the United States punctuated an affectionate reminiscence of his storied life with a father's unconditional defense of the 43rd. "I am very proud of our president," said George H.W. Bush to loud applause. "I support him in every single way, with every fiber in my body."

It seemed more than a throwaway line, but a pointed response to speculation, fanned most recently by a new Bob Woodward book, that the former president is anguished over the Iraq war and that his closest advisers now see the son's administration as a debacle. For his part, the current occupant of the Oval Office paid warm tribute to a "great dad" and "a man who exemplifies the great character of our country."

President Bush also drew laughs when he lauded his steely mother, after noting that the USS George H.W. Bush will be the latest in the Nimitz class of aircraft carriers. "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable," Bush thundered.

"As a matter of fact," he added, "probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

The official occasion Saturday was the christening of the George H.W. Bush, a naval ceremony that marks the completion of the ship's hull and its ability to float. Another two years of work is necessary before manufacturer Northrop Grumman Corp. can deliver the gigantic $6 billion ship to the Navy, company officials said.

The George H.W. Bush, longer than three football fields and with about 97,000 tons of displacement, is the 10th and last of the Nimitz-class carriers that project American military power to every corner of the globe. The Pentagon is designing the next generation of aircraft carriers, with the first ship's delivery expected in 2015, a Pentagon spokesman said.

Saturday's ceremony was held at the foot of the gigantic gray bow of the unfinished carrier, in the midst of a rainstorm whose loud claps of thunder periodically startled the thousands of dignitaries, Bush family friends, Navy personnel, shipyard workers and company officials gathered at the Northrop Grumman Newport News Shipyard. "I'm finishing, Lord, I'm finishing," Bush promised, drawing laughs as he glanced up at the sky after one particularly powerful thunder clap.

But the storm did little to dampen the festive mood of the crowd, which included dozens of luminaries from the George H.W. Bush administration, including former secretary of state James A. Baker III, former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Colin L. Powell, who also served the son as secretary of state. Also in the crowd were four of the former president's fellow pilots who served in the Pacific theater during World War II, as well as dozens of old friends and retainers from a lifetime in politics.

A huge cheer went up from the crowd when Doro Bush Koch, the ship's "sponsor" and the former president's daughter, smashed a bottle of American sparkling wine across the bow of the carrier at the end of the ceremony. The crowd also cheered the two Bush presidents, who seemed delighted. The elder Bush took it all in with an almost boyish glee. Holding Barbara Bush's hand, the former president sang enthusiastically along with tenor Ronan Tynan, who rendered "God Bless America."

George H.W. Bush, 82, is the first living former president to attend the christening of a carrier in his honor, and when it came his turn to speak, he told the crowd: "This is any naval aviator's dream come true."

As a young pilot, Bush flew bombing missions off the USS San Jacinto, part of a naval task force in the Pacific; in 1944, his plane was shot down by Japanese antiaircraft fire. Bush parachuted into the sea and was rescued by a Navy submarine after he spent more than two hours aboard a rubber life raft.

The current president devoted part of his brief remarks to the lessons of his father's military service. "The generation of World War II taught the world's tyrants a telling lesson," Bush said. "There is no power like the power of freedom -- and no soldier as strong as a soldier who fights for a free future for his children."

Remembering his World War II service, the elder Bush choked up, especially after recalling his task of reading servicemen's mail to make sure they did not divulge any secrets. "I learned a lot from that. I learned a lot about human nature. I learned a lot about the hearts and dreams of these kids," he said, pausing to compose himself. "I would see these letters written, and I would count my own blessings."

In keeping with his rambling style of public speaking, the former president quickly moved on to a bout of reflection. "It seems surreal that you can go from being a young naval aviator, then surviving a horrible war, then losing an innocent child and having some modest success in business, then rising through the killing fields of national politics to be president," Bush said.

"And after four thoroughly challenging years as president, it would be even more improbable to see your own two sons rise to become respected national leaders, to say nothing of the private success of our three other kids. I am truly blessed as a dad."

Bush did allow that he could not say this was the greatest day of his life. He recalled telling Barbara Bush that it was the greatest day of his life when son George was elected governor of Texas and son Jeb governor of Florida -- only to be asked, "What about the day we were married?"

"I would simply have to say," Bush added, to chuckles, "this is, maybe, the third happiest day of my life."

Bushes Stay Calm During Stormy Rite (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Va. -- With dark storm clouds looming over a Navy shipyard yesterday and thousands of people gathered for the christening of the USS George H.W. Bush aircraft carrier, Chaplain Jonathan Frusti asked God to be present, to bless the ship and all who sail on it.

The rainstorm did not hold off for the guest of honor, though, and a crack of thunder stopped the 82-year-old former president in midsentence as he addressed the crowd, which included President Bush and his wife, Laura, as well as other members of the Bush family.

The elder Mr. Bush spun toward the sky with alarm, then turned back to the soggy crowd and, with a wry smile, his hands and eyes lifted to the sky, said, "I'm finishing, Lord, I'm finishing."

A few minutes later, standing at the bow of the massive $6 billion ship -- more than three football fields long and able to hold more than 80 warplanes -- the former president's daughter, Dorothy Bush Koch, crashed a bottle of American sparkling wine against the ship, CVN 77, which will take to the seas in late 2008.

The ceremony was at times sentimental and moving. The president choked up as he said: "On this proud day, the children of George H.W. Bush bless their father's name, the United States Navy honors his name, and the ship that bears his name sails into this young century as a symbol of American strength and freedom.

"I know you join me in saying to our father, President Bush, your ship has come in."

The elder Mr. Bush wiped away tears and dabbed his nose with a handkerchief as he recalled one of his tasks aboard the ship on which he served during World War II, the USS San Jacinto. As a senior officer, he censored letters of the crew, and yesterday he remembered the hopes, dreams, courage and fear of his fellow sailors.

The president recounted a story about his father's early days as a Navy pilot, and his impulsive decision to fly low over a beach "where young ladies liked to sunbathe."

"It just so happened to be the same day that a traveling circus had set up its tents. Dad's flyover upset an elephant, causing him to break loose and make a run throughout the town. He was called in for a reprimand from his commander. He puts it this way, 'I was grounded for causing an elephant stampede' -- probably the only Navy pilot in American history who can make that claim," the president said to laughter from the crowd.

The president said of the USS George H.W. Bush, the last of the Nimitz-class carriers: "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable. As a matter of fact, [she] probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

The former president was humble, downplaying his heroism after several speakers praised his bravery during World War II. In 1944, he was shot down during a bombing run over Chichi Jima and survived after parachuting into the Pacific Ocean, earning the Distinguished Flying Cross. But he said his story was no different from that of another president who served in the Navy.

"President Kennedy was asked how he became a hero, and he said, 'They sank my boat.' Well, they shot my plane down. But I never considered myself a hero," he said.

The officials on the dais included Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld; Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joints Chiefs of Staff; Sens. John W. Warner and George Allen, Virginia Republicans; Florida Gov. Jeb Bush; and Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas.

The crowd included high-ranking officials past and present, among them former Secretaries of State James A. Baker III and Colin L. Powell and the elder Mr. Bush's press secretary, Marlin Fitzwater.

Mr. Allen compared the struggle of World War II to the global war against terrorism, saying: "The mission of our time is the same as the one for President Bush fighting in World War II, or leading our country and winning the Cold War: Our mission is to protect our freedom in a sometimes hostile world."

The president also invoked the war on terrorism, saying: "In the 21st century, freedom is again under attack. ... And once again, with perseverance, and courage, and confidence in the power of freedom, a new generation of Americans will leave a more hopeful and peaceful world for generations to come."

The carrier is scheduled to be launched today from its dry dock into the James River and taken to an outfitting berth, where work on interior systems will continue.

The ceremony closed with tenor Ronan Tynan singing "God Bless America," which opens with the lines: "While the storm clouds gather from across the sea, let us swear allegiance to a land that's free."

As the wet VIPs scurried, Mr. Fitzwater was asked whether his former boss did the right thing by cutting short his remarks in the face of the imminent storm.

"Absolutely," he said with a smile. "He knows how to take a cue."

Bush Clan Christens Carrier Named For Patriarch (VAPILOT)

By Jon W. Glass

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS — Family, U.S. military might and a long tradition of shipbuilding merged into a gray, rainy Saturday at the christening of the aircraft carrier George H.W. Bush.

The Bush family gathered to honor the clan's patriach at Northrop Grumman Newport News' shipyard, where the $6 billion carrier has been under construction since 2001.

President George W. Bush, the namesake's son, gave the keynote speech, drawing laughter when he told his father: "President Bush, your ship has come in."

The president's sister, Doro Bush Koch, the ship's sponsor, shattered a bottle of American sparkling wine on a "breaker bar" attached to the massive carrier's bow.

"I christen thee U.S. ship George H.W. Bush. May God bless all who sail on her," Koch said, before smashing the bottle two-handed against the bar, bubbly spray flying.

Bush the elder, now 82, was the nation's 41st president. During World War II, he flew planes off the carrier San Jacinto, earning the Distinguished Flying Cross.

"This is any aviator's dream come true," Bush told a crowd of around 5,000, who held umbrellas and wore hooded raincoats. "This is magnificent."

Other Bush family members at the ceremony included former First Lady Barbara Bush, current First Lady Laura Bush and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, the president's brother.

Colin Powell, the former secretary of state and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under the elder Bush, turned heads when he arrived. Other high-profile government officials attending were Clarence Thomas, the U.S. Supreme Court associate justice; Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld; Navy Secretary Donald Winter; and Mike Mullen, the chief of naval operations.

Bush is the first president in the shipyard's 120-year history to participate in the christening of a namesake ship, yard officials said.

There were light-hearted moments. Describing the new carrier, President Bush said: "She is unrelenting, she is unshakable, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable. As a matter of fact, probably should have been named the Barbara Bush" – a reference to his mother's no-nonsense manner.

And there were serious ones. Speaking of his dad's service in World War II, the president said the carrier "honors a generation that valued service above self," but that it also will serve "a new generation of Americans every bit as brave and selfless."

"In the 21st century, freedom is again under attack," he said, noting that 1.6 million Americans have volunteered for military service since the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

Bush recounted how his father carried out one mission during World War II even after his plane was hit by antiaircraft fire, forcing him to bail out.

But the elder Bush, a decorated aviator who joined the Navy on his 18th birthday, said: "I never considered myself a hero. We were no greater than the kids who serve today – all volunteer."

The nuclear-powered carrier, about 60 percent complete, will join the fleet in late 2008 or early 2009. It's the last 10 Nimitz-class carriers – all built at the Newport News shipyard – and boasts new technology making it the most advanced, including new propellers and an updated aviation fuel system for quicker flight turnarounds.

About 12,000 of Northrop Grumman Newport News' 19,000 employees have worked on the carrier, and many were at the christening.

Others came to be part of history.

"It's something I'll tell my grandchildren about," said Sharon Zebro, who drove from Norfolk. "To have the father and the son here, you don't see that often." Reach Jon W. Glass at (757) 446-2318 or jon.glass@pilotonline.com

Bush Aircraft Carrier Christened In Virginia (HC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven

Houston Chronicle/AP, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Va. — Spraying the bubbles from sparkling wine across the enormous gray bow of the USS George H.W. Bush, the Bush family today christened the nuclear-powered aircraft carrier named after the 82-year-old former president.

"I know you join me in saying to our father, President Bush, your ship has come in," the current president said during a ceremony for the last of the Nimitz-class carriers, the CVN 77.

"She is unrelenting, she is unyielding, she is unstoppable," Bush said, lauding the warship's state-of-the-art design before pausing for a punch line aimed at his mother's well-known steely constitution. "Matter of fact, she probably should have been named Barbara Bush."

The elder Bush, a decorated Navy pilot in World War II, joined the armed forces on his 18th birthday, June 12, 1942. "After our nation was attacked at Pearl Harbor, you simply couldn't find anyone who wasn't anxious to sign up," he told the audience as a heavy rain fell.

"The point is that our nation was totally united against the insidious totalitarian threat against freedom," he said. He added, "In my humble view, we were no greater than the kids that serve today."

The current president said that in the 21st century, "freedom is again under attack and young Americans are volunteering to answer the call."

Doro Bush Koch, the elder Bush's daughter, handled the ritual smashing of a bottle of sparkling wine against the flattop's bow.

Bush father and son and several relatives joined hundreds of others at the Northrop Grumman Newport News shipyard, where the $6 billion, 1,092-foot-long carrier is being built. It is not yet finished and is scheduled to be delivered to the Navy in late 2008.

The christening ceremony was scheduled to be nearly two hours long, but deafening thunderclaps, lightning, wind and intermittent heavy rain left the speakers mostly abandoning their prepared remarks to merely introduce the next in line.

With friends, Navy personnel and shipyard workers looking on, the elder Bush choked up during his informal and sentimental address, while talking about the men with whom he served in World War II.

Four of his fellow Navy pilots from the war traveled to the ceremony, an event the former president called the "third happiest day of his life," after his wedding and the day when two of his sons were elected governors.

"This is every naval aviator's dream," he said

The 10th of the Nimitz-class carriers — the largest warships in the world — features technological advancements that make it a bridge to the next generation of nuclear-powered aircraft carriers.

On Sunday, the carrier was to be launched from its dry-dock into the James River and taken to an outfitting berth, where work on interior systems will continue.

The former president was the youngest pilot in the Navy when he joined, receiving his commission and naval aviator wings before age 19.

Bush flew torpedo bombers off the aircraft carrier USS San Jacinto. In 1944, he was on a mission over the Pacific when Japanese anti-aircraft fire hit his plane. Bush parachuted into the sea and was rescued by a Navy submarine. He later was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross and three Air Medals for his Navy service in the Pacific theater.

Capt. Kevin O'Flaherty, the carrier's prospective commanding officer, is in charge of about 330 sailors now attached to the ship. He said he eventually will be responsible for about 3,000 crew members when the ship is put into service. It is not known where the carrier is to be stationed.

For The Ex-world Leader Who Has Everything: A Bush Aircraft Carrier (AFP)

AFP, October 8, 2006

President George W. Bush unveiled a Nimitz-class aircraft carrier, the George H. W. Bush, christened in honor of his father, in whose footsteps the president followed all the way to the White House.

Speaking to his father as the former president, also an ex-CIA chief and ex-diplomat, looked on in Newport News, Virginia, the US president smiled and said: "President Bush, your ship has come in," calling it "the newest and most advanced aircraft carrier in the nation."

"The generation of World War II taught the world's tyrants a telling lesson: There is no power like the power of freedom," Bush added, referring to his father's service as a young airman in that conflict.

"In the 21st century, freedom is again under attack," the president said. "And young Americans are volunteering to answer the call. And in the years since September 11, 2001, more than 1.6 million Americans have volunteered to wear the uniform of the United States."

Bush said: "The men and women of the United States military represent the best of America. And they deserve the best America can give them. And the George H.W. Bush is the best America can give them."

Made by Northrup Grumman, the nuclear-powered craft is a floating city that will be home to 6,000 Navy staff.

Some seven years in the making, it took 47,000 tonnes of structural steel and one million pounds of aluminum to build the giant, the company says.

It is expected to operate for half a century.

The president's mother, Barbara, looked on as her daughter Doro Bush Koch carried out the traditional honor of breaking a bottle of sparkling wine across the ship's bow.

"The George H. W. Bush is the latest in the Nimitz line. She is unshakable, unyielding, unstoppable. As a matter of fact, she probably should have been named the Barbara Bush," the president quipped.

Of the supercarrier, his father said: "This is a naval aviator's dream come true."

Also on hand for the ceremony were Marvin Bush and his wife, Margaret, and their son Walker; Sandy Randt, the ambassador to China and an old friend of the Bush family; and former White House chief of staff Andrew Card.

"It's a great gift for those of us who get to witness it to see the father and son there at a time of tremendous emotion for both of them. They have such tremendous mutual respect, and it's not just a respect of a father and a son, it's a respect for the country and those who served the country, and a respect for the loneliest office in the world, the president of the United States," Card said.

"Former president Bush is almost like a father to me, and this president is almost like a brother to me, so I feel particularly honored that they would include me," Card added.

Bush Family Celebrates Carrier Christening (UPI)

United Press International, October 8, 2006

NEWPORT NEWS, Va., Oct. 7 (UPI) -- U.S. President Bush christened a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier in Newport News, Va., Saturday named after his father, the 82-year-old former president.

"I know you join me in saying to our father: President Bush, your ship has come in," Bush said to applause as heavy rain fell.

Bush described the Nimitz-class USS George H.W. Bush supercarrier as "unrelenting," "unshakable," "unyielding" and "unstoppable," he said it "probably should have been named the Barbara Bush."

His father, a decorated World War II Navy pilot, once flew low over a beach to see women sunbathing, the president said.

The flyover upset a circus elephant, "causing him to break lose and make a run throughout the town," Bush said. His father "was grounded for causing an elephant stampede -- probably the only Navy pilot in American history who can make that claim."

Dorothy Bush Koch, the president's sister, smashed a bottle of sparkling wine against the carrier bow.

Security Gaps In Medicare And Medicaid (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 7 — Federal investigators say they have found serious computer security flaws that could lead to the improper disclosure of sensitive medical information on people enrolled in Medicare and Medicaid.

In a new report, the investigators, from the Government Accountability Office, said “key information security controls were missing” from a huge communication network used by the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

As a result, they said, sensitive, personally identifiable information “could be improperly modified, disclosed or deleted.” Moreover, the report said, “these weaknesses could lead to disruptions in services” to millions of Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries.

The network is used to pay claims and to communicate with state Medicaid agencies, health care providers and many private contractors.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said none of the flaws had led to “actual security breaches.” Dr. McClellan said he was taking steps to fix the problems.

But the G.A.O. said Medicare officials would not necessarily know if a security breach had occurred because they had no “audit trail” to document use of the computer network, or a reliable way to detect intrusions into their computers.

In their report, the investigators described several problems:

DOJ_NMG_0078248

¶The potential for unauthorized users to gain access to the agency's computers because of a lack of strict password controls. Passwords are often so simple that outsiders can guess them.

¶Medicare and Medicaid data not being encrypted. "This could allow an attacker to view medical information" on beneficiaries.

¶A failure to keep complete records of who uses the network, so it cannot be determined who views or modifies files.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, who requested the investigation, said Medicare officials needed "to get on top of these shortcomings immediately."

"Beneficiaries not only rely on Medicare for their health care coverage," said Mr. Grassley, chairman of the Finance Committee, which oversees Medicare and Medicaid, "they expect that the private information they entrust to the government is kept private, safe and secure."

Concern about computer security has increased since May, when the Department of Veterans Affairs reported a laptop computer with personal information on millions of veterans had been stolen from the home of an agency employee.

Dr. McClellan said, "We are very concerned about the specific control weaknesses" identified in the latest report. The computer network carries immense amounts of data with personal information on beneficiaries, including name, sex, date of birth, Social Security number and home address. The network also transmits medical and financial information, showing the diagnosis of a patient's illness, prescriptions, names of doctors and hospitals, services provided and the amounts paid.

Daniel R. Levinson, the inspector general at the Department of Health and Human Services, and his predecessors have expressed concern about weaknesses in Medicare computer security. The weaknesses "could ultimately result in unauthorized disclosure of sensitive information, improper Medicare payments or disruption of critical operations," Mr. Levinson warned last year.

The computer network connects the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services with banks, insurance companies, hospitals, nursing homes, health plans, other federal agencies and private contractors that pay claims for the government.

Medicare paid more than 1.1 billion claims last year. The size of its computer network and the number of transactions increased this year with the addition of a prescription drug benefit. The new program fills more than three million prescriptions a day. Insurers must file detailed data on each transaction.

In June, Medicare officials warned Humana after a company employee left personal information on 17,000 Medicare beneficiaries unsecured on a hotel computer in Baltimore.

The Bush administration is encouraging adoption of electronic health records and is urging doctors to send prescriptions electronically to drugstores. It is also asking beneficiaries to keep track of their health information, including Medicare claims and prescriptions, by using a new online service at www.MyMedicare.gov. In fine print, the government says it "does not warrant the accuracy" of information on the Web site.

Rules Deter Poor Children From Enrolling In Medicaid (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Needed Documents Unavailable to Some Families, Officials Say

Thousands of low-income children have been unable to enroll in Virginia's Medicaid program since July 1 because of new, tougher federal rules requiring proof of citizenship and identity, state officials said.

Officials for the state program for the poor and disabled said as many as 10,000 eligible children are living without health care largely because their families have been unable to present original birth certificates and other needed documentation to state or local Medicaid officials.

"These new rules are the single greatest factor for why children haven't been able to enroll" in Medicaid, said Linda Nablo, director of Maternal and Child Health at Virginia's Department of Medical Assistance Services, who said exact numbers would be available by the end of the month. "There are cases where everything about them is done, everything about them is approved, and all we're waiting for is [citizenship and identity] documentation.

"In the meantime, these kids are going without health care," she added.

The new federal rules, designed to curb fraud by illegal immigrants, require passports, birth certificates or other identifying documents to be shown when people apply for Medicaid benefits or during annual reenrollment in the program. Parents are also required to offer sworn affidavits as proof of a child's identity.

The rule is part of last year's Deficit Reduction Act, which President Bush signed into law in February. Despite a federal inspector general's report concluding that there was little fraud by illegal immigrants, supporters said the measure would ensure that Medicaid dollars go only to citizens or eligible immigrants. Previously, Medicaid applicants declared their citizenship or legal status, under penalty of perjury, without having to show evidence, although some states demanded proof.

After an outcry from health-care advocates across the country, federal officials exempted elderly and disabled applicants from the new regulations. But the same exemption was not given to most children, which state officials say is making it difficult to enroll minors.

"We're talking about families that don't have a lot of resources," said Shelby Gonzales, director of Partnership for Healthier Kids, a Fairfax County program run by Inova Health System. She and other advocates said families are showing up at social services departments looking for medical coverage but never follow through because of the extra layer of bureaucracy. "There are just a lot of practical reasons why it's been difficult," she said.

State officials said that adults eligible for Medicaid might also be experiencing difficulties enrolling in the program but that it is unclear how many.

Medicaid spokeswoman Mary Kahn said the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services has done everything it could to prepare low-income families under the parameters set by federal lawmakers.

"Of course we're concerned that children who are entitled to health care may not be receiving it because of any misunderstanding about the new rules," she said. "We're working within the parameters that Congress gave us to assure that the goals of the law are met while not excluding people who are legitimately entitled."

Thus far, the changes have only affected those who are seeking health-care benefits for the first time, state officials said. Like most states, Virginia gave those already enrolled several months to gather the necessary documents. But that grace period ends this month, and there is concern that people who can't come up with the documents will be kicked out of the program.

"This is the tip of the iceberg," said Jill Hanken, a staff attorney for the Virginia Poverty Law Center in Richmond, which has been tracking the impact of the new regulations. "Once the grace period is up, unless we see a change, there are going to be a lot of people who simply won't be able to get reauthorized."

Officials in Maryland said they have not been able to determine whether any children have been unable to receive health care, largely because they only recently started tracking changes. Officials in the District reported that the number of children enrolling has not dropped.

Virginia officials and advocates for the poor said the new rules have stymied much of the progress the state has made in enrolling children in the state health-care program. Over the past several years, Virginia has averaged a net increase of 1,700 children a month into the Family Access to Medical Insurance Security Plus program; since July it has averaged a net loss of about 3,500 a month. As of Oct. 1, there were 376,314 children on Medicaid in the state.

Congress's Sorry Session (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

The disgrace of Congress extends far beyond the scandals that have sullied the record of the dominant House Republicans. They are properly being blamed for most of the misdeeds and blunders that have marked this year on Capitol Hill, from the power grabs by Tom DeLay, to the greed of Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney, to the sexual overtures of Mark Foley.

Those were bad enough, and the glacial pace at which party leaders responded to all of them is a further indictment of the current regime. The House session opened with an attempt to change the rule that would have required an indicted Tom DeLay to step down as majority leader. It finished with Mark Foley hustling off to rehab before he answered questions about his electronic messages to underage male House pages.

And in between, what was accomplished? Nothing of significance on any of the major problems confronting the nation.

That is the real failure and the reason there should be a lot of new faces when the next Congress starts work in January.

Whether the need was immigration reform, a rational energy policy, an effort to expand health insurance coverage or greater security for retirement, Congress failed to deliver.

It worked fewer days -- and accomplished less -- than any Congress in recent history, and much of its routine work on spending bills was postponed until after the election.

The legacy of what it left undone -- especially in the fiscal area -- will damage future generations long after the memories of DeLay and Foley and their follies have vanished.

The Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, a bipartisan group of former government officials, expressed dismay last week that Congress had adjourned without adopting a formal budget resolution. Because the House and Senate were unable to agree, the committee's president, Maya MacGuineas, said, "Congress is tasking itself with spending millions of dollars while flying blind. That is no way to run a country."

The liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities added up the damage done by this Congress in a end-of-session report: "The 109th Congress took our already large projected budget deficits and passed legislation that will make them larger. The legislation increased projected deficits from 2005 (the year the Congress convened) through 2011 (when the current five-year budget window ends) by a total of $452 billion. Moreover, the budget deterioration over the past six fiscal years -- 2000 to 2006 -- is the largest deterioration for any six-year period in the past half-century."

Stan Collender, an independent budget analyst writing in National Journal, said that this year's failure implies more tough sledding next year. "Combined with the likely narrower margins in Congress next year (regardless of which party is in the majority), this almost guarantees that work on the budget will be slow, halting and painful. It also means that incremental progress may be too much to expect."

Some of the session's failures may be laid at the feet of the minority Democrats, who used parliamentary tactics, particularly in the Senate, to thwart some Republican proposals. But most of the difficulty can be found on the Republican side of the aisle, where ideological differences and simple political resistance proved to be a persistent problem.

It is difficult to remember, but President Bush's first priority after his reelection in 2004 was changing the Social Security system to include privately owned accounts. For the better part of six months, he spoke everywhere about his plan -- but he never got around to introducing legislation. And every time he tried to drum up support for some version of the scheme, the word came back from the Capitol that Republicans were not prepared to vote for any such idea. In the end, Social Security reform never came to a vote in any committee of the House or Senate, let alone reached the floor. The Republicans simply chickened out.

The record on immigration was not much better. The House passed a punitive bill that would have closed the border and clamped down on illegal immigrants already living here. The Senate followed the president's wishes and approved a more generous and comprehensive approach, including a guest worker program and a difficult but manageable path to citizenship for those residing here illegally.

But House and Senate leaders never ordered the negotiations that might have led to agreement on a final bill, so in the end, little was accomplished.

That was the hallmark of this Congress. We have to do better.

The Economy That Could (LAT)

By Editorial

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Regardless of what any politician says, the Dow's recovery is a tribute to the resilience of the U.S. economy.

AT LEAST IT DIDN'T TAKE A quarter-century. That's how long it took the Dow Jones industrial average to recover from the 1929 stock market crash. The Dow hit an all-time high Tuesday after a nearly seven-year swoon. The previous closing high for the Dow occurred when the nation was still partying like it was 1999 — even though it was Jan. 14, 2000, when inflated dot-com share prices allowed a company such as AOL to buy a company such as Time-Warner.

We know: There's no reason to break out the champagne. The Dow may be the nation's most established stock index, but it tracks a mere 30 blue-chip companies — and its recent surge owes a lot to such old-economy stalwarts as Caterpillar, Boeing and Altria (which is not a missionary group that builds schoolhouses in Africa but rather Philip Morris renamed). The more representative S&P 500 index is still about 10% off its 2000 high, and the tech-heavy Nasdaq composite is, well, you don't want to know.

Still, the Dow's milestone is worthy of celebration. The economy is strong, as President Bush gloated on Friday. Unemployment — 4.6%, according to the Labor Department's jobs report — and inflation are reassuringly low, growth is steady and the global economy appears to be sound. Corporations have become more efficient and profitable and their market valuations more reasonable than during the '90s bubble.

Despite concerns about a correction in housing prices, consumers remain confident. There have been legitimate concerns about households not faring as well as corporations in recent years, but even on this front, there is good news. Average hourly wages in September were up 4% from a year earlier.

It's always amusing to watch the political spinning of economic data, especially because it foolishly presupposes (on both sides of the statistical food fight) that the government is omnipotent. Democrats look shrill when they engage in mental contortions to argue that what is plainly good news is a mirage. It's equally disingenuous for the president to claim that his temporary tax cuts, which were sold to the country as a needed "stimulus" at a dire time, must be made permanent at a time of prosperity.

If Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. wants to avoid becoming just another in a series of Treasury secretaries who shrank in office to little more than White House cheerleaders, he is going to have to persuade the president to take advantage of this strong economy and address some of the federal government's structural long-term deficits.

DOJ_NMG_0078251

In the meantime, all politics aside, the Dow's recovery is a tribute to the resilience of the U.S. economy, which has weathered the 9/11 attacks, Enron and other corporate scandals, increased global competition, rising oil and commodity prices, geopolitical risks associated with the war in Iraq and nuclear proliferation. There is a lot to keep one up at night, and nervousness about uncertainty and change helps explain why not everyone is exulting over objectively good data. What's more important, though, is that people don't panic either. With any luck, the Dow will hit 15,000 before it hits 10,000 again.

OTHER NEWS:

Raise The Gasoline Tax? Funny, It Doesn't Sound Republican (NYT)

By Daniel Gross

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

FOR nearly two decades, Alan Greenspan owned the biggest megaphone in Washington as chairman of the Federal Reserve. When Mr. Greenspan dispensed advice on matters economic — interest rates, budget and tax policies, entitlements, the stock market, the best kind of mortgage — people listened.

As a rule, Mr. Greenspan, a Republican by temperament and background who was reappointed twice by Bill Clinton, adhered closely to Republican orthodoxy on taxes: the lower the better. Mr. Greenspan was hardly a proponent of raising taxes on energy to encourage conservation, a policy prescription generally associated with the politicians and economists of the left.

Until now. In late September, as he spoke to a group of business executives in Massachusetts, a question was posed as to whether he'd like to see an increase in the federal gasoline tax, which has stood at 18.4 cents a gallon since 1993. "Yes, I would," Mr. Greenspan responded with atypical clarity. "That's the way to get consumption down. It's a national security issue."

Mr. Greenspan isn't the only Republican-aligned economist to have discovered, or rediscovered, a fondness for higher energy taxes since leaving government service. N. Gregory Mankiw, the Harvard economist who served as chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers from 2003 to 2005, favored a higher gas tax before going to Washington, and has been banging the drum loudly for it since he left. On his blog, Mr. Mankiw has formed the Pigou Club, named for Arthur C. Pigou, the British economist credited with introducing the notion that taxes could be used to correct imperfections in the market. The roster of what Mr. Mankiw calls "economists and pundits with the good sense to have publicly advocated higher Pigovian taxes, such as gasoline taxes or carbon taxes," includes some of the usual suspects — Paul Krugman, a columnist for The New York Times, and Al Gore, for example — as well as unusual suspects like Gary S. Becker, the economics professor and Nobel laureate at the University of Chicago.

Andrew A. Samwick, chief economist on the Council of Economic Advisers from July 2003 to June 2004, and a professor of economics at Dartmouth, is a member in good standing. So is Martin S. Feldstein, the intellectual godfather of a generation of Republican economists. In June, Mr. Feldstein laid out his own Pigovian plan on the home page of Republican economic orthodoxy — the Wall Street Journal editorial page. The government, Mr. Feldstein said, should essentially ration gas by distributing tradable gas rights that entitle people to use gasoline. Those who don't want to use them could sell them, and those who want to drive more would buy them. "The 50-cent price of the T.G.R. would have the same incentive effect as a 50-cent gasoline tax," he wrote.

What gives? Clearly, there is an emerging consensus among economists — right and left — that the nation would be better off, geopolitically and economically, if Americans used less gasoline. "Given the role that imported oil plays today, you can't continue to be a responsible economist and not talk about ways to reduce that dependence," Mr. Samwick said. "If you are concerned about the external consequences of imported oil, then you should raise the cost of it." And free-market economists view a higher gas tax as a more elegant solution than, for example, raising auto efficiency standards.

Others chalk up the rising chorus for a higher gas tax to a growing unity among economists across the political spectrum on the deleterious effects of global warming. "The U.S. has reasonable arguments for not signing the Kyoto treaty, but we need to propose some other measure that will help reduce emissions," said Kenneth Rogoff, former chief economist at the International Monetary Fund and professor of economics at Harvard. A sharply higher tax on gas would help reduce consumption, and hence emissions.

But as much as Republican-leaning economists like Messrs. Greenspan, Mankiw and Samwick may think that it's a good idea, the Republican politicians who control the levers of power in Washington think that it's an awfully bad one, even though gas taxes in the United States are far lower than those in other industrialized countries. According to the International Energy Agency, American gas taxes in August were a mere 40 cents a gallon on average, compared with $4.24 a gallon in Britain and $3.99 in Germany.

The last increase in the federal gas tax was enacted as part of the so-called deficit reduction act of 1993, a package of spending cuts and tax hikes that didn't receive a single Republican vote in Congress. And because President Bush and his top political advisers are known to be adamantly opposed to any increase in the gas tax, economic advisers haven't pushed it much. "We didn't have policy discussions about raising the gas tax," Mr. Samwick recalls of his time in the White House.

THIS highlights a professional hazard faced by academic economists who serve in presidential administrations. They must act as team players who value the overall success of the administration — even if they don't agree with all of its policies. As a result, economists must often stow some of their policy ideas in an intellectual coat check at the White House gates, where they can be reclaimed upon return to private life.

In the 1990's, during the less-disciplined Clinton years, it was relatively common for economic policy makers and advisers to publicly disagree — sometimes loudly — about issues ranging from health care to welfare reform.

"We were allowed to advocate for our ideas, both inside and to some degree outside," said Brad DeLong, who served as deputy assistant secretary for economic policy at the Treasury Department from 1993 to 1995 and is now a professor of economics at the University of California, Berkeley. "But that's not the way the current system works."

When it comes to economic policy, the Bush administration has proved itself to be an intellectually regimented environment, less like the Harvard economics department and more like the Harvard crew team.

Roller Coaster At The Pump (NYT)

By Editorial

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

It seems a little too convenient. As the stretch run to the midterm Congressional election approaches, gasoline prices fall precipitously. The sudden shifts in prices seem to come out of the blue. And unlike copper or pork bellies, oil is a commodity always charged with political significance.

It only sets the bloggers typing faster and the pundits chattering louder when a key player in the price swing is the investment bank Goldman Sachs, whose chief executive, Henry Paulson, left to become President Bush's Treasury secretary. The suspicions were serious enough that the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, addressed them. He joked that it would take "the kind of magisterial clout unknown to any other human being" to rig gas prices. But with 42 percent of respondents to a Gallup poll saying that they believed the Bush administration was manipulating prices ahead of the election, it is probably not a laughing matter behind closed doors at the White House.

Mr. Snow is actually right — no one can control the 85-million-barrel-a-day global market in petroleum products. But consumers' gut feeling that something is not right with the gasoline market is a recognition of fundamental changes in supply and demand that have made prices more volatile and attracted ever more speculation. Average Americans find themselves at the whim of an increasingly capricious market, one that strikes hard in the pocketbook. And it might become worse.

Our demand for petroleum products strains the limits of the global capacity to supply them. In past decades, if a pipeline broke in Nigeria, Saudi Arabia might compensate by setting workers to pumping more oil. Now, with little additional capacity, rising prices are necessary to balance out supply and demand. Each bump can feel like an earthquake. But to speculators, volatility means the potential for big profits, so hedge funds and investment banks pile in to make bets, bidding oil futures up to unnatural highs and making the market even more unstable.

Summer is usually a time when prices go up; as families climb into minivans for vacations, demand increases. Predictions of another dire hurricane season this summer had the speculators salivating as they envisioned big storms headed for those oil rigs and refineries along the Gulf Coast. When the hurricanes failed to materialize and the driving season came to an unimpressive ending, the shouts of "Buy!" turned to cries of "Sell!"

Consumers may be relieved to find that prices at the gas pump plunged as a result, but unfortunately they could very well be in for more volatility and new price spikes down the road. As long as the demand for oil and gasoline grows faster than the ability to produce and refine them, the slightest shocks to supply will keep sending prices rocketing higher. The only way to get a stable market back is to cut back consumption, through greater efficiency and alternative fuels.

Foley Consuming GOP As Elections Draw Near (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) was trying to talk about security Friday at bustling Port Everglades, but with planes roaring overhead and containers slamming onto trucks, nobody could hear him.

DOJ_NMG_0078253

That's a common problem for Shaw and Republican candidates around the country these days -- trying urgently 30 days before Election Day to frame a winning message but finding their efforts drowned out by the furor over former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

"It's sucking all the air out of the room," Shaw said in an interview after his news conference at the port. "It's a tough time; there's just total saturation right now."

Back in Washington, Republican strategists acknowledge privately that, even under their best-case scenario, Foley's sexually charged messages and allegations that House leaders were too passive in responding to them will remain an all-consuming distraction for GOP campaigns for the next week.

Their strategy -- equal parts hope and calculation -- relies on waiting for the story to die down in local news outlets, even if it continues to dominate national news, while also accusing Democrats of exploiting a personal lapse for political gain.

In both parties, there is rough agreement among operatives that the impact of the Foley scandal is likely to be felt in two different ways.

There are several places where local factors could amplify the scandal's destructive power against Republican candidates. Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R), who is facing questions about his own role in responding to reports of Foley's conduct, is suddenly in a tough race against Democrat Jack Davis in an upstate New York district. In Pennsylvania, Republican Rep. Don Sherwood's already troubled campaign hardly needed anything that might remind voters of his admission earlier this year that he had an affair with a woman who accused him of physical abuse.

Beyond these specific races, however, many strategists in both parties believe the scandal might echo principally as a metaphor for a GOP leadership that over the past year has drawn more attention for ethical lapses and partisan turmoil than legislative achievements.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll conducted after the revelations found 63 percent of voters "dissatisfied" or "angry" with House Republican leaders, and 73 percent disapproving of the job Congress is doing. In a Time magazine poll, 68 percent said the scandal will have no effect on their vote, but only 16 percent said GOP leaders handled it appropriately.

"People aren't going to vote on this issue, but it's given people an easy way to think about everything they're unhappy about," said Democratic media consultant Anita Dunn.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who is running the House Democrats' campaign committee, said he believes the GOP's own conservative activists are among the most repelled by Foley's behavior and by allegations of a lackadaisical response by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Among partisans, he said, "it only energizes our base and makes theirs more despondent." Among independent voters, he added, "nobody votes for this much chaos."

Notably, a frustrated GOP strategist who spoke on the condition of anonymity essentially agreed, saying his party's mishandling of Foley "speaks to our inability to govern and do the right thing. It says everything about who we are as a party."

In several places across the country, the Foley fire is being aggressively fanned by Democrats. In Indiana's 9th District, former representative Baron Hill (D) is airing an ad attacking Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R) for accepting campaign cash from Republican leaders who "knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley." Minnesota child-safety advocate Patty Wetterling, a House candidate whose son was abducted in the 1980s, delivered Saturday's Democratic radio address, attacking GOP leaders for their "silence" on Foley and urging voters to "restore integrity to Congress." In Ohio, Mary Jo Kilroy (D) is running ads on Christian radio, trying to taint Rep. Deborah Pryce (R) by association: "Deborah Pryce's friend Mark Foley is caught using his position to take advantage of 16-year-old pages."

Even New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Thomas H. Kean Jr. recently urged Hastert to resign, although most Republican candidates simply condemned Foley's behavior and called for a full investigation before trying to pivot back to local issues and national security.

In a sign that he is on the defensive, Reynolds went on the air this weekend with ads in Buffalo and Rochester that amounted to a mea culpa over Foley. "Nobody's angrier and more disappointed that I didn't catch his lies," the New York congressman says. "Looking back, more should have been done, and for that, I am sorry."

Most places, though, accusation, not apology, is the Republican approach. Party operatives are distributing talking points to talk radio and conservative blogs detailing the Democratic ties of groups such as Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and American Family Voices -- two interest groups working to promote the scandal around the country. Republicans have also been working to remind conservatives of Democratic reaction to past sex scandals including those of President Bill Clinton and then-Rep. Gerry Studds (Mass.), who admitted to sexual contact with a page and went on to serve a decade longer in the House. Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.), who is close to White House adviser Karl Rove, released an open letter drawing a connection between the Studds and Foley cases.

For all its intensity, the calculation in both parties is that the Foley scandal is unlikely to reshape the basic dynamics of the Nov. 7 elections, which still seem to hinge on voter attitudes toward Iraq, the economy and President Bush.

Carl Forti, communications director at the National Republican Congressional Committee, said he has seen no polling in individual races that suggest Foley is seriously eroding support for GOP candidates. "I think most of our campaigns had gotten back to talking about local issues by Tuesday or Wednesday," he said.

Shaw, the mild-mannered dean of Florida's congressional delegation, was trying to do just that as he campaigned for a 14th term representing the 22nd District, immediately south of Foley's. He showed off some fancy X-ray machines he had secured for Port Everglades, and suggested his seniority on the Ways and Means Committee and his close relationship with House leaders have paid dividends for his constituents. But polls show him in an extremely tight race with his challenger, state Sen. Ron Klein, who thinks the Foley incident illustrates why Shaw's close ties with national Republicans will be a liability.

"People have lost their trust in Washington, and this shows why," Klein said after a campaign event Friday in Delray Beach. "It reinforces the feeling that the people running the show in Congress are more interested in protecting their power than protecting kids." He added, "People have had enough of this go-along, get-along attitude."

Shaw's ability to get along with Hastert has helped him in the past. In 2000, the speaker helped ram an $8 billion Everglades restoration bill through the House a few days before the election. Shaw was then reelected by fewer than 600 votes, and subsequent redistricting gave him more Republican constituents. But although Shaw was comfortably reelected in 2004, his district narrowly supported Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) over Bush. And the redistricting has shifted its geographic center from Shaw's Fort Lauderdale toward Klein's Boca Raton.

Klein is the nation's best-funded Democratic challenger, and he has spent his money on ads linking Shaw to Bush and the GOP Congress. He has criticized Shaw's unstinting support for the Iraq war, and in a district teeming with retirees, he has hammered Shaw for supporting Bush's prescription drug plan, as well as elements of Bush's Social Security plans. Now Klein has called for Hastert and anyone else who knew anything about Foley's electronic activities to resign and is assailing Shaw for his close relationship with the speaker.

Shaw says he is also "very proud" of the record of the Republican Congress, as well as his own record of bringing home the bacon. In an interview, Shaw praised Hastert's response to the allegations and suggested it was "quite a coincidence" that the story broke after it was too late to replace Foley on the ballot, on the day Republicans were passing an immigration bill. He warned that Democrats will pay a price "if they timed this politically."

Even if Foley only costs Republican candidates a percentage point or two, that could make the difference in races as close as Shaw's. "It's the only thing people are talking about -- in the parking lot, on the soccer field, everywhere," said Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.), who has been friends with Klein since they served together in the Florida legislature. "It's another congressional scandal, and it's right in our back yard; it can't help but resonate."

Dems Positioned To Challenge GOP Control (NYT/AP)

By David Espo

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Aided by public revulsion over an Internet-age sex scandal, Democrats enter the final month of the campaign well-positioned to challenge for control of Congress, while Republicans increasingly express concern about holding onto power.

"We're going to need everything we have to make sure we're victorious," said Republican Rep. Tom Cole of Oklahoma, who had long experience as a party strategist before his election to Congress.

"I think we have the ability to do that but it depends on how well we perform," he added.

Yet with four weeks -- and an unknown number of swings in political momentum -- remaining until the Nov. 7 elections, Democrats guarded against excessive optimism.

"It's still an uphill battle," said New York Sen. Chuck Schumer, speaking at the end of a tumultuous week in which Republicans struggled to overcome the political damage caused by former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., and his sexually explicit computer messages to teenage male pages.

Democratic candidates are in competitive races for seven Republican-held seats in the Senate and 30 or more in the House, according to public as well as private polls. Equally significant is that barring a change, GOP opportunities for offsetting gains appear minuscule -- only three or four House seats currently under Democratic control and one in the Senate.

Members of the leadership in both the House and Senate are among the Republicans in jeopardy -- Sen. Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Rep. Deborah Pryce in Ohio -- as Democrats look for major gains in the Northeast and Midwest.

DOJ_NMG_0078255

Four Republican congressmen are in trouble in Pennsylvania. And strikingly, three more are struggling for survival in Republican-red Indiana -- at the same time Sen. Richard Lugar is coasting to a sixth term without so much as a Democratic opponent.

Thirty-six states are electing governors this year. Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger leads in the polls for re-election in California, but Democrats are in commanding positions to succeed retiring Republicans in New York and Ohio.

The fate of hundreds of ballot initiatives will be decided. Several states will vote on proposals to ban same-sex marriages and raise the minimum wage. Republicans hope the former will boost turnout in crucial congressional races, and Democrats have similar plans for the latter.

In the race for control of Congress, Democrats must gain 15 seats to wrest control of the 435-member House, and six to establish a majority in the 100-member Senate.

Strategists in both parties agree the fall campaign already has been marked by two distinct trends. The first, which began after Labor Day, saw gradual movement toward the Republicans as President Bush campaigned vigorously on national security issues.

That momentum began to dissipate two weeks ago with the partial publication of a government intelligence report that cast doubt of his administration's claims of progress in Iraq.

Then came Foley's resignation Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit computer messages he had sent to teenage male pages who work in the Capitol. In the following days, Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and other GOP leaders struggled to answer questions of when they learned of Foley's actions and what they had done about them.

"It has stopped any momentum that the president had in improving his standing, mostly because it knocked him off the front pages and it knocked security off the front pages," said Steve Lombardo, a Republican pollster.

It did more than that. Some Republicans canceled planned campaign appearances with Hastert, and Democrats challenged their GOP opponents to call for his resignation.

Republican Rep. Mike Simpson of Idaho said he was no longer confident the GOP would retain power, a shift from a week earlier, when he said he was "fairly confident" they would. "It's a real toss-up, he said.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll taken while the scandal was dominating the news found that about half of likely voters said the issues of corruption and congressional scandal would be important when they cast their ballots.

About two out of three of those voters said they would choose the Democratic candidate.

Officials in both parties said the long term impact of the page scandal was unclear.

"The real question is whether it's a crystallizing event for voters," said Carter Eskew, who has advised numerous Democratic lawmakers and candidates. "Whether they saw this is the last straw and they start to coalesce" around the belief that Republicans are not willing to be accountable for actions that occur on their watch.

Apart from Santorum, Republican incumbents in trouble include Sens. Conrad Burns in Montana, Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island, Mike DeWine in Ohio and Jim Talent in Missouri.

Sen. George Allen of Virginia recently has joined the list, although Republicans expressed hope his position had finally stabilized after weeks spent trying to rebut charges of racism and religious insensitivity. Democratic challenger Jim Webb recently reported a sharp jump in fundraising, and the party is also expected to come to his aid with television commercials in the campaign's final weeks.

Democrats also remain optimistic about their prospects in Tennessee, where Republican Bob Corker's staff recently underwent an upheaval and Democratic Rep. Harold Ford has proved a resilient contender.

Republicans cite their prospects in New Jersey, where Tom Kean Jr. is in a close race with Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez. And Democrats unexpectedly began advertising on television in Maryland for Rep. Ben Cardin, although polls show him leading Republican Michael Steele comfortably in a reliably Democratic state.

In the House, Democrats said they were still looking for late-developing opportunities, and Republicans are hoping to avoid last-minute ambushes.

Bush campaigned in recent days for California lawmakers in little evident jeopardy, and the National Republican Congressional Committee commissioned a poll to check the status of an open seat in Idaho, an area that is among the most Republican in the country.

Foley's departure created an instant opportunity for Democrats to gain a seat previously out of reach in Florida. Democrats also said they are increasingly optimistic about their prospects for seats vacated by Rep. Jim Gibbons in Nevada and Katherine Harris in Florida.

Pryce and Rep. John Hostettler of Indiana are among the most vulnerable of the Republicans in the House, both trailing their Democratic rivals in private polls. Other GOP incumbents in tight races include Reps. Jim Gerlach, Michael Fitzpatrick, Curt

Weldon and Don Sherwood, all from Pennsylvania; Thelma Drake of Virginia; Heather Wilson of New Mexico; and Chris Chocola and Mike Sodrel of Indiana.

Sodrel had a distinction of sorts -- the first Republican to be hit with commercial that featured a picture of Foley.

It said Sodrel had accepted $77,000 in campaign donations from "the House leadership who knew about but did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley."

Foley Case Is Campaign Fodder For Democrats (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

As candidates seize on the scandal, the issue has changed the focus of the election and appears to be taking a toll on GOP prospects, analysts say.

WASHINGTON — As the congressional page sex scandal has unfolded in Washington, Democratic candidates across the country are seizing on the controversy as a potent campaign issue and an emblem of why voters should strip Republicans of their majority in the midterm elections.

Just over a week after Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned his seat, some analysts said the scandal was abruptly changing the focus of the fight for control of Congress — at least for now. It is taking a toll on Republicans' national prospects, even though only a handful of GOP lawmakers are directly affected by the reports that Foley sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage congressional pages.

Democratic ads are popping up nationwide to put a spotlight on allegations that House GOP leaders were slow to respond to early clues about Foley's misconduct. The first such ad was aired days ago by Minnesota House candidate Patty Wetterling, a child safety advocate who was asked by Democratic leaders to give the party's weekly national radio address Saturday.

"Our nation's children and their parents don't deserve to endure fear in our schools, and it is wrong to make children endure fear within the halls of Congress," Wetterling said.

The scandal has helped increase the number of Republicans facing competitive challenges from 37 last week to 43 now — a shift that includes four lawmakers who were considered safe but have now moved into the danger zone, according to the nonpartisan Cook Political Report's weekly analysis Friday.

"For Democrats, who have been hammering home a 'time for change' theme, the scandal in Washington and the inept handling of it by the Republican leadership in Congress crystallizes this message in a way that 30-second commercials never could," said Amy Walter, analyst of House elections for the Cook report.

Republicans are clearly nervous but remain hopeful that the scandal will recede in the month leading up to election day. They take heart from a poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press that found that the scandal had not had discernible impact on whether voters planned to vote Democratic or Republican.

National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman Carl Forti said the impact would be felt only in a handful of districts where lawmakers were directly involved in controversy about how the scandal was handled — including Foley's district, which was considered safe for the GOP but now is considered likely to go Democratic. In other districts, Forti said, "people are going to the polls and it's going to be a choice between the two people on the ballot."

But a well-placed GOP strategist conceded that the landscape could quickly change as the scandal continued to unfold.

"If something else emerges, because they are following the story so closely, that will also penetrate real quickly so the dynamic could easily change," said the strategist, who spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing party anxieties.

Over the weekend, for example, the Washington Post reported that a new source corroborated a crucial claim by Foley's former aide Kirk Fordham that Scott Palmer, chief of staff to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), was aware of Foley's inappropriate contacts with pages long before he had acknowledged.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean did not contradict the account, saying only that the issue was being reviewed by the House Ethics Committee.

Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that suggestions of a possible high-level coverup probably would embolden even more Democratic candidates to make the issue part of their campaign.

As a result, the midterm election campaign may end as Democrats had hoped in the beginning — with a focus on ethics. That Democratic strategy had run aground for months when party members got caught up in corruption charges. Now, renewed focus on corruption may work more to their advantage.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll taken while the scandal was dominating the news found that about half of likely voters said the issues of corruption and congressional scandal would be very or extremely important when they cast their ballots. About two-thirds of those voters said they would choose the Democratic candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0078257

"Everybody out here in the Republican Party is trying to decouple as best they can from Washington," said Floyd Ciruli, an independent pollster in Denver. "The Foley issue has reignited the whole notion that Washington is corrupt. It reinforces the notion they don't police themselves, they're arrogant, they think they're above the law."

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win a majority in the House, and six to capture control of the Senate.

The ripple effects of the scandal are reaching beyond House races into Senate campaigns.

In Tennessee, when Republicans ran an ad that said Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., who is running for Senate, attended a party with Playboy Playmates, he snapped: "I'm not going to take a lecture on morality from a party that took hush money from a child predator."

In Montana, Democrats are circulating photos of endangered GOP incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns appearing with Foley, with whom he worked on Internet safety legislation.

In the New Jersey Senate race — where questions about the ethics of Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez have been a major issue — GOP nominee Tom Kean Jr. scrambled quickly to distance himself from Washington leaders and Friday issued an unconditional call for Hastert to resign as speaker.

"He is the head of the institution and this happened on his watch," Kean said. "The culture of protecting each other has eroded Congress and the public's faith in government."

Among House Republicans, probably no one has more to fear than Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee. He has come under scrutiny in the Foley investigation because he learned in the spring of the "overly friendly" e-mails sent to pages. Reynolds said he had informed Hastert, who has said he does not recall the conversation, and relied on others to investigate.

Now, Reynolds' once-safe seat has become a tossup, according to the Cook report analysis. Democrats have released a poll showing Democrat Jack Davis, a businessman, ahead of Reynolds, 50% to 42%. Reynolds aides claim his own polls do not show him trailing, but this weekend the congressman began airing a 60-second ad that strikes a defensive note.

"Nobody's angrier and more disappointed than me that I didn't catch [Foley's] lies," Reynolds says. "Looking back, more should have been done. And for that, I am sorry."

Another member of the GOP leadership, Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), has been put on the defensive by her Democratic challenger's assertion that Pryce should have known Foley was a child predator.

"Republican leaders were more concerned about protecting politicians than protecting teenagers," says the ad, broadcast on Christian radio stations by Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy. "Deborah Pryce is part of the problem in Congress."

Pryce immediately called a news conference and accused Democrats of "blatantly politicizing" Foley's resignation. She said it was an "outrage" to suggest she had protected a predator, contending she did not know about the explicit e-mails until the news broke in recent weeks.

The scandal teed up an issue tailor-made for Wetterling, the Minnesota House candidate, who made her name as a national advocate for missing children after her son was abducted, never to be seen again.

In her radio address Saturday she said, "We need to restore integrity to Congress, integrity that was further damaged by congressional leadership's silence."

But she is running against a polished state senator, Michele Bachmann, in a district that leans Republican. Although the Cook report now rates this a tossup, Walter said, "The district's GOP lean gives Bachmann a cushion that may be enough to protect her in this bleak political environment."

Walter also argues that the climate poses new risks even for GOP incumbents far removed from the Foley scandal but who have faced other ethics questions, including Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville) who has been on the defensive about his relationship with disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Some Republican strategists fear that the political impact of the scandal will not be to increase votes for Democrats, but simply to demoralize GOP voters so much that they do not go to the polls at all.

"It's one more blow in terms of Republican turnout, one more reason why Republicans will say, 'Why bother?' " said GOP pollster Eddie Mahe.

Bauer Says Republicans May Be Hurt By Foley Case (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Catherine Dodge

Bloomberg, October 8, 2006

Oct. 7 (Bloomberg) -- The Mark Foley sex scandal may make it harder for Republicans to turn out voters in the November elections, said Gary Bauer, the president of American Values, a group that advocates the protection of traditional marriage.

``The Foley mess makes it harder to galvanize that base," Bauer said in an interview on Bloomberg TV's ``Political Capital with Al Hunt" airing this weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0078258

About 78 percent of the American public has heard or read about the scandal and 25 percent said they are less likely to vote for the Republican candidate in their district because of it, according to a Time magazine telephone poll taken Oct. 3-4.

Bauer added that the situation may change if an investigation finds that Democrats had information about Foley and timed its release for political reasons.

``Radical gay rights organizations'' and ``liberal politicians'' are wrong to be ``sitting in judgment of the Republican Party,'' Bauer said. ``There are still people serving in the United States Congress that engaged in some fairly bizarre behavior in the other party.''

Bauer, who was domestic policy adviser to former President Ronald Reagan and a 2000 presidential candidate, said anyone who didn't pursue allegations against Foley for political reasons should share the blame.

``If anybody in the leadership or anybody out of the leadership in either party didn't act on this, either to save seats in Congress or didn't act on it because they wanted to wait until a few weeks before an election in order to win seats,'' they should be held accountable, Bauer said.

The Time poll showed that 64 percent of the respondents said Republican leaders tried to cover up the Foley scandal and just 15 percent said the Republican leadership handled it properly. The poll of 1,002 adults has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, resigned his congressional seat Sept. 29 after ABC News questioned him about sexually explicit electronic messages sent to male pages. Pro-Republican groups and some party lawmakers have said House Speaker Dennis Hastert should have acted more forcefully when informed of other, less explicit Foley e-mails to another page.

Bauer founded his Arlington, Virginia-based group in 2000.

A Political Limbo (NSWK)

By Marcus Mabry

Newsweek, October 8, 2006

How low can the Republicans go?

Come hell or high water-ran the conventional wisdom-Republicans could rely on two issues to win elections: the war on terror and values. Then came Mark Foley. The drip-drip-drip of scandal surrounding the former Congressman from Florida, which became a deluge this week, now threatens to sink Republican hopes of keeping control of Congress, says the NEWSWEEK poll out today.

And that was the good news for the GOP. More worrisome still, the Foley fiasco is jeopardizing the party's monopoly on faith and power. For the first time since 2001, the NEWSWEEK poll shows that more Americans trust the Democrats than the GOP on moral values and the war on terror. Fully 53 percent of Americans want the Democrats to win control of Congress next month, including 10 percent of Republicans, compared to just 35 percent who want the GOP to retain power. If the election were held today, 51 percent of likely voters would vote for the Democrat in their district versus 39 percent who would vote for the Republican. And while the race is closer among male voters (46 percent for the Democrats vs. 42 percent for the Republicans), the Democrats lead among women voters 56 to 34 percent.

The pace of the news on the Foley scandal is making it difficult for Republicans to stop their slide. On Thursday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert declared that mistakes were made in handling the Foley case and that he would remain in his post to make sure the misdeeds were thoroughly investigated. Almost immediately, ABC News reported that three more former pages had come forward to say that they had received suggestive e-mails and instant messages from Foley. And just as Republicans were attempting to form a united front to paint the timing of the Foley revelations as Democratic dirty tricks-What did Nancy Pelosi know and when did she know it?-the Republicans got a fratricidal shot out of the dark-on Iraq. Virginia Republican Sen. John Warner declared that the United States had 90 days to quell the violence in Iraq, or risk losing the war. To top it off, on Friday an aide to Karl Rove resigned over the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling and corruption scandal.

Meanwhile, the president's approval rating has fallen to a new all-time low for the Newsweek poll: 33 percent, down from an already anemic 36 percent in August. Only 25 percent of Americans are satisfied with the direction of the country, while 67 percent say they are not. Foley's disgrace certainly plays a role in Republican unpopularity: 27 percent of registered voters say the scandal and how the Republican leadership in the House handled it makes them less likely to vote for a Republican Congressional candidate; but 65 percent say it won't make much difference in determining how they vote. And Americans are equally divided over whether or not Speaker Hastert should resign over mishandling the situation (43 percent say he should, but 36 percent say he shouldn't).

The scandal's more significant impact seems to be a widening of the yawning credibility gap developing between the President, his party and the nation. While 52 percent of Americans believe Hastert was aware of Foley's actions and tried to cover them up, it's part of a larger loss of faith in Republican leadership, thanks mostly to the war in Iraq. For instance, for the first time in the NEWSWEEK poll, a majority of Americans now believe the Bush administration knowingly misled the American people in building its case for war against Saddam Hussein: 58 percent vs. 36 percent who believe it didn't. And pessimism over Iraq is at record highs on every score: nearly two in three Americans, 64 percent, believe the United States is losing ground there; 66 percent say the war has not made America safer from terrorism (just 29 percent believe it has); and 53 percent believe it was a mistake to go to war at all, again the first time the NEWSWEEK poll has registered a majority in that camp.

As a result, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's approval rating has fallen to just 30 percent, and more Americans believe he should resign than remain, 48 percent vs. 37 percent. And while a plurality of Americans approve of the job Condoleezza Rice is doing as Secretary of State, 48 percent vs. 32 percent who disapprove, on the heels of Bob Woodward's bestselling critique of the Bush administration, "State of Denial," a solid majority, 58 percent, believe Rice did not pay as much attention as she should have been expected to pay to the domestic terror threat posed by al Qaeda before 9/11. (Only 22 percent believe she did.)

Democrats now outdistance Republicans on every single issue that could decide voters' choices come Nov. 7. In addition to winning—for the first time in the NEWSWEEK poll—on the question of which party is more trusted to fight the war on terror (44 to 37 percent) and moral values (42 percent to 36 percent), the Democrats now inspire more trust than the GOP on handling Iraq (47 to 34); the economy (53 to 31); health care (57 to 24); federal spending and the deficit (53 to 29); gas and oil prices (56 to 23); and immigration (43 to 34).

And even if the Republicans manage to bail out their ship before the midterms, they'll have a hard time matching their one-time strengths to voters' priorities. A third of registered voters, 33 percent, say the single most important issue that will decide their vote will be Iraq; compare to 20 percent who say the economy and only 12 percent who say terrorism, which ties with health care.

The good news for the GOP? The election is still four weeks away.

Democrat Hopeful Assails GOP Over Foley (NYT/AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A Democratic congressional candidate whose son was abducted 17 years ago said GOP congressional leadership failed to protect teenage House pages from former Rep. Mark Foley's advances.

"Foley sent obvious predatory signals, received loud and clear by members of congressional leadership, who swept them under the rug to protect their political power," Minnesota Democrat Patty Wetterling charged in her party's weekly radio address Saturday.

"If a teacher did this and the principal was told but did nothing, once the community found out, that principal would be fired."

Wetterling, running for an open seat against Republican state Sen. Michele Bachmann, is already airing a hard-hitting television ad over revelations that Foley, R-Fla., had been sending inappropriate e-mails to teenage pages for years.

"We need a new direction in Congress because our children need strong voices," Wetterling said in the radio address. "We need to stop the sexual exploitation of children across the country, and in Washington we must hold accountable all those complicit in allowing this victimization to happen."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has rejected calls to resign, saying he hasn't done anything wrong. Republicans, including President Bush, have closed ranks around Hastert in recent days.

Hastert had blamed Democrats for the election-season revelations, but on Thursday abruptly changed course and took responsibility for the matter.

In a Newsweek poll released Saturday, 52 percent said they believe that Hastert was aware of Foley's inappropriate messages to pages and tried to cover them up. Forty-two percent said they trust Democrats to do a better job of handling moral values, while 36 percent said they trust Republicans more.

Wetterling's 11-year-old son, Jacob, was abducted in 1989 on a rural road. Despite a massive search effort, Jacob was never seen or heard from again. The loss transformed Wetterling from a stay-at-home mom to a national advocate for missing children.

"For 17 years, I have fought for tough penalties for those who harm children," Wetterling said. "Members of Congress are not and should not be above the law."

GOP Scandal Shows Dangers Of Stifling Dissent (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078260

If there was an Olympic competition in closing ranks, surely the Republican Party would take the gold.

Prominent conservatives and House Republican leaders tumbled over one another early last week to complain about the way House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) handled the sex scandal that forced the abrupt resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

In a private poll of top Republicans, Hastert still might not be their first choice to serve as speaker next year if the party retains its House majority. But by week's end, the public rebellion against him had almost entirely dried up. With leading conservative voices such as the Wall Street Journal editorial page insisting that any leadership change would only embolden Democrats, the flood of criticism thinned to a trickle.

At the revolt's high tide, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), jabbed at Hastert. By week's end, both looked like Chinese officials summoned to a self-criticism session during the Cultural Revolution: Each issued submissive statements praising Hastert and abjectly pledging their support. Even Paul M. Weyrich, a shrewd and independent conservative strategist, reversed his call for Hastert's resignation after an impassioned phone call from the speaker.

The pirouettes might be especially pronounced, but these are familiar steps for the GOP in recent years. Marginalizing internal dissent and promoting party unity have been hallmarks of the Republican governing strategy under President Bush.

Using both carrots and sticks, the White House and GOP congressional leaders have successfully encouraged Republican legislators and activists to see themselves more as part of a team and less as autonomous voices representing distinct and divergent constituencies. With only a few exceptions (education, immigration), the GOP has tried to resolve every policy choice in a manner that maximizes agreement within their coalition and minimizes the opportunity for Democratic influence.

That approach has produced undeniable benefits for the GOP: a series of narrow, often virtually party-line, legislative victories and massive turnouts by the party's base that powered victories in the 2002 and 2004 elections. And, although there's a reasonable political case to be made for removing the speaker, circling the wagons around Hastert might make more sense as a short-term campaign strategy than forcing him out.

But the Foley scandal dramatizes the long-term dangers of governing with a mind-set that prizes party loyalty over principled independence and denies the value of legitimate checks and balances.

In this environment, for instance, it's not surprising that Republicans didn't notify Rep. Dale E. Kildee of Michigan, the sole Democrat on the House Page Board, when questions about Foley first emerged. Republicans probably didn't think it was remarkable to exclude Kildee because they exclude Democrats from virtually all serious House business.

And it was hardly surprising that GOP leaders and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, didn't press Foley too hard or seriously investigate his contacts with pages. For six years, the White House and congressional Republicans have created a culture in which asking tough questions that might cause near-term political headaches for the party is viewed as conduct disloyal to the team.

That was the clear message in 2004 when Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, criticized his Senate counterpart, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), for holding public hearings on the Abu Ghraib abuses. Hastert sent an equally strong signal the next year when he dismissed the GOP chairman of the House Ethics Committee after the panel admonished then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) for a series of ethics violations.

Just as revealing is the potential conservative rebellion stewing in South Carolina against first-term Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

In this year's tumultuous debates over military tribunals and warrantless surveillance, Graham, a military lawyer, has asked the Bush administration tough questions, served as a bridge between the parties and displayed an incisive and independent intellect.

Apparently Graham has been too tough and independent for some back home; one local party official is trying to organize a primary challenge against him in 2008. "The voters of South Carolina sent Lindsey Graham to Washington to vote like a senator from South Carolina, not a senator from New York," Alan Gardner, the activist, told the National Journal's electronic political newsletter, the Hotline.

Unity can be a powerful asset for a party. But the unmistakable lesson from the GOP's current distress is that stifling questions and quashing independence doesn't bury problems. It plants them in soil where they inevitably grow more forbidding.

Does anyone doubt that the Bush administration would be better off today if the Republican-led Congress had conducted more genuine oversight in 2003 about the plans (or lack thereof) to rebuild and stabilize Iraq after overthrowing Saddam Hussein? Or that the House would not have experienced so many scandals — from DeLay to Foley and beyond — if the GOP leadership, with the collusion of leading Democrats, had not crippled the ethics process?

"If everyone thinks there is no sheriff in town," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the independent watchdog group Democracy 21, "you wind up with the Wild West."

Novelist Ellen Ullman wrote that in relationships, you tend to go out the way you came in. That may be true in politics too.

DOJ_NMG_0078261

In 1994, Democrats lost control of the House partly because many voters correctly concluded they had grown arrogant and insular during their long years in the majority. Republicans benefited from that experience much more than they appear to have learned from it.

Pelosi Muses About A Democratic House (SDUT/AP)

By David Espo

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 8, 2006

Possible Madame Speaker puts anti-lobby rules at top

WASHINGTON – Franklin Roosevelt had his first hundred days.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is thinking 100 hours – time enough, she says, to begin to "drain the swamp" after more than a decade of Republican rule.

As in the first 100 hours the House meets after Democrats – in her fondest wish – win control in the Nov. 7 midterm election and Pelosi takes the gavel as the first "Madame Speaker" in history.

Day One: Put new rules in place to "break the link between lobbyists and legislation."

Day Two: Enact all the recommendations made by the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

In the time remaining until 100 hours have elapsed: Raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, maybe in one step. Cut the interest rate on student loans in half. Allow the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices for Medicare patients.

Broaden the types of stem cell research allowed with federal funds – "I hope with a veto-proof majority," Pelosi added in an Associated Press interview Thursday.

All the days after that: "Pay as you go," meaning no increasing the deficit, whether the issue is middle-class tax relief, health care or some other priority.

To do that, she said, Bush-era tax cuts would have to be rolled back for those above "a certain level." She mentioned annual incomes of $250,000 or $300,000 a year and higher, and said tax rates for those individuals might revert to those of the Clinton era. Details will have to be worked out, she emphasized.

"We believe in the marketplace," Pelosi said of Democrats, then drew a contrast with Republicans. "They have only rewarded wealth, not work."

"We must share the benefits of our wealth" beyond the privileged few, she added.

Pelosi, 66, has been a leader of the House Democrats since 2002. But her political apprenticeship dates to childhood, when her father was mayor of Baltimore.

Now, her political base is about as liberal as it gets – San Francisco. It's a fact that Republicans love to emphasize to voters who might want to visit, but not feel comfortable living there.

Republicans find her an attractive political target, and recently said she would try to "cut and run" from Iraq while "launching bitter partisan investigations" of the Bush administration, possibly including impeachment hearings.

"If the election were held today, we'd be successful," Pelosi predicted, claiming that her party's prospects are expanding as the campaign enters its final month. "So many other races are emerging right now."

Democrats must gain 15 seats to regain the majority they lost in 1994, and have candidates in competitive races for 30 or so Republican-held seats, say strategists in both parties. By contrast, only a handful of Democratic-controlled seats appear ripe for possible Republican takeover.

How The Democrats Would Rule The Hill (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

Washington

IN the final weeks of this bruising campaign, the debate, in many ways, comes down to this: What would happen if the Democrats win?

Republicans warn, ever more urgently, that a Democratic takeover of Congress would mean wrenching ideological change: higher taxes; big new spending; maybe even impeachment.

Democrats insist they have no intention of an abrupt lurch to the left, offering instead a relatively modest agenda and the less-than-revolutionary rallying cry of "more oversight!"

DOJ_NMG_0078262

In fact, a Democratic majority in the House or the Senate — or both — would immediately change Washington in fundamental ways after four years of one-party Republican rule. That majority seemed less theoretical last week as Republican woes, most recently the scandal over Mark Foley and Congressional pages, added up. Even so, it would operate under some formidable constraints, political and institutional.

A Democratic Congress would have sweeping new powers to set the agenda and focus the political debate — through the hearings it calls, the witnesses it summons and the kind of legislation it brings to the floor. "More oversight" could be more revolutionary than it sounds, with the rise of lawmakers like Representative Henry A. Waxman, the hard-charging California Democrat who would take over the House Government Reform Committee; in an interview, he promised a review into "waste, fraud and abuse of taxpayers' money" related to Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and homeland security.

A Democratic majority in the Senate could also stymie, or at least slow, the conservative reconstruction of the Supreme Court, assuming another vacancy occurs in the next two years, and force President Bush to seek more bipartisanship on all judicial nominees.

"You're not going to have a polarizing figure," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who would take over the Judiciary Committee. "It would require more of an effort at consensus for lifetime appointments."

Moreover, a Democratic Congress could force Mr. Bush and a Republican minority to take a stand — again and again, if it chooses — on popular Democratic causes like raising the minimum wage or encouraging embryonic stem cell research. "If you have true openness in the debate, you have the chance to make some of these issues too hot for the president and too hard for many Republicans to vote against," said Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader who would most likely be speaker if the Democrats prevail.

But even if Democrats wanted a true liberal restoration, with two years of major legislation — and some, in their heart of hearts, yearn for just that — they almost certainly won't have the numbers to achieve it. Even if they win control of both houses next month, their majorities will most likely be narrow: in the Senate, fewer than the 60 votes necessary to break a filibuster and force a vote; in both House and Senate, fewer than the two-thirds necessary to override a presidential veto.

Democrats are also unlikely to have the extraordinary unity that the Republican majority had in its early days, given their divisions on issues like Iraq strategy.

The new Democrats would most likely include some high-profile moderates or conservatives like Bob Casey Jr., the Democratic candidate for Senate in Pennsylvania, underscoring the ideological range in the Democratic caucuses. (One veteran Democrat said, somewhat ruefully, that his party would be unable to emulate the Republicans' party discipline even if it wanted to, and thus will have to look for bipartisan coalitions.)

A Democratic candidate like Brad Ellsworth, the sheriff of Vanderburgh County in Indiana, is already carefully differentiating himself from his national party leaders. "This election isn't about Nancy Pelosi or Hillary Clinton," he says in one television ad. "Here's what I believe: I'm pro-life. I believe in a traditional marriage and the Second Amendment."

There are other, more subtle restraints on the Democrats. This would not be a return to the old, pre-1994 Congress, confident in its power, unable to imagine losing majorities and, as a result, willing to take big chances or, put another way, overreach (the failed effort at national health insurance in 1993-94). The men who would probably ascend to the chairmanships of the key committees are some of the last of the "old bulls," who came of age in the Democratic glory days on Capitol Hill. Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan was elected in 1955, Charles B. Rangel of New York in 1970. But even they have been tempered by 12 years in the minority, a Democratic leadership aide said.

More than half the Democrats in the Senate and the House have gone to Congress since the Republican ascendancy began in 1994.

What's more, both parties will immediately head into the presidential election cycle, yet another restraint on Democrats' running off the liberal pier.

Representative Pete Stark, the decidedly liberal Democrat on the House Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, said: "The '08 contest for the White House will be the major moderating influence. I don't think we're going to run out and impeach Rumsfeld and Bush, although a lot of my constituents would like to."

Ms. Pelosi, mindful of the power of the Republican charge that the Democrats will spend the next two years on partisan payback, explicitly ruled out impeachment of Mr. Bush in an interview on Thursday. "Absolutely," she said. "We don't have time for that."

Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, contends that these are the same old liberal Democrats — quite literally, in the case of the potential committee chairmen. "And if you look at the agenda," he said, "that hasn't changed."

And "when they talk about investigations and oversight," Mr. Mehlman added, "I think Americans would prefer our generals to be fighting terrorists as opposed to fighting subpoenas."

DOJ_NMG_0078263

Still, the official Democratic agenda is less Great Society than New Direction, as it is somewhat ambiguously called. "They're appropriately wary of both high expectations for what they can achieve, as well as the risk of some of their members running off in directions that would be harmful to their long-term interests in winning back the White House and holding the Democratic majority," said Thomas Mann, a Brookings scholar and co-author of "The Broken Branch: How Congress Is Failing America and How to Get It Back on Track."

So the Democrats, for now, promise carefully focused change, like raising the minimum wage, expanding assistance for college tuition, giving the government the authority to negotiate prices for the new Medicare prescription drug program. They call for the immediate start of a "phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq." They promise to "fight any plan to privatize Social Security, in whole or in part."

Nowhere is the party's careful calibration more apparent than on taxes. Many Democrats are running on a promise of fiscal responsibility and cutting the deficit, and many have argued that the nation should look for new revenues by rolling back the Bush administration's tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans. But as the election approaches, and as Republicans scrutinize every Democratic utterance on taxes, Democrats have grown more cautious. Mr. Rangel, in an interview on Friday, said any major effort to change the tax code would have to be bipartisan and involve Mr. Bush. "Members have to believe that if they're going to support legislation that's politically painful, they're going to have to support it on a bipartisan basis and not have one side pay for it at the polls," he said.

Stan Collender, a longtime budget analyst, predicts two years of "utter stalemate," regardless of who is in control next year. "There's no agreement on what to do or how to get it done," he said. What would happen under a Democratic majority, Mr. Collender added, would be two years of hearings about the impact of Mr. Bush's tax and budget policies. "Not a bad thing," he said, but "whether it creates sharper divisions in the country is another question."

In the end, the course of divided government turns as much on the attitude in the White House as on Capitol Hill, many Democrats noted. President Bill Clinton, after his party's devastating defeat in 1994, began a complex dance of confrontation and negotiation that resulted in major legislation: the overhaul of welfare and a balanced budget. Many Democrats are skeptical that Mr. Bush, in the final two years of his term, would be quite so eager to compromise and produce.

Morris P. Fiorina, a political scientist at Stanford, said, "I think we're going to limp into 2008."

Fight On All Fronts (NYT)

By DNC Chairman Howard Dean

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

WE live in dangerous times that demand real leadership. The president's foreign policies have failed. Recent polls show that a plurality of Americans trust Democrats over Republicans to handle the war on terrorism and the war in Iraq, and two-thirds of Americans want a new direction for our country.

Democrats will answer this call by standing up for change with a unified agenda, including a defense policy that's tough and smart. That's a policy for tracking down terrorists, providing our troops and agencies with the tools they need to stop future attacks and following the 9/11 commission recommendations to close the gaps in our security.

Democrats will stand up to Republican attempts to once again use fear to win elections in November. We will make sure voters know that a Democratic Congress will not rubber-stamp the administration's policies, which put the agenda of the far right ahead of what's good for America. We offer a new direction that will restore to Congress the competence, efficiency and fairness that Americans deserve.

Competence Sells (NYT)

By DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

REPUBLICANS have declared Iraq the central front on the war on terrorism. Yet Republicans in Congress ignored warnings that the invasion lacked sufficient troops; did not ask about the plan to secure the postwar environment (as it turns out, there wasn't one); and went into denial as Baghdad descended into chaos. Congressional Republicans asked no questions when the administration staffed the Coalition Provisional Authority with cronies rather than experienced professionals, or when the authority lost track of $8.8 billion in reconstruction money.

Similar Republican negligence and incompetence have led to the failure to secure Afghanistan, to apprehend Osama bin Laden, to address the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea — even to rebuild the Gulf Coast, where, a year after the inept response to Hurricane Katrina, families still live in trailers and billions in relief funds are unaccounted for.

DOJ_NMG_0078264

Our nation confronts very real dangers at home and abroad. Will voters feel safer sticking with a Republican Congress that sent our troops into battle without a plan, cut aid to local law enforcement and allowed cronyism to undermine our emergency response system, or will they want a Democratic Congress that will demand real accountability and oversight?

If Republicans want to make national security the fulcrum of the debate this election, Democrats should echo President Bush's immortal words: "Bring it on."

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

DEMOCRATS face the hard necessity of conducting a debate about the war in Iraq — and about ending it well short of victory, even as young Americans continue to fight and die. Debate now will not substitute for the honest, consensus-building discussion that should have happened before we sent our soldiers into battle, nor for the Congressional oversight that might have kept the hole from being dug deeper. Still, it needs to happen in the name of accountability, if for no other reason.

The challenge is to maintain a level of discourse that rises above the glib sloganeering that has typified the administration's defense of its behavior, but that also transcends disgust and anger. Many Americans of my generation inevitably recall the 1960's and 70's, when the repugnant rhetoric and behavior of some war protesters repelled many Americans and thus helped prolong the war in Vietnam.

Today the evidence of arrogance, deceit, and miscalculation has grown so decisive that rhetorical excess will serve only to distract from it. America deserves, and I believe will reward, a level of debate that befits the sad and solemn circumstances that make it necessary.

KARL ROVE is telling Republicans that they should campaign on the American economy, virtually the "strongest in the world," and on the Iraq war because Republicans will be there for "the last tough battles," while Democrats "fall back on the party's old platform of cutting and running."

Well, do you want to know what I am telling Democrats? Run on the economy and Iraq. We want this battle. This is indeed the strongest economy in the world for the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans. But there has been so little income growth for so many years that the great majority of citizens face stagnant incomes, growing financial pressures, high health care and gas prices, and jobs with fewer and fewer benefits.

The more Republicans talk about great times, the more they fuel voter frustration with a party out of touch with people's financial worries. And the more Republicans talk about "cut and run," the more voters focus on the ugliness of today's Baghdad. It is as though a smug conservative debate team were so busy winning the argument over setting a withdrawal deadline that it completely missed the consuming national anxiety and anger over the deception and incompetence, the misplaced priorities, the spread of violence and the failure to keep America safe. So, Karl, thank you.

DEMOCRATS face a danger as well as an incredible opportunity this fall. The danger is they will run a safe, "We're not as bad as they are" campaign. To be sure, the Republican leadership under George Bush is so bad that Democrats might be able to win majorities in both the House and the Senate with nothing more than this simple refrain. But such a victory would be hollow and short-lived.

The incredible opportunity before us is to build a new majority for change. This is not a matter of pushing the party to the left or right so much as it is one of embracing the evident hunger among the American people to set the nation on a new course. President Bush and the Republicans represent staying the course; Democrats represent changing the course.

Health Care First (NYT)

By Gov. Phil Bredesen

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

IN 1994, Republicans took advantage of the dissatisfaction Americans felt with the Democratic Party. They didn't win Congress just by saying, "We're not them." Rather, they offered an alternative worldview: the Contract With America. Democrats haven't yet offered that alternative vision.

Time is too short for a comprehensive agenda, so I suggest we concentrate on a single issue: health care. Imagine a November in which Americans are not only unhappy with the Republicans, but when we in our turn hold out clear and believable hope to nearly 50 million uninsured Americans and many more insured but worried ones. Surely my party — the party of Franklin D. Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy, of Social Security and Medicare — still has in it the vigor to offer another plain-spoken, big vision for America.

Americans are sensible. They won't put their faith in us for who we're not, but they might for who we are.

TAKE the number of children you have, multiply it by $500 and send the money to Uncle Sam. If you're married, the marriage penalty is coming back. Your income tax rate? That goes up too. All this, if the Democrats win.

The Bush tax cuts will terminate three years after the next Congress convenes. The $1,000 per child tax credit will drop to $500, marriage-penalty relief goes away, and all income tax rates go up. Republicans have vowed to make the tax cuts permanent. Democrats have pledged to reverse them. If I were running for Congress, that would be part of my message.

I'd remind elderly voters that their increasingly popular new prescription drug benefit was brought to them thanks to a Republican initiative, delivered through private markets, not government controls.

As for war and peace, stand strong. Whether it was the nuclear freeze, opposition to the liberation of Kuwait, or their cut and run proposals in Iraq, Democrats choose wrongly on foreign policy and defense. The country wants to win in Iraq and I'd proudly support our mission, confident we'll be victorious if we act long-term. Democratic control will lead to retreat.

I'd enjoy clashing with my opponent but, above all, I would treat him or her with respect. At the end of the day, we're all in this together.

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

REPUBLICANS face a disillusioned base that wonders why it has been abandoned. Despite Republican control of the White House, Senate and House, federal spending has increased 45 percent since 2001 and government is more intrusive in the everyday lives of Americans. Meanwhile, even the Bush tax cuts have yet to be made permanent.

Let's be frank. America is facing a catastrophic fiscal meltdown that has the power to cripple our society. Americans are waiting for a serious, adult debate on retirement security and the appropriate size and scope of government.

Republicans need to return to the ideas that inspire their voters — lower taxes, less government, more freedom. That vision brought us into the majority in the first place. Reining in federal spending, reforming a broken tax code, passing realistic immigration reform and creating an ownership society through entitlement reform are all big ideas that resonate with voters. When conservatives abandon limited government principles, we lose our credibility with voters. It's an Armey's Axiom: When we act like us, we win. When we act like them, we lose.

THE November House elections have now been nationalized. Republicans won't win by saying, "Elect the incumbent." They can still win, however, by embracing the national nature of the contest and emphasizing their strengths: protecting us from terrorism; creating a thriving American economy.

First, there have been no terrorist attacks on America since 9/11. The partisan rebuttal by the Democrats is that this is just good luck. The Republicans should vigorously respond that the good luck explanation is dangerously irresponsible. There are debatable aspects of the war on terrorism, but the results are not attributable simply to good luck. They are the direct result of steps taken by the president and supported by Congress.

Second, look at our economy. Real economic growth, real personal take-home income, numbers of those employed — all are at record highs. This is also not the result of good luck. The robust economy stems from actions the Republican president and Congress have taken and (wisely) not taken. Republicans let working men and women keep more of the fruits of what they create. Republicans have not built up unnecessary regulations and costs on those who create jobs.

The contest will then be between the Democrats' national issues (Iraq and management of the House) versus the Republicans' national issues (protecting us from terrorism and providing more jobs for Americans). Republicans can win that battle.

CONDEMN the Foley scandal as the egregious abuses of one man, but don't pretend that the failure to take earlier action wasn't anyone's fault. Apologize for sins of omission — but stress that Republicans would never intentionally allow such behavior.

Failure in Iraq would be catastrophic. But if it's a choice between defeat today or defeat tomorrow, the Democrats' appeal to quit sooner will seem the more practical plan. Concede obvious errors in prosecuting the war, demand accountability from officials and pledge support for the changes necessary to hold territory and improve security. Commit to expanding the Army and Marine Corps and help pay for this by banning earmarks and changing wasteful procurement policies.

John Bolton has done a good job at the United Nations and will strike voters as the right man for an often feckless institution that welcomes anti-American tirades from petty dictators. Democrats blocked his nomination. Hold them accountable.

We have provided a fence and more border agents, but we must do more to secure our borders while we develop a temporary worker plan and a program to impose responsibilities on illegal aliens in exchange for a place at the rear of the citizenship line.

Shock the voters. Admit we have spent too much of their money. Promise to quit acting like Democrats and start acting like the penny-pinching managers they expect us to be.

Remind voters we remain the party best able to provide effective governance in a time of change, instability and war, and that we have not become just the party of government, valuing power over principles.

— MARK SALTER, chief of staff to Senator John McCain.

Everyone has advice for the Democrats these days. If you're ever stranded on a desert island, the quickest way to get attention may not be to launch a signal flare but to declare your candidacy as a Democrat. Someone will be with you shortly to explain what you should do.

The minority party attracts so many caring advisers because it has lost five of the last seven presidential elections and is constitutionally prone to deep bouts of soul-searching. It is going through such an identity crisis now, as liberal activists debate with those in the center-left over how to win back the majority. Making the situation especially urgent is the tantalizing disarray in the GOP ranks: Neoconservatives have been discredited by the Iraq quagmire, Northeastern moderates dislike Southern social conservatives, and small-government-loving fiscal worriers are outraged at the GOP-led government's lack of budgetary restraint. As the midterm elections loom, Democrats have an opportunity; they just need the right plan to embrace their moment.

Thomas B. Edsall and Thomas F. Schaller have both contributed well-documented and thoughtful arguments that might help direct Democrats out of their wilderness. Edsall's accessible Building Red America is not presented as a guidebook but as a tour of the political landscape. Republicans have learned how to manage that landscape and adapt more quickly to changes on it. Democrats, on the other hand, keep losing for a reason: Their party is no longer a populist coalition, but it keeps trying to run as one, and its leaders fail to understand the connection between middle-class voters' economic self-interest and their concerns about cultural values.

These days, both parties have abandoned the middle ground. Republicans don't care about it, and Democrats aren't talented enough to find it. But in this dim world, Republicans keep coming out on top. "The Republican Party holds a set of advantages, some substantial and some marginal," Edsall writes, and unless Democrats find a way to solve their problems, "the odds are that the Republican Party will continue to maintain, over the long run, a thin but durable margin of victory."

Some of the ground covered by Edsall, a veteran Washington Post political reporter now writing for the New Republic, will feel familiar (the rise of conservatives in the South, white flight from the Democratic Party and so on), but unless you're the kind of political junkie who is so intense that people move away from you at cocktail parties, you won't get bored. Building Red America nicely weaves together the strands of contemporary politics, moving from descriptions of tactical electoral strategy to broader cultural currents to demographic shifts. If you've ever wondered why "activist judges" are the two most powerful words in Republican politics, the book offers a tidy explanation. (Corporate executives and small-business owners worry that judges will enforce regulations and reward plaintiffs; social conservatives worry that judges will destroy the institution of marriage and give unfair advantages to women and minorities.)

In analyzing the conservative ascendancy, Edsall has clearly done his reporting and spent time trying to figure out both parties. With a few rare exceptions, he doesn't step into the reporter's trap of falling in love with every bit of his own field work. There's plenty of data, history and anecdote here, but it's not applied with a trowel. The analysis is clinical, not emotional, which means that Edsall can be sympathetic to conservatives' genuine cultural concerns even as he's being clear-eyed about the GOP's rejection of the politics of consensus and its use of anger and fear to rouse its base and demonize its opposition. This should make partisans on both sides angry, which is a good place to be as a political writer.

If Edsall portrays Republicans as cynical and manipulative, he paints the Democratic Party as hapless and structurally flawed. The party has not come to terms with eroding public support for the liberal agenda, he argues; it is held captive by special interests such as unions and trial lawyers but hasn't found a way to manipulate its core constituency groups over long stretches of time the way the GOP has. The occasional bursts of populist sentiment from Democratic candidates -- Al Gore's "people against the powerful" theme, or Howard Dean's claim to represent the "Democratic wing of the Democratic Party" -- will continue to fail because the affluent college-educated voters who make up much of the party's base are more interested in socially liberal issues. "At the top, the ascendant wing of the party is not populist," Edsall writes. "It is elitist."

If that zinger doesn't get him an inbox full of angry letters, Edsall's view of the Democratic Party's cultural failings will. He disagrees with those on the left who argue that Republicans have won voters through trickery -- by emphasizing values issues like abortion or prayer in school and then doing nothing to help those voters economically. Instead, he argues that Democrats should forge a link with voters who feel that rapid cultural change undermines the sense of family and community that they believe are preconditions for economic success. "Traditional values of family, neighborhood, church, school, and the workplace are, to millions of voters, 'money in the bank' -- they are what holds people together, providing security against a rainy day."

Schaller's Whistling Past Dixie is more prescriptive and less rewarding. He's got a thorough plan for Democrats, as well as maps and tables to show the party how to win. He wants the party to stop worrying about the former Confederacy and start focusing on the Midwest and the West. The geographical theory makes sense -- so much sense, in fact, that it's not very revolutionary. There are not a lot of presidential strategists arguing that Democratic candidates should spend time in Alabama, Mississippi or South Carolina rather than Ohio, Wisconsin and New Mexico, some of the states the book offers as particularly ripe targets. Yet Schaller argues the case at great length, as if the party were busily planning to build a coalition from the South outward.

Moreover, where Edsall is judicious about dealing with only what is useful in his notebook, Schaller's book makes you suspect there isn't a statistic, chart or study he has left off the page. His analysis is also ideologically tainted. He's a Democrat offering advice for Democrats, so his sources and opinions come almost exclusively from the left. You can feel his thumb on the scale. It also clots the writing; he dishes out clunkers such as, "the Republican minority sheep is bleating loudly while dressed up in a majority wolf's disguise," and "political catnip for tort reform tigers, culture-of-life lions, pro-family panthers, and cages brimming full with a variety of sharp-clawed conservative fat cats." Oh my. Schaller's case would be more persuasive if he'd run it by a cast of Republican strategists and then let us hear their voices, either supporting his view or trying to poke holes in it.

If you can wade through the first part of Whistling Past Dixie , it does pick up steam as Schaller discusses the battleground states and the set of ideas that Democrats should embrace to build a new majority. The analysis of target states is well done, and if you read it before the midterms, you're likely to feel a rush of revelation as you realize how crucial battles in Ohio, Colorado and Nevada are. Schaller's suggestion that Democrats improve their national security credentials by focusing first on homeland security is tightly argued. (This whole set of issues is strangely lacking from the Edsall book.) Schaller also challenges liberal orthodoxy by proposing that Democrats embrace the language of Second Amendment rights to capture the votes of Midwestern and Western gun owners. At least one suggestion -- that Democrats realign their primary and caucus structure to spotlight winnable Western states -- is so prescient the party has done just that by moving Nevada's voting earlier in the process.

The least attractive suggestion in the book, though, is that Democrats should "run against the conservative South" in much the same way that Republicans have ridiculed "liberal elites" along the Eastern seaboard. Lampoon evangelicals in the South, and you offend fellow travelers in those other regions you're trying to win. It would also seem hard to create more negative stereotypes of the Southern Republican than those so often applied to George W. Bush, the supposed know-nothing cowboy, or the cultural conservatives who have supported the GOP majority.

The coming midterm and presidential elections are likely to be highly exciting: Both parties are engaged in deep internal struggles, and the issues are as grave as they have been since the early days of the Cold War. The rhetoric and punditry will be foggy and furious. Two books like these, with hard facts and data, will be useful to have during the storm. Â·

Cheney Back Delivering The Grim Campaign Speech (WP)

By Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Democrats Cast As Foils to the Nation's Security

MILWAUKEE -- Vice President Cheney sometimes starts speeches with a Ronald Reagan quotation about a "happy" nation needing "hope and faith." But not much happy talk follows. Not a lot of hope, either. He does, though, talk about the prospect of "mass death in the United States."

The not-so-happy warrior of the past two campaign cycles is back on the road delivering a grim message about danger, defeatism and the stakes of the coming election. If it is not a joyful exercise, it is at least a relentless one. Even with poll ratings lower than President Bush's, Cheney has become a more ubiquitous presence on the campaign trail than in the last midterm election.

He takes on not only the traditional vice presidential assignment of slicing up the opposition but also the Cassandra role of warning about dire threats to the nation's security. While others get distracted by Capitol Hill scandal, Cheney remains focused on the terrorists, who are, as he says in his stump speech, "still lethal, still desperately trying to hit us again." Bush, he says, is "protecting America" while the Democrats advocate "reckless" policies that add up to a "strategy of resignation and defeatism in the face of determined enemies."

But the message is carefully targeted. More than half of Cheney's fundraisers in this two-year cycle have been behind closed doors. Even at a lunchtime speech to Wisconsin Republican donors that was open to reporters, gubernatorial candidate Rep. Mark Green did not stand on stage, ensuring no pictures of the two together on the news, and some other Republican candidates did not attend at all.

That is okay with the White House, which at a perilous moment is counting on Cheney's under-the-radar campaign to rally the base, not the broader public. "The fact that he's willing to go after Democrats as harshly as the Democrats are going after the White House gets the party faithful going," said GOP strategist Glen Bolger.

It happens to inflame the Democratic faithful as well, and party strategists consider him a prime target for their own pitch to voters. "When he threatens Democrats and calls them names, it's something that really fires up our base," said John Lapp, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's independent expenditure program.

Cheney's fundraising visits often end up as fodder for opponents of those he tries to help. "Dick Cheney, Big Oil and Big Drug Companies Threw Curt Weldon a secret Washington thank you party," reads a Democratic brochure targeting the Republican Pennsylvania congressman. "And we got stuck with the bill."

The campaign comes at a pivotal moment for Cheney. His influence within the administration is widely perceived to be waning as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's star rises. The president in his second term has adopted a more diplomatic approach to problems such as Iran and North Korea than insiders believe would be to Cheney's liking. And as the 2008 presidential sweepstakes heat up, he will be the first vice president in a generation not to be seeking a promotion, leaving him on the sidelines of the most important national discussion.

But White House aides said it would be a mistake to underestimate Cheney even now. Although he is viewed favorably by just 34 percent of the public in the most recent Wall Street Journal-NBC poll, he remains a champion of conservatives at a time when the right has been angry at Bush over issues such as deficit spending and immigration. So Cheney's mission is to bring home core Republican voters when they are needed most.

"He's a good carrier of the Republican message," said Michigan GOP Chairman Saul Anuzis, noting that a Cheney visit to Grand Rapids last month raised between $750,000 and $1 million, a record for western Michigan. "He exudes a confidence. He makes you feel good and comfortable that he's vice president of the country."

Cheney's job is "a lot of volume, a lot of what we call McFundraisers," GOP lobbyist Ed Rogers said. Cheney has headlined 111 fundraisers so far in this two-year cycle, bringing in more than $39 million and already surpassing his total of 106 events for the entire 2002 cycle. Cheney is also regularly dispatched to conservative radio shows hosted by Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity and Laura Ingraham. He takes the shots the White House does not want Bush to take or wants to test out first. When Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) was defeated by antiwar challenger Ned Lamont in a primary, Cheney called reporters to say the result would encourage "al-Qaeda types" who want "to break the will of the American people."

Out here on the hustings, Cheney does not come across as the most natural campaigner. A Cheney speech does not draw its audience to its feet. It plods through an argument that is more sobering than inspiring. He delivers even red-meat lines in a flat monotone, sounding more like a chief executive reporting to shareholders than a politician issuing a call to action.

The vice president, though, goes after Democrats by name in a way Bush rarely does, including Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.), Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) and party Chairman Howard Dean. At a fundraiser in Sarasota, Fla., last week, he also singled out Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), John D. Rockefeller IV (W.Va.) and Reps. John Conyers (Mich.), Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and Barney Frank (Mass.).

He talks mainly about terrorism and Iraq, arguing that U.S. withdrawals from Lebanon after the Marine barracks bombing in 1983 and from Somalia after the "Black Hawk Down" ambush in 1993 emboldened terrorists. "If we follow Congressman Murtha's advice and withdraw from Iraq the same way we withdrew from Beirut in 1983 and Somalia in 1993, all we will do is validate the al-Qaeda strategy and invite even more terrorist attacks," Cheney said in Milwaukee. In Houston last week, he accused Democrats of "apparently having lost their perspective concerning the nature of the enemy."

The crux of his pitch is what he calls the continuing "danger to civilization." Cheney, who warned in 2004 that the United States would be hit by terrorists if Democrat John F. Kerry was elected president, has not gone that far this time but does say that it "is not an accident" that the country has not suffered another attack since Sept. 11, 2001, giving Bush credit.

Democrats regularly punch back, suggesting Cheney is out of touch and desperate. "At a time when the Bush Administration finds itself increasingly isolated on Iraq, Vice President Cheney today went on the attack," Senate Democrats said in a statement last week. "Instead of ranting and raving on the campaign trail, Bush and Cheney should spend their time on the trail of Osama bin Laden."

Five years after Sept. 11, Cheney's message may be wearing. Some find it too limited. "To tell you the truth, I was a little disappointed," David Huibregtse, head of Wisconsin's Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay party members, said after a speech. "Too much on how great President Bush is doing and very little on why we should vote for the Republicans."

Yet it still resonates in certain quarters. Between fundraisers, Cheney addressed a Michigan National Guard rally, an ostensibly nonpartisan event that nonetheless provided helpful photos of him surrounded by soldiers in uniform.

Dick Szymanski, a manufacturing executive whose son serves in the Marines, applauded the vice president's message. "We respect him," Szymanski said. "It's a very, very hard job that he and the president have, that they've had handed to them. You can belittle people for the things they should or should not have done. But they're there trying to take care of the public."

Iraq Is A Loser For Dems, Too (WP)

By Vic Fingerhut

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078270

The deepening controversy over Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld must seem like a dream come true for Democrats campaigning for the midterm elections. What better foil than a troubled president supporting an embattled defense secretary waging an increasingly unpopular war? Little surprise that the Democrats are pressing the debate on Rumsfeld, engaging the Republicans on terrorism-related matters and issuing a continual flow of press releases on Iraq.

But it's a losing strategy. For nearly 50 years, poll after poll has shown that the Democrats have very limited credibility with the American public on foreign policy issues -- particularly among the swing voters who have a disproportionate say in the outcome of U.S. elections.

The Democratic Party seems certain to make serious gains in November's off-year elections, especially given the fallout from the House page scandal involving former congressman Mark Foley (R-Fla.). But focusing on foreign policy matters -- and the war in Iraq in particular -- during the final weeks of the campaign could cost the Democrats close contests they might otherwise win.

Americans may be unhappy with how the Iraq war is going, but history makes it clear that an antiwar platform will not help the Democrats in 2006, any more than it did in 2004 -- or in 1972, for that matter.

It may seem unjust that the party of victory in World War II, of the Marshall Plan and of NATO does not enjoy much credibility on foreign policy. But that's the way it is -- and has been for quite some time.

President Bush certainly gets this. His recent speeches on the War on Terror and 9/11 sparked a rebound in his public approval rating, and his negatives are barely worse than the percentage who voted against him in 2004.

How could this be, given the constant bad news out of Iraq? Haven't polls over the past two years shown deep unhappiness with the war?

The answer is yes, but the published surveys often miss two critical follow-up questions. First: Do those who are unhappy with the war perceive the Democrats as better at handling the situation than the Republicans are? And second: Which party do swing voters trust the most to handle things in Iraq?

And here the numbers change dramatically.

A recent poll by my firm in five critical states (four of which barely went to the Democrats in 2004) showed that, by significant margins, swing voters and late deciders trust Republicans more to handle foreign policy issues in general -- not just terrorism, but Iraq as well. These are the voters who often determine the outcome of elections, but many Democrats are not paying attention to this fact.

By 20- to 30-point margins, these critical swing voters indicate that they trust the Republicans more than the Democrats to handle foreign policy (46 to 23 percent) and the fight against terrorism (48 to 19 percent). On Iraq, Republicans were seen as better at handling the war by an 18-point (45 to 27 percent) margin.

For students of polling, there is a history to these results that the Democrats ignore at their peril. In the 1960 contest between John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon, for instance, voters who made their decisions primarily on foreign policy issues chose Nixon by a 5 to 1 margin. Pundits point to the famous 1964 "Daisy Girl" television spot, and Lyndon B. Johnson's 60 to 40 victory over Republican Barry Goldwater as validation that the Democrats can gain from foreign policy issues. But Johnson's lead declined after the ad, which suggested that Goldwater would be dangerously trigger-happy, was aired.

McGovern's huge failure in 1972 to capitalize on widespread unhappiness with the Vietnam War should have taught the Democrats something. Indeed, among swing voters, the Republicans gained votes both as critics of the war in 1968 and as defenders of it four years later.

Democrats' failures to reverse the string of GOP victories in Congress in 2002 and 2004, as well as Sen. John F. Kerry's inability in the 2004 presidential campaign to move swing voters on the war issue, should be more contemporary warning flags.

What, then, should the Democrats do? If they want to change U.S. foreign policy -- or policy on anything else -- they must win elections. And there is a way.

The same swing voters who indicate such overwhelming faith in Republicans on terrorism, Iraq and foreign policy simultaneously express strong Democratic preferences when it comes to basic economic and pocketbook issues. They think that Democrats are more concerned about issues affecting Americans in the workplace, would better control the costs of health insurance by a comfortable 46 to 24 percent margin, and would better protect American workers from the loss of jobs to outsourcing and foreign imports.

Given these findings, it is no surprise that millions of dollars in Democratic candidates' television ads on Iraq and party leaders' statements on the war have only helped Bush's approval ratings -- and, prior to the Foley scandal, reduced a substantial Democratic lead in congressional vote intentions to a near dead heat.

Some Democrats have understood these critical swing voters. In the "Loneliest Campaign," author Irwin Ross describes how in 1948 Harry S. Truman, who led the nation during arguably the most creative and innovative foreign policy period in U.S.

history, told his speechwriters to stay away from foreign policy in favor of domestic economic issues, the more populist the better. "Gluttons of privilege," he called Republicans.

Truman's strategy is still right on target.

The Foley scandal has momentarily eclipsed the attention to foreign policy so assiduously nourished by the president's recent terrorism speeches and visits by foreign dignitaries. However, if a victory in these off-year elections leads Democrats to the same false conclusion of failed presidential candidates from George McGovern to Kerry that the road to the White House can be found in foreign policy issues, then the Foley episode may turn out to have an unanticipated and ironic political consequence.

Democrats Aim To Regain Edge In Getting Voters To The Polls (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

ST. PAUL, Minn. -- It may seem like a distant memory now, but Democrats not so long ago dominated the battle between the parties to get their voters to the polls.

Over the past half-dozen years, Republicans reinvented the system, using sophisticated computer modeling and vast amounts of consumer data. In 2002 and 2004, they demonstrated their newfound superiority -- to the dismay of Democratic Party officials and their allies.

"It's no secret that the other side figured this out a little sooner," said Josh Syrjamaki, the state director of America Votes, an umbrella organization of labor and liberal interest groups. "They've had four to six years' jump on us on this stuff . . . but we feel like we can start to catch up. I guess we'll find out in about a month and a half how much we've caught up."

On a blustery afternoon in their third-floor office suite, Syrjamaki and Ed Coleman, the technology director for the Minnesota chapter of America Votes, were hunched over a laptop computer, teasing out information that Democrats hope will begin to narrow the sizable gap with the GOP.

The laptop linked them to a huge new database that holds the names, addresses, voting histories and consumer preferences of every Minnesota resident eligible -- though not necessarily registered -- to vote. That's a weapon that allows them to identify, locate, contact and turn out likely Democratic voters who have been largely invisible to them.

Campaigns and candidates once used blunt instruments to mobilize voters, targeting geographic areas where there were concentrations of Democratic or Republican voters. Those techniques remain an essential part of the turnout wars that can decide a close election, which is why campaigns, political parties and their ideological allies will put legions of volunteers on the streets in the final days before Nov. 7.

Increasingly, however, campaigns have begun identifying potential voters literally one by one, even if they live in areas dominated by the opposition party. Using surveys and modeling and consumer and political data, the parties convert the electorate into subgroups that turnout specialists call by names like "Flag and Family Republicans," "Education-Focused Democrats" and "Older Suburban Newshounds."

This is known as microtargeting, and it turns traditional political mobilizing on its head by giving campaigns the opportunity to create virtual precincts of voters and poach on the opponent's turf.

With the click of a mouse, a Democratic campaign operative can call up a list (and accompanying map) identifying by name and address voters who may live in a Republican precinct or county but who, by virtue of ideology, party identification, religion, favorite drink or television show, or make of car, are more likely to vote Democratic.

In 2004, the biggest jump in GOP votes came in non-GOP precincts, according to former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie. "The biggest boost came from cities where Republican registration is like 20 or 25 percent," he said.

These voters are often difficult to motivate, but both parties see them as critically important additions to the reliable voters they have concentrated on in the past. "It's a heavier lift, but we're now going to find them, whereas before we never even talked to them," said Karen White, national political director for Emily's List, which backs Democratic women who support abortion rights. "Now we're in the game."

The Republicans have attracted attention to their microtargeting skills by emphasizing the importance of consumer information in predicting voting patterns -- Republicans prefer bourbon, for instance, while Democrats prefer gin. Such lifestyle information is most helpful in tailoring messages for voters, though other information such as party identification or frequency of church attendance remains a more reliable predictor of how someone is likely to vote.

Republicans pioneered these techniques, building on data gathered for years and stored and managed through the Republican National Committee. Democrats acknowledge that they have been far sloppier in their collection and retention of data -- voter files were often lost or tossed out between elections. Even now there is competition between the Democratic National Committee and outside groups, which are essentially building duplicate versions of the same system.

Harold Ickes, a driving force behind outside efforts to put Democrats back in the game, said Republicans have two clear advantages over the Democrats. First is a deeper and richer database, which improves the GOP's ability to "model the electorate" -- the term for identifying and classifying voter blocs -- and to tailor messages to individual voters. Second is a trained cadre of people who know how to make use of the databases.

"We are still behind the eight ball on that, and it will take us a handful of years to catch up," Ickes said.

Ickes is president of a for-profit firm called Catalist, which is creating a national voter file that will be available for purchase by an array of special interest groups, "527" organizations and political campaigns, including those of 2008 presidential candidates. Laura Quinn, a veteran Democratic strategist who helped create a voter file for the DNC when Terence R. McAuliffe was chairman, serves as chief executive.

The firm's budget for the year, Ickes said, is "in the low $9 million range," and so far Catalist has produced voter files for about half of the states, including the important 2006 battlegrounds. Ickes said the firm has 19 customers, including the AFL-CIO, the Service Employees International Union and Emily's List.

The private-sector Democratic effort appears cumbersome compared with the centralized operation organized under the RNC. Catalist produces the voter file, but from there the subscribers must manipulate the data to make microtargeting possible. Progressive groups are running experiments in a handful of states, including Minnesota, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Colorado.

Emily's List, with help from the service employees union, took the lead, surveying 10,000 people in Michigan and 9,300 in Minnesota. Respondents were asked how they used their free time, what kinds of volunteer work they did, and other lifestyle or values-oriented questions, as well as their voting intentions.

The next step was to build clusters of voters based on political and lifestyle characteristics. The results were then applied to the entire voter file in the states -- more than 7 million in Michigan and more than 4 million in Minnesota.

In Michigan, the process produced 14 clusters -- three strongly Democratic, one weak Democratic, six in the middle, two strongly Republican and two weak Republican. The modeling cost about $250,000. In Minnesota, the process produced 13 clusters, including the Older Suburban Newshounds and Rural Religious Moralists. The highly informed newshounds make up the largest of the 13, while the rural moralists are one of the smallest ones.

Armed with the new database, America Votes coordinates efforts for dozens of interest groups on the left. In Minnesota, Syrjamaki and Coleman provided a demonstration of the new database by pinpointing two heavily Republican counties in the state, rural Otter Tail and exurban Chisago.

With a few clicks, Coleman reduced the vast file to a list of the clusters in Chisago County and with minimal effort was able to show a list of potential Democratic voters surrounded by tens of thousands of Republicans.

"We have a nice chunk of people that we would not normally have known about," Coleman said. "We would not have blindly gone in and called people there, but now we've found a universe, and if we want to we can go call."

Just as important, America Votes tries to assure that the array of Democratic interest groups avoid duplication in contacting voters while reaching out to irregular voters who have been ignored or simply missed in the past. With the help of America Votes, Democratic groups can divide up individual voters, and, based on their profiles, these voters can be targeted with messages that conform to their particular interests and issue preferences.

The Democratic National Committee has spent about $8 million building its own national voter file and is running modeling experiments in six states this fall, although officials there will not name the states. "We've invested a huge amount of money and time to improve the quality of the data in the voter file," said Ben Self, a veteran of DNC Chairman Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign who is directing the technology effort for the party.

Republicans retain advantages in this turnout battle. The RNC has successfully used microtargeting to identify potential Republicans who are not registered to vote and have systematically sought to get them to register. That helped changed the balance between Republicans and Democrats in the 2004 election to the GOP's advantage.

The experiments of 2006 are seen as a prelude to the 2008 presidential campaign, when Democrats hope to be closer to parity with Republicans in finding those hard-to-get voters registered and to the polls.

"We had huge voter turnout in our heaviest base areas," Coleman said. "But we cannot count on that turnout to carry the day. We're going to have to do better in these fast-growing counties outside the metro area, and this is one tool we're going to use to try to do that."

Labor Goes Door To Door To Rally Suburban Voters (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

DOJ_NMG_0078273

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio — After being outhustled by Republicans in voter turnout drives in recent years, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. plans to spend $40 million nationwide on voter education and turnout, emphasizing swing states like Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

In addition, just as conservatives used referendums on same-sex marriage to mobilize voters in 2004, labor has helped put measures to raise the state minimum wage on the ballot in Ohio and three other states, an effort that union officials hope will draw low-income voters.

Unions may not feel the economic wind at their back, but they feel good about this year's campaign as they tap into worker discontent over stagnant wages, shuttered factories, shrinking pensions and the soaring trade deficit.

"What we're seeing is dozens of races that are so close that they're really going to be decided on the ground," said the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., John J. Sweeney, "and I think that's where we're going to make the difference."

With Democrats trying to win control of the House, unions are focusing on 56 House races, including five in Ohio. Labor is also working hard on the Senate race here, backing Representative Sherrod Brown, a critic of free-trade pacts, in his bid to unseat Mike DeWine, a Republican.

Despite labor's stepped-up efforts, Republicans voice confidence about Nov. 7.

"In 2004, Ken Mehlman and the George Bush turnout operation showed they are better than labor, and they've only improved things since then," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Yet, Republicans acknowledge that unions are a formidable force.

"Democrats outsource a lot of their turnout efforts to labor," said Mike DuHaime, political director of the Republican National Committee. "For a long time, labor did a better job than we did. But for the last two or three election cycles, we've been able to compete with them and do a better job."

Not long ago, Republicans began borrowing many a page from labor, but now unions are borrowing from the Republicans' playbook.

Traditionally strongest in urban areas, unions are devoting more energy than ever to workers in suburbs and even exurbs. Labor is focusing on the "drop-off voter," making sure that union members who vote in presidential elections but not in midterm elections go to the polls.

In another initiative, unions are campaigning among a group that has largely been off limits to them under federal law, nonunion workers. The federation has figured out a way to reach those workers, sending canvassers door to door to sign up 1.5 million nonunion workers, including 700,000 Ohioans, to join a new A.F.L. affiliate, Working America, with an eye to having them vote for labor-endorsed candidates.

"There are more than 1.5 million labor voters in Ohio," said Karen Ackerman, political director of the federation, pointing to union members, union retirees, members of union households and members of Working America. "Organized labor is single-handedly the largest voting bloc in Ohio."

Ms. Ackerman predicted that these labor voters would represent 35 percent of Ohio voters this year, though just 15 percent of Ohio workers belong to unions.

Thanks to the explosive growth of Working America here, some Democrats say their party will receive a bigger boost from labor in Ohio than in any other state.

Mabel Sorrell, a $6-an-hour supermarket worker in Columbus, joined Working America — it is free — saying it helped her learn about issues like the minimum wage. When Jesse Kloth, one of labor's many foot soldiers here, knocked on her door, Ms. Sorrell initially voiced support for Representative Deborah Pryce, a Republican facing her toughest re-election race in a decade. By the time Mr. Kloth finished his five-minute visit, Ms. Sorrell seemed to be leaning against Ms. Pryce.

"I now mainly see political commercials that don't tell you much," Ms. Sorrell, a widowed mother of four, said. "It's good to have people explain things to you in person."

Labor is focusing on Ohio, union leaders say, because it has many union members, because factory closings have unsettled workers and because Ohio could hold the key to the 2008 presidential election, just as it did in 2004. Adding to labor's confidence is a corruption scandal that has rocked Republicans in state government. "I think the majority of people are ready for a change," John Russo, president of a steelworkers local in Canton, said. "They're fed up. They see the way the economy is going. They see too many manufacturing jobs being lost."

Democrats like Mr. Brown and Ms. Pryce's opponent, Mary Jo Kilroy, welcome the help. A spokesman for Ms. Pryce, George Rasley, gave grudging praise, saying, "Labor's support is the only reason Kilroy is even in the game."

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, praised labor's member-to-member communication.

DOJ_NMG_0078274

"They're spending $40 million," Mr. Emanuel said, "and if it's spent strategically and smart, which labor knows how to do, I think it will be significant."

The get-out-the-vote drive faces problems. Many union presidents in Ohio prefer to focus on the governor's race, eager to put a Democrat in the statehouse. Parent unions in Washington want the foot soldiers to focus on House and Senate races.

Some union leaders are frustrated that there are more undecided union members and fewer volunteers than they would like, partly because this is a midterm election.

"Every family is stretched so thin, you have two people working in just about every household, so it's not easy for people to find time to volunteer," said Mike McNichol, a union official at the Hoover vacuum cleaner plant in North Canton.

Moreover, the schism in labor, with seven unions quitting the A.F.L.-C.I.O., has complicated efforts. Several breakaway unions, most notably the Teamsters, are not letting the federation send political mailings to its members or knock on their doors.

Still, there is cooperation. The federation telephone bank in Cleveland was run from the local headquarters of the United Food and Commercial Workers, which quit the federation in 2005.

When Bob Harper, a steelworker at a giant Timken steel mill in Canton, handed out union-produced fliers shortly after sunup, he encountered some workers who were receptive but others who were not.

Scott Harding, an electrician at the mill, did not seem ready to be swayed when he took a flier praising Ted Strickland, the Democratic candidate for governor.

"I make my own decisions," Mr. Harding said. "I don't know where Strickland is on the Second Amendment," a reference to the right to bear arms.

Labor's strategy is to urge workers to focus on pocketbook issues like employment, health care and pensions, and not same-sex marriage and gun rights, issues they call Republican distractions.

Mr. McNichol, the union official at Hoover, hardly sounded optimistic. "We shouldn't underestimate the Republican Party's ability to get their core members out to vote," he said.

Democrats In Accord (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

After months of negotiating, the leaders of the Democratic National Committee and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee have struck a deal on the national party's spending strategy in its quest to capture control of the Senate in November.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean has agreed to put what one Democratic aide said was roughly $5 million into Senate races. Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee chairman, welcomed the agreement, saying: "The DNC is helping us at a time we need it very much, and we appreciate Chairman Dean's efforts."

A few weeks ago, Dean struck a similar deal with Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) to spend $12 million on voter-mobilization efforts this fall, with $2.4 million allotted to the most competitive House races.

The deals bring a measure of closure to a heated debate this year among Dean, Schumer and Emanuel over the party's spending strategy. Emanuel and Schumer have advocated spending resources on this year's races, when the national political climate favors substantial Democratic gains in both chambers. But Dean has said that the party's long-term health relies on spending money to develop party infrastructure across the country.

The DNC also intends to increase its contribution to the most competitive fall House campaigns by $2 million -- to a total of $4.4 million. "In this important election, as with every election, we can't take any vote for granted," said DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney.Clinton Donates $2 Million

Another prominent Democrat is boosting the Senate campaign committee's bank account this fall. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), cementing her reputation as her party's fundraiser in chief, recently gave $2 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee .

Clinton cut a $1 million check from her campaign kitty late last month -- a sum matched by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) and Dianne Feinstein (Calif.). Clinton then gave another $1 million Wednesday, establishing herself as the single largest contributor to the DSCC this election cycle.

"This is very generous and couldn't come at a better time," Schumer said of the contribution.

The money comes from Clinton's massive stash of cash -- more than $22 million in late August. Since coming to the Senate in 2001, Clinton has raised $46 million for her reelection bid, hoping to scare away a big-name Republican challenger.

It worked. Former Yonkers mayor John Spencer is the GOP's sacrificial lamb this fall. An independent poll conducted last month showed Clinton ahead 58 percent to 29 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0078275

But the fat bank account also allows her to lavish campaign funds on Democrats hoping to join her in the Senate in January -- a necessary move if she hopes to run for president in 2008. Clinton has also been making campaign stops, including in Virginia last week to support former Navy secretary James Webb's Senate bid. She is expected to visit Pennsylvania, Ohio and Florida before Election Day.

"Senator Clinton is committed to doing all she can to help Democrats win back control of Congress," said Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Clinton.Primary Turnout Low

For all the talk of energized voters evicting incumbents in this year's congressional primaries, voter turnout reached a record low, according to a new study, which said that 15 percent of eligible voters went to the polls on primary day this year.

"People are becoming increasingly disaffected with both parties, on one level," said Curtis Gans, the director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate, which issued the report. "And on another level, we have eroded the religion of civic duty in this country."

Only two races produced record high turnouts -- 12 percent in the Democratic Senate primary in Connecticut and 9 percent in Rhode Island's Republican Senate primary. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) was defeated by antiwar businessman Ned Lamont, though he is still in the race as an independent, and Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) headed off a tough challenge from conservative Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey.

Despite the low turnout in the primaries, Gans said the election on Nov. 7 could see substantial numbers of voters going to the polls.

"The general election is being driven by the emotional feelings about the presidency of George Bush," he said. "People turn out when they're angry mostly on a temporary basis."

As examples, he cited the 1966 midterm election, when voters punished Democrats for then-President Lyndon B. Johnson's stewardship of the Vietnam War; in 1982, when Republicans were slapped for economic recession; and in 1994, when Democrats were thwarted from their control of the House and Senate after the failure of President Bill Clinton's health-care initiative.

Too Soon For Obama (LAT)

By Ezra Klein op-ed

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

His rhetoric soars and inspires, but the Illinois senator has yet to show leadership in Congress.

AS MUCH AS political junkies love the presidential horse race, their deepest affection is reserved for fantasy campaigns. Your average Democratic poll watcher or precinct walker will happily expound on his or her thoughts about the 2008 crop of candidates, but their eyes will really light up when they slip the surly bonds of reality and begin drafting titans and bigfoots, movie stars and war heroes. Oprah! Tom Hanks! Al Gore! A constitutionally incapable Bill Clinton! A resurrected FDR! A progressive shape-shifter from the Alpha Centauri quadrant!

It's perhaps predictable that this affliction, at least for now, is most prominent among Democrats, who are understandably insecure about their party's capability to draft winners. Surveying the field, many see a lineup of has-beens and never-wills. Charisma-challenged moderates such as Mark Warner mingle with establishment blowhards such as Joe Biden; disgraced nominees such as John Kerry threaten to drown out promising newcomers such as Russ Feingold. And who-oh-who will stop Hillary?

The latest name rippling through the Democratic ranks is Barack Obama. The half-Kenyan, Harvard-educated, hyper-charismatic senator from Illinois burst onto the national scene in 2004 when, still a state senator with higher-office hopes, he stole the Democratic convention with a soaring, heart-quickening keynote address. Since then, he's been a rare, hyper-eloquent spot of hope in a party desperately searching for cheer.

And although he routinely reminds that he's but a junior senator, his attributes only loom larger when transposed onto the 2008 race. In a crowd of old faces, Obama offers movie star good looks and a dazzling smile. Among a crew of (mostly) stale speakers, his rhetoric soars and excites. And in a particularly polarizing moment, he is preternaturally skilled at swelling the soul with calls for unity and national purpose. Noam Scheiber, a senior editor at the New Republic, gushes that "Obama is easily more intelligent, sophisticated and charismatic than 99% of the politicians I've come across," and, just for good measure, notes that "Bill Clinton is the only one I can think of who combines all three talents in similar proportions." Adding to the Obama mystique, Oprah Winfrey advised those seeking to draft her into the race to "take [that] energy and put it in Barack Obama."

If Obama isn't overtly preparing for a presidential run, he's certainly testing the waters. Recent weeks have seen him headlining Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's steak fry, a legendary stop on the presidential aspirant road tour. While there, he had Steve Hildebrand, Al Gore's former Iowa director, introduce him to the state's activists. And the attention was only enhanced when

Illinois state Comptroller Dan Hynes, who challenged Obama in the 2004 Democratic primary, released an open letter urging the young senator to run for president in 2008.

OK Democrats, deep breath. Despite Obama's undeniable magnetism and star power, he's not your guy. Not yet.

For now, Obama is a cipher, an easy repository for the hopes and dreams of liberals everywhere. He had the good fortune to run his first statewide (and nationally noticed) election against Chicago investment banker Jack Ryan, who dropped out because of a sex scandal, and then the brilliant performance artist (c'mon — you don't really believe that guy's serious, do you?) Alan Keyes. It's easy to focus on lofty ideals and shining rhetoric if you don't have an opponent and need never enter the muck of a competitive campaign.

But if Obama avoided being battle-tested in 2004 by the grace of God, it's his own timidity that has kept his name clean since.

Given his national profile and formidable political talents, he could have been a potent spokesman for Democratic causes in the Senate. Instead, he has refused to expend his political or personal capital on a single controversial issue, preferring to offer anodyne pieces of legislation and sign on to the popular efforts of others.

The closest he came to a showdown was when he sought to ignore John McCain's bipartisan group and decided instead to draft strong new ethics rules for the Senate. McCain flew into a public rage, and Obama backed down; no powerful bill was ever passed.

Indeed, Obama is that oddest of all creatures: a leader who's never led. There are no courageous, lonely crusades to his name, or supremely unlikely electoral battles beneath his belt. He won election running basically unopposed, and then refused to open himself to attack by making a controversial but correct issue his own.

Is that evidence of youth, or timidity? Does he hold no unpopular opinions, or does he simply avoid conflict? How would he react to fusillades launched by able opponents?

For now, nobody knows. But given the smear campaign launched against every recent Democratic nominee, grace and strength under fire should be proven qualities before Democrats even consider a potential candidate.

There are, to be sure, ways Obama could prove his mettle, not to mention his priorities. He could, say, make universal healthcare coverage his public obsession or demand an end to the war in Iraq. He could fight for full public financing of all campaigns, or seek a national living wage.

But until then, if Obama gleams, Democrats have no way of knowing if it's because he's truly an action hero or because he's refused to step out of his packaging. And until that question is answered, the hardened fighters they know are preferable to the attractive cipher they don't.

It's The Agenda, Stupid (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez column

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Gregory Rodriguez: A Mormon President? Why Not?

IN A RADIO INTERVIEW last week, prominent evangelical activist James Dobson said that Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's Mormon faith "could pose a serious obstacle" if he decided to run for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. Dobson said he thought that conservative Christians wouldn't feel comfortable casting a ballot for a Mormon. Chances are, he's wrong.

Sure, plenty of evangelical Protestants refuse to consider Mormonism a branch of Christianity. A Pentecostal missionary recently referred to the heavily Mormon state of Utah as the "last frontier" for Christian proselytizing in the United States.

While Protestants and Catholics accept two books of Scripture, Mormons have three. Mormons believe that church founder Joseph Smith was a prophet of God; other Christians don't consider him anything except the founder of, at best, an unusual sect. Perhaps most troubling to many evangelicals, Mormons believe that the Almighty has a physical body. In other words, theologically speaking, Mormonism is much further away from Christian evangelicalism than, say, Catholicism or any mainline Protestant denomination.

But when it comes to American politics, it seems clear that cultural affinity and a shared political agenda can trump theology. Evangelical activists, for instance, have joined forces with conservative Jews and Tibetan Buddhists on human rights issues such as sex trafficking and North Korean gulags.

Since the earliest days of their religion in the early 19th century, when they were openly persecuted, Mormons have cultivated both their distinctiveness and a greater acceptance by society at large. Indeed, the church's decision to ban polygamy in the late 19th century was tied to its desire to have the Utah Territory accepted as a state. Once keen on establishing their own Zion in the West, over time Mormons became increasingly eager to integrate.

By the late 20th century, Mormons had developed a reputation for being as American as apple pie, even if their beliefs were way out of the mainstream. They also became loyal Republicans. As recently as this summer, Utah voters — two-thirds of whom are Mormon — gave President Bush the highest job-approval rating of any state.

Joseph Cannon, chairman of the Utah Republican Party, calls Mormons the African Americans of the GOP because about 70% vote Republican. He says their affinity for Bush and his party derives from shared values. Of course, the same could be said about evangelicals, who at 40% make up the single biggest demographic bloc in the Republican coalition.

The conservative "values" agenda — anti-abortion, anti-gay marriage, a shared vision of what constitutes America's moral fiber — that connects each group to the GOP also links them to each other, at least politically.

"Some evangelicals may think that Mormons are going to hell," says Notre Dame sociologist Christian Smith, "but at the same time, they might think that it wouldn't be too bad to have one in elected office."

In other words, for all the talk of faith being central to the political behavior of religious conservatives, it can take a back seat to their social and political agendas.

Evangelicals are probably the least ecumenical of the major Christian groups in the county. They believe in evangelization, bringing the Gospel to new peoples, and in the inerrancy of Scripture. They are highly invested in their version of religious truth and less willing to find theological compromise with other denominations and religions.

It was the secularism of the late 1960s and early 1970s that pushed the once otherworldly evangelicals into the political arena. Feeling put upon by modernity, evangelical activism was fueled by indignation and the belief that they received little respect in an increasingly plural nation.

But the political and cultural successes of recent years, and their unprecedented influence on the Bush administration, have begun to change that equation. "It's harder to keep seeing yourself as an embattled minority when, in fact, your values are becoming increasingly accepted," says Baylor University religion scholar Rodney Stark. "Fifteen years ago, nobody made Hollywood movies to appeal to evangelical Christians. Things have changed."

And while some overly confident evangelical activists may feel their numbers mean they don't need to build bridges with those with whom they disagree, a growing number of evangelicals have begun to feel what Stark calls a "confidence and calmness." Now that their sense of exclusion has diminished, they are more willing to find common cause with non-evangelicals.

Christian evangelicals may think Mormons are dead wrong on fundamental issues of faith, but they share a conservative social vision. Despite Dobson's true-believer (and anti-Mormon) stance, U.S. politics will no doubt — in its time-honored way — once again make strange bedfellows. And Romney, who has called himself an "evangelical Mormon," could reap the benefits.

Allen Rallies Conservative Supporters (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 8, 2006

MAIDENS, Va. -- Sen. George Allen last night rallied with his most reliable conservative friends, saying he is the only choice for them come Election Day, while Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. accused the Republican of running dishonest attack ads.

Mr. Allen, elected to the Senate in 2000, told attendees at his annual "Hoe Down" that Mr. Webb would increase taxes.

Mr. Allen echoed the theme of his latest campaign ad, saying that the national Democrats who support Mr. Webb want to let President Bush's tax cuts expire.

"You know what that means?" he asked. "Tax increases."

"You can count on me to make sure those tax cuts ... stay permanent. My friends, raising taxes would hurt our competitiveness and would cost us jobs and you ought to keep more of what you earn anyway."

The Webb campaign called on the senator to stop running the ads.

One ad says Mr. Webb would increase taxes because he is supported by liberal national Democrats. The other features a woman who accused Mr. Webb of misquoting her in a 1979 article, though she was not quoted in the piece after he interviewed her.

The campaign also said Mr. Allen violated a promise to voters that he would "get back on the issues."

"He must pull these ads and apologize to the people of Virginia for sinking Virginia politics to a new low," the Webb campaign wrote in a memo to reporters.

Mr. Allen yesterday promised he would stay on the issues and his record as a governor and a senator. He promised to be tough on national security and to fight for energy independence, themes that are sure to arise tomorrow at his final debate with Mr. Webb.

When Mr. Allen linked Mr. Webb to "Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton," the crowd booed and hissed.

DOJ_NMG_0078278

Conservative talk show host Laura Ingraham spoke at the fundraising event, at a private ranch where attendees dined on barbecued chicken and kept out of the rain under a large tent.

Miss Ingraham threw the 500 attendees some political red meat, saying Virginia voters are smarter than the "dinosaur media."

She asked the crowd what Mrs. Clinton, Howard Dean, Sens. John Kerry and Charles E. Schumer, Barbra Streisand and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez had in common. "They've all endorsed Webb," she said, adding a "just kidding."

A few minutes later, she told Allen supporters: "When I see the politics of smear and fear versus the politics of substance and focus, I worry for our country."

Mr. Webb, secretary of the Navy under President Reagan, was forced to cancel several appearances scheduled for the Richmond area yesterday afternoon because of the sloppy weather.

He was scheduled to speak at a Norfolk reception of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and at an event in Portsmouth.

At the "Hoe Down," Mr. Allen and his supporters insisted his campaign ads were not negative.

Donors at the event were named "buckaroos," "cow bosses," "ranch hands" and "el ranchero grandes," depending on their gift, from a $50 minimum to $10,000.

Mr. Allen, sporting a bolo tie and a cream-colored cowboy hat along with his everyday footwear, thick-heeled boots, stood on the stage with his family: wife Susan, son Forrest and daughters Tyler and Brooke Victoria.

"We're all cowboys today," said Lt. Gov. William T. Bolling, a Republican.

Will Sen. Allen's Cowboy Boots Fit Virginia Voters? (WP)

By Michael D. Shear, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Detractors Call Cowboy Image a Shtick

RICHMOND -- Like many kids, George Allen grew up idolizing television cowboys with shiny six-shooters at their hips. But his love affair with the imagery of the Old West endured into adulthood and became a motif of his political career.

He donned the boots, the flannel shirts and the ten-gallon hat as he rose from state lawmaker to congressman, governor and, finally, U.S. senator. The rustic image resonated in Virginia even though the state is far from cowboy country.

Now, as Virginia's junior senator battles for a second term and considers a run for the presidency in 2008, Allen hopes the cowboy persona still gives him the political benefit it gave his hero -- President Ronald Reagan -- and others such as President Lyndon B. Johnson and the current President Bush.

Last night, at a supporter's home near this city of the Old South, Allen held a Western-themed fundraiser called a "hoedown." Those who gave $50 were dubbed "Ranch Hands." Those who gave more than $1,000 earned titles such as "Buckaroo," "Cow Boss" or "Ranch Boss." Those who gave $10,000 or more to the Republican cause earned the title "El Ranchero Grande." In Allen's worldview, there is no greater compliment.

Critics say the would-be cowboy hasn't quite earned his spurs. They call it the tired political shtick of a 54-year-old Republican senator whose reelection is in jeopardy.

But former Allen chief of staff Jay Timmons said the image is genuine, born of a fascination Allen developed early in his childhood and even well into his teenage years in the 1960s.

"That was an age of long hair and the Beatles and wayward souls. Everybody was anti-establishment," said Timmons, a Washington lobbyist who is one of Allen's closest friends. "He was not somebody who was part of a pack. He did his own thing. He was clearly searching for an identity that he could connect with."

For Allen, who uses Copenhagen and wears leather cowboy boots with his blue suits, being a cowboy means dressing and acting the part.

"He connected with that at an early age," Timmons said. "It's because of that self-reliant mentality of the Old West, the pioneering spirit. That all appeals to him."

At the soggy hoedown, about 500 folks gathered under tents at the home in Goochland County along the James River. Many wore the requisite cowboy hats. A 10-foot-tall pair of brown cowboy boots greeted them as they arrived. A four-man old-time band played as the crowd munched on barbecue chicken, coleslaw, baked beans and chocolate-chip cookies.

"As far as I'm concerned, cowboy values are the best values," said Elliott Curzon, 51, a lawyer from Alexandria who called himself a huge Allen fan. "They're American values. They're gentle, but they're tough when they need to be."

The evening's featured speaker was conservative author Laura Ingraham. But the donors were there to see Allen and help him get reelected. Dressed in a white shirt, black bolo tie and tan cowboy hat, Allen promised victory.

"Are y'all ready to win one month from today? This is victory weather!" Allen roared. If voters choose based on issues, he vowed, "we will win."

On Nov. 7, Allen will follow his custom and wear cowboy boots when he goes to the polls to vote. This time, he is in a tight race against a candidate who has his own meaningful footwear. Democratic nominee James Webb, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, wears combat boots in recognition of his son's deployment to Iraq with the Marines and to symbolize his own opposition to the war there.

Allen's detractors mock the cowboy image as an act dreamed up by an ambitious surfer boy from California to appeal to rural voters in Virginia. To them, it screams phony.

"With all due respect, I know cowboys," said Steve Jarding, who was raised in South Dakota and is now a senior Webb adviser. "I grew up with cowboys. I have nephews who bull ride. I'm sorry, George, you're not a cowboy."

To Jarding, Allen's penchant for cowboy boots and a wad of snuff is as contrived as Billy Crystal's character in the faux-cowboy movie "City Slickers."

"I put on a Superman outfit for Halloween," Jarding said. "It didn't make me a superhero."

Allen declined to be interviewed for this article. But people who know him well say he came under the spell of TV westerns while growing up in a fancy Southern California suburb. His sister, Jennifer, wrote in a memoir that Allen often dressed "like a character on 'Hee Haw' -- cowboy hat, flannel shirt, blue jeans and boots."

His favorite series, according to friends, was the shoot-'em-up classic "Gunsmoke." His brothers nicknamed him "Festus" after a character on the show who was an illiterate deputy marshal in Dodge City.

As a law student, Allen summered twice at a cattle ranch in Winnemucca, Nev., while many of his peers clerked for judges or toiled over briefs at law firms. He roped cattle for a cow boss named Joe Brown. Later, he tried to invite Brown to his gubernatorial inauguration, only to learn he had died.

His law office in Charlottesville was festooned with Western paraphernalia: a saloon sign, lassos, a saddle, a stuffed armadillo and a cowhide rug. One of the items he displayed -- a hangman's noose -- later caused him trouble. Adversaries accused him of displaying a symbol of lynching as part of a pattern of insensitivity toward minorities.

Even today, one room in his Fairfax County house is dedicated to Western memorabilia.

"He's been that way for years. He's been enamored with that since he was a kid," said Chris LaCivita, a consultant who managed Allen's 2000 Senate campaign. "This is not new to a lot of people. What's being done, it's being repackaged in a negative light to assault the guy's character."

In 1979, during his first run for the House of Delegates, consultants told Allen to wear wingtips. He did, and he lost. Thereafter, he vowed to ditch the executive-style footwear.

In 1982, wearing boots and riding in a battered pickup truck, he ran again and won. He hasn't lost since.

Allen held his first hoedown in 1994 when he took office as governor. The next year, it became one of his featured fundraisers. Buttoned-down donors would shed their neckties, open their collars and arrive in stiff blue jeans and recently purchased cowboy hats and boots.

The event has remained an Allen staple even as Virginia has become more urbane, more ethnically diverse and -- some say -- less hospitable to a senator who styles himself a cowboy. In Fairfax, the state's largest jurisdiction, a quarter of the population is foreign-born. Loudoun County is diversifying, with white residents now accounting for 74 percent of the population, down from nearly 83 percent in 2000. The Latino population in Prince William County has more than doubled in the past six years, census figures show.

The Allen campaign says he has garnered plenty of minority support. For example, a group called the Latino Coalition endorsed him Monday. But some minority voters panned the image of Allen on horseback at the Buena Vista Labor Day parade.

Jarding, who last summer mocked Allen's time in Nevada at "a dude ranch," said he thinks voters will put Allen out to pasture.

"He may have wanted to be a cowboy, but there weren't a lot of cowboys on Santa Monica Boulevard," he said.

Allen's advisers say the senator is unlikely to alter his persona.

"He's the kind of person who relates to the old Western way of doing things, where you have a lot of self-responsibility and you have to do things on your own and you can't rely on others." Timmons said. "He is not somebody who is going to change who he is to suit some fad."

Senate Hopefuls In Tenn. Square Off (AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0078280

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) -- Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker on Saturday called his Democratic opponent, Harold Ford Jr., a member of a family engaged in "machine-type politics," while Ford accused Corker of doing nothing about illegal immigrants working on his job site years ago.

Ford, a Memphis congressman who would be the first black U.S. senator from the South since Reconstruction, and Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, are vying to replace Bill Frist, the Republican Senate majority leader, who is retiring. The Nov. 7 election's outcome could determine whether Democrats can take control of the Senate.

In the first of three scheduled debates, Corker said it is unusual that a Ford has held the 9th District congressional seat for more than three decades and noted that the Ford family has long been active in area politics.

"Let me be clear: I love them," Ford said of his family. But he urged Corker to stick to the debate.

Corker has previously shied away from bringing up the Ford family history. Over the years, members of Ford's family have won numerous local elections in Memphis and won seats in Congress and the state Legislature.

Ford's uncle is awaiting trial on federal bribery charges, and his father once was indicted in a federal bank fraud case but was acquitted.

"I'm making an observation that it's pretty much a family business, and I think it's something we all see and know ... that there's a sort of machine-type politics that takes place," Corker said.

Ford responded: "There's too much joy in my heart to respond to that, so I'll let it go."

After the debate Ford said Corker's comments about his family show a desperate campaign "grasping" for issues to bring up against him.

Both candidates said they want to control government spending, clamp down on illegal immigration and reduce the country's dependence on foreign oil.

But Ford charged that Corker -- who ran a construction company before becoming mayor -- did nothing after illegal immigrants were found to be working on a Memphis construction site he was developing in 1988.

"My question is, when you learned there were illegals on the site, why didn't you fire the subcontractor?" Ford asked Corker, who did not have an opportunity to respond during the debate.

Corker noted afterward that his company cooperated with federal immigration officials.

During the debate, Corker criticized Ford's votes against a ban on a type of late-term abortion, a position that Ford said he has since changed.

"You flipped-flopped on abortion also," Ford said to Corker. "You were for abortion before you ran the last time, and now you're against it."

During an earlier run for Senate in 1994, Corker said government shouldn't be involved in the issue.

"I was wrong in 1994," Corker said Saturday. "I didn't understand the issue in a proper way. It was the first time I ran for public office."

Ford has said he backs upholding the "law of the land" that grants a woman the right to an abortion.

Democrat Ford Wages A Conservative Campaign In His Senate Bid (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 7, 2006

CAMDEN, Tenn. - No one knows if God is paying much attention to the U.S. Senate race in Tennessee. But the Senate race is paying a lot of attention to God.

The latest and perhaps most revealing battle in the clash for control of the Senate seat here hinges on a campaign commercial shot in a church by Rep. Harold Ford Jr., the Democrat seeking the Republican-held seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Bill Frist.

"Here," Ford says in the ad, walking down a church aisle before sitting in a pew and ripping into his opponent, "I learned the difference between right and wrong."

Not well enough, counter the Republicans.

"What kind of man parties with Playboy Playmates in lingerie, then films political ads in a church pew?" asks an ad aired by the National Republican Senatorial Committee, referring to Ford's attendance at a Playboy magazine Super Bowl party.

The skirmish over Ford's place in church underscores a central theme in the campaign: whether Ford is culturally and politically conservative enough to win over rural white voters and become the first Democrat elected from the state in 16 years - and the first black ever popularly elected from the South.

If Ford can win the Republican seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, he would help his party along the way to the six-seat gain it needs to win control. More than that, a Ford victory would signal that Democrats could win again in the South, where it has been losing both Senate seats and presidential elections.

"We're 33 days away and I can taste it," Ford said during a campaign stop in Camden.

Polls show the race a tossup between Ford and Republican Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga. Ford has the support of more than 90 percent of the state's blacks, and solid support around his Memphis base. But he trails among whites, and polls often miss hidden bias against black candidates that could mean he trails among whites by a larger margin.

To be elected, he needs to win and hold the center.

"They say I don't look like you, but I share your values," he said to applause from more than 200 rural white voters crowded into a Camden restaurant called the Catfish Place.

He lauded Ronald Reagan, bragged of his support for gun rights, balanced budgets, the Patriot Act and the war in Iraq, and constantly illustrated political points with references to church, the Bible and God. His cowboy boots, farm co-op baseball hat and generous use of "y'all" belie his East Coast, prep school upbringing.

As if to underscore which audience he's trying to reach, Ford brushed aside a reporter from National Public Radio to give an extended interview after his Camden events to the Christian Broadcasting Network.

In a later interview, Ford said his biggest challenge is the image of the national Democratic Party.

"There is a national perception of the Democratic Party that they are out of touch on moral and cultural issues, they're unable to protect and defend the country," he said. "I think that perception is wrong, and clearly we are making progress in overcoming it."

But he never stops working at it.

He even acknowledged supporting President Bush on some issues.

"When he said let's go take down the terrorists in Afghanistan, I sided with him," he tell crowds. "When he said it was right to give our intelligence officers more tools to make sure they can find those who are doing harm to us in this country, I said, Yes, sir. And when he said I want to remove Saddam Hussein, I wish he had a plan, but I said, Yes, sir, I'll go with you."

Of his attendance at Playboy magazine's Super Bowl Party, the bachelor tells audiences to laughter, "I got to admit, I do like girls."

Said Buck Carter, a county highway superintendent in Camden: "In this part of the world, that's not a negative. Guys around here would rather have gone with him."

He also raises the potentially troubling subject of his family. His father, a former congressman, was acquitted of corruption charges in 1993. His uncle, a state senator, faces trial this fall on corruption charges.

"I love my family," Ford told supporters. "There is nothing anybody can say or do that will bring any distance between any member of my family and me."

Ford accuses Republicans of trying to use "code words" to remind voters that he is black.

"They talk abut how different I am from you. And they got all these mail pieces going out all over the state, saying Harold Ford's not one of you," he said. "I know what he's really trying to say, and you do, too."

He also accused Republicans of altering a photo of him to make him appear darker. Ford is fair skinned.

Corker did not respond to repeated requests for an interview. But Chris Devaney, executive director of the Tennessee Republican Party, said the photograph of Ford was not altered.

He also said that Ford has a more liberal voting record than he admits. The National Journal last year gave him a rating of 58 percent, with 0 being the most conservative and 100 being the most liberal.

"To get elected in this state, you have to have conservative values," he said. "When you look at his record, he clearly isn't."

Senate Debate In New Jersey: War Of Words (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

Each accused the other of being a liar, their voices often rising. They interrupted each other constantly, making it almost impossible at times to hear what was being said. The tone was so combative that it almost seemed as if the two men, who appeared uncomfortable standing only inches apart, might have been one personal insult away from a World Cup-style head butt.

For anyone who has missed the campaign commercials or news media coverage about the race for the United States Senate in New Jersey, the fractious debate yesterday between Senator Robert Menendez and State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. may have come across as a piece of shockingly raw theater. But in both tone and substance, the one-hour session provided a concise summary of the campaign.

There was Mr. Kean, a 38-year-old Republican who is the scion of a storied political family, managing to turn every question, whether about health care or personal foibles, into an opportunity to invoke the key theme of his candidacy: that Mr. Menendez, a veteran of the Darwinian world of Hudson County politics, is a political boss without a moral compass who is saddled with corrupt associates.

"I'm saying that when people look at Bob Menendez's background, all too frequently they need to go to jail," Mr. Kean said. "That's where 37 of Bob Menendez's friends and contributors are."

And there was Mr. Menendez, the 52-year-old Democrat and veteran of Congress who was appointed to serve the last year of Gov. Jon S. Corzine's term, reciprocating by repeating, time and again, one of his key contentions: that Mr. Kean is a partisan Republican who supports the policies, and is beholden to the fund-raising machine of President Bush, whose approval ratings are in the low 30's in the state.

"I think that my opponent basically supports the president across the board," Mr. Menendez said. "He has been relatively supportive and silent for six years. You can't change that in six weeks."

With just a few quiet exceptions, overshadowing it all was the vitriolic way the two men delivered their messages, reinforcing the reasons why the race is considered one of the tightest, nastiest and most closely scrutinized in the country this year.

"It's hard to be lectured on ethics by an individual who's under federal criminal investigation," Mr. Kean said early in the debate.

"That's an absolute lie on your part," Mr. Menendez fired back.

The one-hour debate, sponsored by the CBS affiliates in Manhattan and Philadelphia and The New York Times, was taped yesterday at the studios of WCBS in Manhattan, and was to be broadcast at 8 this morning in New York and Philadelphia.

It was not the candidates' first sparring match; they debated twice in June, shortly after each won his primary. But it may be the last televised one, considering that Mr. Kean last week pulled out of a debate scheduled for next weekend. (There is also a live radio debate scheduled for Oct. 17 on WKXW, 101.5 FM.)

With the election one month away, both sides acknowledged that the stakes were particularly high, as whoever wins in New Jersey could play a major role in determining which party controls the Senate.

Even though New Jersey has been solidly Democratic in recent statewide elections, and has not elected a Republican to the United States Senate since 1972, Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean have been in a virtual dead heat for months. In the most recent poll last week, from Fairleigh Dickinson University, Mr. Menendez had a lead of 5 percentage points, 42 to 37, in a survey of 514 probable voters, with a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

During the debate, there were no obvious gaffes, no moments of embarrassment. But there were plenty of memorable exchanges.

At one point, the candidates were asked to grade Mr. Bush.

Mr. Menendez rated the administration between a D and an F, he said, for its handling of the war in Iraq and its amassing of trillions of dollars in debt.

Mr. Kean — who on Friday became the first major Republican candidate to call for the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, to resign in the aftermath of the Mark Foley scandal — first expressed frustration with Mr. Bush on the war and stem cell research, but then awarded him a B-minus.

The two candidates also jousted with each other, and with the panel of three journalists, over the tone of their television commercials.

When asked whether they regretted the negative nature of the commercials — including one for Mr. Menendez that linked Mr. Kean to a jailed Hudson County Democrat whom Mr. Kean's campaign had contacted in hopes of sullying Mr. Menendez's image — neither man disavowed his tactics.

"I'm proud of my campaign," Mr. Kean said on two occasions.

Mr. Menendez said his first three commercials were substantive, touching on issues like port security and his record in fighting corruption in Union City and opposing the war in Iraq. He added: "I regret that I have to respond to Tom Kean's vicious attacks."

One of the testier moments came when Mr. Menendez was asked about reports that a longtime friend, Donald Scarinci, had been overheard asking a psychiatrist who had $1 million in Hudson County contracts to hire one of Mr. Menendez's political patrons or risk losing the contracts.

Mr. Menendez distanced himself from Mr. Scarinci, saying he was no longer involved in the campaign. He then repeated his contention that Mr. Kean had tried to "shake down" corporations, receiving tens of thousands of dollars in contributions from members of corporate boards on which his father, former Gov. Thomas H. Kean Sr., served.

"I am tired of Bob Menendez attacking my family," said Mr. Kean, whose father, twin brother, wife and two daughters were with him yesterday. "That's what you're doing, Bob."

"I'm not attacking your family," responded Mr. Menendez, whose two grown children attended the event. "I'm talking about you."

"No, you're not, Bob," Mr. Kean retorted.

"I'm talking about you," Mr. Menendez continued. "Your judgment and your ethics."

"How would I — how in the world would I shake somebody down, Bob?" Mr. Kean said. "That is absurd!"

As the two were trying to talk over each other, Mr. Menendez accused Mr. Kean of rebuffing a request that he meet with families of soldiers fighting in Iraq. "You didn't even have the dignity of answering" the families, Mr. Menendez said.

"Oh, come on, Bob," Mr. Kean responded. "Let's be real."

To end the debate, the moderator, Jim Rosenfield of WCBS-TV in New York, asked the most personal question of the session: what each candidate saw as his biggest mistake.

Mr. Menendez said his biggest mistake had been voting for Mr. Bush's No Child Left Behind education law, which he said he had supported because he trusted that the president would back it up with financing.

Mr. Kean began by saying that he did not spend as much time with his wife and daughters as he would like, but then talked about the importance of rooting out corruption in government.

In a sign of the debate's importance, leading figures in each party showed up in the studios. For the Democrats, it was Mr. Corzine and Representative Robert E. Andrews of Camden County. For the Republicans, it was Mr. Kean's father.

An hour before the debate, as Mr. Corzine was leaving an elevator, he bumped into the elder Mr. Kean. The two exchanged pleasantries, and Mr. Corzine said he looked forward to the conclusion of the debates — and, presumably, to an end to the nastiness of the campaign.

Mr. Kean did not disagree.

A Show Of Hostility For Menendez And Kean (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

For weeks now State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. has claimed that his opponent Senator Robert Menendez is under federal investigation. So it was no surprise that he said it again in his very first response during the candidates' third debate yesterday.

Asked about the House scandal involving former Representative Mark Foley, Mr. Kean said Congress's ethics committees need to be revamped, then sneaked in the aside: "I mean, I've got an opponent who is under federal criminal investigation."

"That is absolutely untrue," a finger-wagging Mr. Menendez cut in.

So began a debate marked as much by unproven accusations and overstatement as by hostility. A close look shows how each candidate yesterday used small factual kernels to make sweeping claims that are hard to prove or disprove.

Most notable among the arguable claims was the question of a federal probe into an anti-poverty agency, the North Hudson Community Action Corporation, and Senator Menendez's role in it.

While it is true that Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, did subpoena records from the nonprofit agency last month, there have been no reports or statements from federal prosecutors indicating that Mr. Menendez is under criminal investigation, as Mr. Kean claimed repeatedly yesterday.

The nonprofit agency paid more than $320,000 to lease a building in Union City from Mr. Menendez for nearly a decade while he helped it secure millions in federal grants as a member of Congress. Mr. Menendez has said the rent, starting at $3,100 a month and ending at $3,400 a month, was comparable to market rates at the time, a claim supported by a real estate broker quoted in a 1996 Jersey Journal article examining the lease deal.

In that same article, Mr. Menendez said the lease deal was verbally approved by Ellen Weintraub, a lawyer at the time for the House Ethics Committee. Ms. Weintraub, who now serves on the Federal Election Commission, told The New York Times recently that she did not remember Mr. Menendez asking her about the deal but did not dispute that she might have cleared it.

"I'm not aware of any rule in effect then or now that would have prohibited a member of Congress from renting his property to an entity that receives federal funding," she said.

When news of the subpoenas broke last month, Mr. Menendez told ABC's George Stephanopoulos that he welcomed the investigation, "and we look forward to its successful conclusion." Mr. Menendez has also said the timing of Mr. Christie's subpoena appeared politically motivated.

Mr. Kean pointed to those statements yesterday as evidence of an investigation. But since his Sept. 24 appearance on ABC News' "This Week," Mr. Menendez repeatedly has said that he is not under investigation, and that none of his personal banking or financial records have been requested. He told reporters yesterday that his comments to Mr. Stephanopoulos were made "off the top of my mind."

Asked about the North Hudson subpoenas after the debate, Mr. Menendez responded:

"There is constantly an effort to subpoena documents to get information, and then you make a conclusion of whether or not an investigation is even worth pursuing. It's far less than a criminal investigation, come on."

Throughout the frenzied debate, during which the candidates frequently cut each other off and strayed from the questions, both men continued to hurl questionable allegations of ethical lapses at each other.

"On the same day that you received thousands of dollars of contributions from one of the state's largest insurance companies, you gave them a vote that gave them a $40 million tax loophole," Mr. Menendez said, referring to a 2005 vote Mr. Kean made to maintain a tax exemption for the Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield health insurance companies after he received thousands in contributions from company executives and their families.

But Mr. Kean's vote was hardly pivotal; he voted with his party, and the exemption was killed in the Democratic-controlled Senate. Company officials and Kean's campaign have said that the contributions had no influence on Mr. Kean's vote.

Mr. Menendez went on to criticize Mr. Kean based on an article published yesterday in the Star-Ledger that said the state senator had accepted $213,025 in donations, both in his state and federal campaigns, from employees of firms who do business with the state government. Mr. Kean has proposed legislation that would have banned such contributions to candidates for state office.

"First and foremost," Mr. Kean responded. "It's hard to be lectured on ethics by an individual who's under federal criminal investigation — — "

"I'm not, Tom, stop saying that," Mr. Menendez replied.

Mr. Kean told reporters after the debate that until the law is changed, it is perfectly legal to accept such contributions.

Mr. Menendez also accused Mr. Kean of trying to "shake down" a corporation for contributions. He was referring to a report in the Wall Street Journal of a fund-raiser Mr. Kean held in Minnesota with executives of UnitedHealth Group on the same day his father, former Gov. Tom Kean Sr., who sat on the board of directors, was meeting with other directors to discuss possible irregularities with stock options given to top executives.

The company is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the implication was that the donations could be seen as an attempt to influence a witness because the elder Mr. Kean sat on the board's compensation committee.

Mr. Kean accused Mr. Menendez of attacking his father and added, "How in the world would I shake somebody down, Bob? That is absurd."

On the topic of stem-cell research, which both candidates say they support, Mr. Kean said he voted for research financing in the state assembly. Mr. Menendez quickly responded that his opponent voted against it six times. But three of the votes involved research money that was embedded in omnibus state budget bills that Mr. Kean and most of his fellow Republicans voted against. He said he did not like how the other three bills, which involved research facilities, were being financed. Mr. Kean has also gone further than most Republicans in saying that he supports embryonic stem-cell research.

Mr. Menendez also accused Mr. Kean of quitting the powerful State Senate budget committee earlier this year to avoid controversial votes that could haunt him in his bid for United States Senate. Mr. Kean's campaign has said that he left the committee solely to devote more time to the campaign.

Senate Hopefuls Debate Bush Ties, Federal Inquiry (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 8, 2006

NEW YORK -- Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez denied he is under federal investigation, while Republican challenger Thomas H. Kean Jr. rated the Bush administration a "B-minus" during a combative debate yesterday between New Jersey's two U.S. Senate candidates.

The hourlong debate, in which the two men often spoke over each other so loudly that it was difficult to hear what either was saying, showcased an intense contest marked by corruption charges.

Democrats usually win easily in New Jersey, but corruption charges against Mr. Menendez have the party fighting to keep the Senate seat.

"There is no such federal criminal investigation," Mr. Menendez said when asked to respond to an ad by Mr. Kean's camp.

Mr. Menendez said repeatedly that Mr. Kean is in agreement with President Bush and out of touch with state voters.

"When you're wrong on the war in Iraq, when you're wrong on privatizing Social Security ... then you have to play the politics of smear and personal destruction," he said.

Federal investigators are examining a rental deal in which a nonprofit group received millions of dollars in federal funding while Mr. Menendez was a House member, the Star-Ledger reported last month.

"The voters of the state deserve to know that they've got a senator under federal criminal investigation," Mr. Kean said during the debate, which was sponsored by New York and New Jersey CBS affiliates and the New York Times.

Mr. Kean pledged to bring a higher ethical standard to state politics. "We've had our state be the butt of jokes on David Letterman and Jay Leno," he said.

Mr. Menendez told reporters after the debate that a subpoena for records doesn't mean federal authorities are investigating him.

A Menendez ad says the Kean campaign consulted with a convicted felon, and the Democrat yesterday referenced a report in the Star-Ledger article that said Mr. Kean accepted thousands of dollars in contributions from state contractors even though, as a state senator, he introduced a bill two years ago to ban political candidates from receiving such donations.

Mr. Menendez and Mr. Kean have been at a virtual tie in the race, but two recent polls gave Mr. Menendez a slight edge.

When asked yesterday to rate the Bush administration, Mr. Kean answered "B-minus." The Republican has distanced himself from the president throughout his campaign.

He made headlines last week by calling for the resignation House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert over the Illinois Republican's handling of the scandal involving lurid messages sent by former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, to a male teenager who was a former page.

"There's things I've been frustrated by," Mr. Kean said. He said he disagrees with Mr. Bush on stem-cell research, energy policy, the environment and spending but supports Mr. Bush's approach to tax cuts and fighting terrorism.

Democrats said Mr. Kean's B-minus rating proves he supports the president.

"B-minus makes the honor roll," said Rep. Robert E. Andrews, a New Jersey Democrat who attended the debate. "I think that Tom Kean made our case for us today, convincingly."

N.J. Senate Hopefuls Face Off In Debate (AP)

By Angela Delli Santi, Associated Press Writer

The Associated Press, October 7, 2006

New Jersey's two Senate hopefuls faced off Saturday in an hourlong exchange characterized more by a lack of civility than the dialogue on issues they had said they wanted.

Sen. Robert Menendez and state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. repeatedly attacked each other during their first meeting of the fall, with Menendez frequently waving his index finger for emphasis and Kean cutting off his opponent in mid-sentence.

Both men relied on familiar lines of attack in the increasingly contentious and closely watched contest for a full six-year Senate term. The race could affect whether Democrats can take control of the U.S. Senate.

Kean, a Republican, has made ethics a centerpiece of his campaign and has tried to tie Menendez to the Democratic machine politics of rough-and-tumble Hudson County, N.J.

Menendez has sought from the beginning to link Kean to the unpopular policies of the Bush administration, most notably the war in Iraq.

When asked to grade the Bush administration, Kean gave the president a B-minus. But he said he disagreed with Bush on several issues, including environmental and energy policies. Kean said he also supports stem cell research.

Kean has said he supported the president's decision to wage war in Iraq, though he believes mistakes have been made and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld should be fired.

Menendez, who voted against the resolution authorizing the Iraq invasion, said he would give Bush a grade of D or F.

Kean Jr. hammered away at Menendez's supposed ethical lapses, repeatedly saying he is under federal criminal investigation on suspicion of renting a building he owned to an anti-poverty organization that receives federal funds.

Menendez acknowledges that federal investigators have issued subpoenas in the lease deal but denies that he is under investigation.

Asked to defend a similarly themed campaign commercial, Kean said he had an obligation to tell voters about his opponent's character.

Menendez was also asked to defend a negative commercial for his campaign, in which he portrays a Kean campaign researcher as befriending a convicted felon in order to dig up dirt on him. Menendez said he made the commercial to dispel the accusations against him and pointed out that he made three positive ads before going negative.

Moderator Jim Rosenfield told both candidates that media reports have accused them of engaging in a smear campaign. Kean said, "I'm proud of my campaign," and Menendez said, "I regret that I have to respond to Tom Kean Jr.'s vicious attacks."

Menendez is considered the incumbent, having been appointed by Gov. Jon S. Corzine to fill the remainder of his term last year. Kean hopes to be New Jersey's first Republican senator in 30 years.

A Fairleigh Dickinson-Public Mind survey out Thursday showed Menendez with a slight edge. There are more Democrats than Republicans in New Jersey, but independent voters far outnumber those registered with either party. Menendez had raised $7.39 million for his campaign, according to the latest filings, while Kean had $2.25 million.

The candidates next meet on Oct. 17 for a one-hour live radio debate.

Saturday's taped debate will be broadcast in New Jersey, New York and Philadelphia on CBS stations at 8 a.m. Sunday.

Democrat Poised To Become First Muslim In Congress (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS — Keith Ellison, the Democratic candidate for Congress here, strode among the stalls of exotically printed fabric, telephone cards and sweet tea at a Somali mall, shaking hands with his fellow Muslims.

"The community showed up big!" Mr. Ellison, 43, said, dispensing hugs as he thanked the many immigrant Somalis whose votes had helped him beat six other candidates in a primary race in September.

Mr. Ellison, a stocky criminal defense lawyer who converted to Islam in college, is expected by experts to make history on Election Day by becoming the first Muslim elected to Congress, as well as the first black representative from Minnesota.

"If he wins, he will take the oath of office on a Koran," Ali Ahmed, a social services worker, said as he wandered through the Karmel Square mall, a popular shopping and social destination for Somali immigrants.

"Our main concern is that Muslims are treated differently from Christians," Mr. Ahmed said. "So he can show that we are all the same people."

The Fifth Congressional District is a Democratic citadel. The last Republican to represent it lost re-election in 1962.

Mr. Ellison's Republican opponent, Alan Fine, has made a concerted effort to discredit him for previous ties to the Nation of Islam, the radical group founded by Louis Farrakhan, but experts do not expect Mr. Fine to pose a serious challenge.

Though Mr. Ellison usually mentions his faith on the campaign trail only when asked, his candidacy has amounted to something of a political awakening among Muslims tired of being vilified since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

"They were resistant to voting because a lot of them thought it wouldn't make a difference," said Abdisalam Adam, the director of a Somali cultural center who helped send scores of volunteers door to door to bring out voters in the primary. "This is the first time we saw people get excited and identify with the issues."

Mr. Ellison's progressive positions, including support for universal health coverage, raising the minimum wage and withdrawing the troops from Iraq, cemented his appeal among a broad swath of Democrats in this liberal district.

But political analysts and community organizers say African-Americans and Muslim immigrants here secured Mr. Ellison's 7,000-vote margin on Sept. 12.

"This is the way we build political power," Mr. Ellison told supporters. "They can't ignore us anymore when we show up to vote."

There are far larger communities of Muslims in the United States, with the overall population estimates ranging from three million to more than six million American Muslims. But few other Congressional districts have such a high concentration.

Somalis started arriving here in 1993 as refugees fleeing the civil war in their country. Their number has grown to 120,000, with one-fourth in the Fifth District, Mr. Adam said. He estimated that 80 percent of the Somalis who voted in the primary cast ballots for the first time. "The Somali community is probably the least educated and the least organized in terms of having any experience with democracy," he said.

Mr. Ellison brushes off the idea that he was motivated to run for Congress to become the first Muslim or first black from Minnesota. Rather it was to change policy, he said, to fight in the manner of the beloved Senator Paul Wellstone against a Republican administration that marginalized the poor and minorities.

Energizing black Muslims or immigrants, Mr. Ellison said, is a side benefit. "I've never sat down and said, 'Gee I'm going to be the first,' " he said, "It holds no magic for me."

He does concede a certain element of breaking ground.

"Any ethnic or religious group that is new to American politics is going to go through trouble," he said, reaching next to his office desk to open a book called "Jews in American Politics."

He read aloud a passage about how Jews were vilified and blocked from political office until their expertise in various fields proved crucial to the New Deal.

"It's going to be the same way for Muslims," he said. "It is just going to take a while."

DOJ_NMG_0078287

The campaign has been an indication of the hurdles ahead. The primary turned nasty in May, after Mr. Ellison won the endorsement from the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party, as the Democrats are known here.

The press and Republican blogs like MinnesotaDemocratsExposed.com unearthed problems from Mr. Ellison's past. They included late filings of income taxes and campaign finance reports, plus a raft of unpaid moving violations and parking tickets that led to a suspended driver's license.

Most damaging were newspaper columns that he wrote under the pen name Keith E. Hakim in 1989 and 1990, when Mr. Ellison was a law student at the University of Minnesota. One explosive column defended Mr. Farrakhan against accusations of racism. Conservatives accused Mr. Ellison of having been a local leader for the radical group.

Mr. Ellison quickly apologized for past mistakes. He said repeatedly, including in a local synagogue, that he was distantly affiliated with the Nation of Islam for 18 months while helping to organize the Minnesota delegation to the Million Man March in Washington in 1995.

He said he saw the march as a way to promote personal responsibility and economic development but said he later found it pointless.

He also sent a letter to the Jewish Community Relations Council in Minneapolis, repudiating Mr. Farrakhan and his supporters as anti-Semitic.

Mr. Ellison prevailed in the primary despite the controversy because "he had intense, loyal supporters who are not going to be chased off," said Lawrence Jacobs, director of the Center for the Study of Politics and Governance at the Humphrey Institute at the University of Minnesota.

Mr. Fine, the Republican candidate, has reignited the fight.

"I'm extremely concerned about Keith Ellison, Keith Hakim, Keith X Ellison, Keith Ellison Muhammad," Mr. Fine said at a news conference after Mr. Ellison's victory in the primary, mocking pseudonyms that Mr. Ellison used in college.

Mr. Fine has repeatedly accused Mr. Ellison of being a follower of Mr. Farrakhan and of being backed by a Muslim lobbying organization that Mr. Fine said supported terrorism.

"I'm personally offended as a Jew that we have a candidate like this running for U.S. Congress," Mr. Fine said at the news conference.

Some Jews applauded Mr. Fine. Others said they were appalled by what they heard as inflammatory remarks. An older brother of Mr. Fine, Robert Fine, a lawyer, called Mr. Ellison to disassociate himself from the attack.

The Republican, a 44-year-old management lecturer at the Carleton School of Management, has been trying to clarify his remarks.

"This has nothing to do with his being a Muslim, this has nothing to do with his being black," Mr. Fine said in an interview in a coffee shop that serves as his campaign headquarters. "This is about someone who supports people who hate. That is why he is unqualified for Congress."

Mr. Ellison was raised a Roman Catholic in Detroit, converting to Islam as a 19-year-old sophomore at Wayne State University. He refuses to discuss publicly his reasons, stating in snippets of interviews between campaign stops: "I don't remember any grand epiphany. I saw no vision, no lightning on the road to Damascus."

He lives in north Minneapolis, one of the highest crime areas in the city, with his wife, Kim, a high school mathematics teacher, and their four children.

He said he had never met Mr. Farrakhan, but conceded that as a young man he was more taken with the message of social empowerment and figured that the accusations of anti-Semitism were just the usual slur against any black leader.

"It's amazing," Mr. Ellison said, "that people naturally assume that there would not be a measure of anger and frustration in the black community" over their history of exploitation here.

Control Of The Governors' Mansions In Play (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Democrats need to gain four seats to achieve a national majority. Fewer than a dozen appear truly up for grabs in November, experts say.

For the first time since the 1994 Republican landslide, Democrats are poised to attain a majority of the nation's governorships, an important political toehold regardless of who wins the battle to control Congress.

Election handicappers forecast Democratic gains of four to eight seats out of the 36 on the Nov. 7 ballot, with the Republican-held governor's chairs in New York and Ohio considered most likely to switch parties. The Democrats need to gain four governorships for a national majority.

DOJ_NMG_0078288

Massachusetts, Arkansas, Colorado and Maryland also look promising for Democratic candidates, according to campaign analysts. In Massachusetts — the land of Kennedys — a win would put a Democratic governor under the gold Capitol dome for the first time in more than a dozen years.

Four seats appear to be tossups: Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa and Michigan, all states that could prove vital in the 2008 presidential campaign. All but Minnesota have Democratic governors now.

Overall, "I think the Democrats have to be more optimistic about their chances," said elections analyst Tim Storey of the National Conference of State Legislatures. "The way polls show it, Democrats are definitely going to make gains."

As with the state-by-state congressional struggle, factors shaping individual gubernatorial contests vary. In Michigan, it is the state's sagging economy. In Wisconsin, it is government ethics. In Minnesota, it is education and healthcare. In Iowa, it is a grab bag of issues, including immigration.

But more broadly, the voter pessimism that has Republicans fighting to keep control of the House and Senate is hurting the GOP at a time it has to defend far more governors' seats than Democrats do.

"Because Republicans have all this exposure, you've got to draw some connections to what is going on nationally," said Jennifer Duffy, who analyzes gubernatorial contests for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Another problem facing the GOP is longevity: Republicans have been governor for eight or more years in several of the states with midterm elections, and voters often show an inclination to switch party control after such a period.

"It's hard to run a state," said Stuart Rothenberg, an independent election analyst in Washington. "You have to make some tough calls. You're going to make enemies. So there's kind of a normal rotation we don't see in the House and Senate."

Democrats have one other factor going their way: Nine Republican-held seats are open — meaning no incumbent is running, so the seat is more competitive — as opposed to just one open Democratic seat, in Iowa.

There are bright spots for the GOP. Three of the four most populous states — Texas; Florida; and California, where Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides is challenging Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger — seem likely to stay in Republican hands, according to opinion polls and political experts.

Each party has its election-day wish list. Democrats talk of the chance to pick up an open seat in Nevada; to stage an upset in Florida, where Republican Jeb Bush is stepping down; and to knock off the GOP incumbent in Democratic-leaning Rhode Island, where a hot U.S. Senate race could turn out loyalists. Republicans are talking about possible pickups in Oregon, where Gov. Ted Kulongoski finished with a less-than-impressive 54% in May's Democratic primary; and Illinois, where Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich seeks reelection but has been dogged by ethics allegations.

But most analysts say that, barring surprises, fewer than a dozen seats appear truly up for grabs.

According to Republican Governors Assn. Executive Director Phil Musser: "There's no question we're facing a bit of a head wind. The national mood ain't great."

Although the scandal surrounding recently resigned Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has complicated GOP efforts, the party's strategists are counting on a superior get-out-the-vote operation, like the efforts that boosted Republican turnout in the last several elections, to stem midterm losses.

More is at stake in the governor's races than mere bragging rights.

With Washington twisted in partisan knots, governors have taken the lead on welfare, healthcare, immigration and the environment, among other issues. Statehouse initiatives have offered blueprints for national legislation, such as federal welfare changes during the Clinton administration.

"That's where the policy innovation is going on: with the governors and legislatures," Storey said.

Statehouses have also been an important presidential proving ground; four of the last five White House occupants had been governors. Bill Clinton was in his fifth term as Arkansas governor when he was elected president in 1992, and George W. Bush won the White House in 2000 during his second term as Texas governor.

For 2008, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Iowa's outgoing Gov. Tom Vilsack and former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner are all exploring bids for the Democratic presidential nomination. Among Republicans, outgoing Govs. George E. Pataki of New York, Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Mike Huckabee of Arkansas are considering running.

And governors who aren't themselves aspirants can boost presidential campaigns — using their clout to help raise money and muster volunteers, serving as state surrogates for the party nominee and amplifying a campaign's message with the gubernatorial megaphone. (Many Democrats are convinced that Bush would never have won the decisive states of Florida in 2000 or Ohio in 2004 if Republican governors hadn't been overseeing those states' elections.)

As Democratic advisor Mark Mellman puts it: Although "there's far from a perfect correlation between holding the governorship and winning a state" in a presidential campaign, nonetheless, "as my grandmother would have said, it certainly can't hurt and in a lot of ways it can help." Mellman is advising the governors of Michigan and Wisconsin in their reelection bids and was a strategist for the 2004 presidential campaign of Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.).

DOJ_NMG_0078289

Governors elected this November also will have a leg up on reelection in 2010, putting them at the center of the political line-drawing that will take place after the next census. That, in turn, could go a long way toward shaping the partisan makeup of Congress for years to come.

Hot races

Fewer than a dozen of the 36 gubernatorial races across the country are truly competitive at this point, election analysts say. Here is a look at six of the hardest-fought contests.

Race

Iowa: State Secretary of State Chet Culver (D) faces Rep. Jim Nussle (R) in a race for an open seat that is viewed as a toss-up.

Background

Culver, son of a former U.S. senator, has a homegrown brand name and is portraying Nussle as a Washington insider. But Culver has been a less-than-nimble campaigner in a race heated up by the abortion and immigration issues.

Race

Massachusetts: Deval Patrick (D) faces

Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey (R) and Christy Mihos (I) for an open seat in a state that leans Democratic.

Background

Patrick, deputy U.S. attorney general under President Clinton, is vying to become the second elected black governor in the nation's history. Healey has the tough task of distancing herself from, but not alienating, outgoing Republican Gov. Mitt Romney.

Race

Michigan: Gov. Jennifer Granholm (D) is in a tight race against Dick DeVos (R).

Background

Michigan's woeful economy has made Granholm, once hailed as a rising national star, highly vulnerable. DeVos, drawing millions from his inherited Amway fortune, has been sharply criticizing her on the TV airwaves since February.

Race

Minnesota: Race between Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R) and Atty. Gen. Mike Hatch (D) is a toss-up.

Background

Voters like Pawlenty, but not his handling of education, healthcare and transportation. Hatch's pugnacious personality may be too much for voters in this famously polite state.

Race

Nevada: In a state that leans Republican, Rep. Jim Gibbons (R) faces state Senate Minority Leader Dina Titus (D) for an open seat.

Background

Gibbons started out as a favorite, but Nevada has been trending Democratic, thanks to its growing Latino population and union muscle. Titus is also benefiting from tensions between Gibbons and outgoing GOP Gov. Kenny Guinn.

Race

Wisconsin: Gov. James Doyle (D) is trying to hold off a challenge from U.S. Rep. Mark Green (R).

Background

Doyle has been plagued by ethics issues. Green is campaigning on the time-for-a-change message that Democrats are using elsewhere. But his Washington return address doesn't help.

It's fun being governor of Montana. Just watch Brian Schweitzer bouncing around the streets of Helena in the passenger seat of the state's official S.U.V., fumbling with wires, trying to stick the flashing police light on the roof. When he spots some legislators on the sidewalk, he blasts them with the siren, then summons them by name on the loudspeaker. The men jump, and the governor tumbles out of the car, doubled in laughter, giving everyone a bear hug or a high-five or a soft slap on the cheek. Schweitzer, a Democrat in his first term, marches into a barroom in blue jeans and cowboy boots and a beaded bolo tie, and his border collie, Jag, leaps out of the vehicle and follows him in. The governor throws back a few pints of the local brew and introduces himself to everyone in the place, down to the servers and a small girl stuck there with her parents. He takes time from the backslapping to poach cubes of cheese from the snack platter and sneak them to the girl, who is now chasing his dog around the bar. "This is how you make friends with Jag," he advises her. "Just hold it in your hand and let him take it."

As soon as Schweitzer was elected in 2004 — the same night that George W. Bush carried Montana by 20 percentage points — pundits began declaring him the future of the Democratic Party. Never mind that it was his first elected office: the 51-year-old farmer and irrigation contractor had folksy charm and true-grit swagger. He shot guns, rode horses, took his dog to work and decimated his opponents with off-the-cuff one-liners heavy on the bull-and-horse metaphors. He didn't act like a Democrat, in other words, and to many Democrats, reeling from consecutive losses to Bush, that seemed like a pretty good thing.

Schweitzer's grandparents were homesteaders who immigrated to Montana from Ireland and Germany. His parents were ranchers who never completed high school. And until 2000, Schweitzer and his wife, Nancy, were farming in Whitefish and raising their three children. And then, despite the fact that he was a virtual unknown in politics, Schweitzer began a quixotic bid to oust Conrad Burns, a two-term incumbent Republican senator. To the surprise of Montana's political class, he came within four percentage points of succeeding. Almost immediately, he began campaigning for what would be an open governor's seat. Even after choosing a Republican as his running mate, he thumped his primary opponent by a 52-point margin, then won the general election by four points.

Within months of his election, bloggers were clamoring for a presidential run, and his popularity transcended the wonk journals to include coronation as "Hot Governor" by Rolling Stone magazine, while "60 Minutes" called him the Coal Cowboy. On camera he persuaded Lesley Stahl to take a whiff from a vial of diesel fuel synthesized from coal — a product that Schweitzer claims will not only fill Montana's coffers but also help end the nation's dependence on foreign oil peddled by "sheiks, rats, crooks, dictators."

Schweitzer's "Montana miracle," in which Democrats took back the governor's seat after 16 years and ended 12 years of Republican majorities in both state chambers, has been cited as evidence that the Republican bastions in the Western states are losing ground to a new, Democratic brand of libertarian-tinged prairie populism. No fewer than four recent books by Democratic strategists have mentioned Schweitzer as the kind of guy Democrats need to win back rural America. A fifth book, Tom Schaller's "Whistling Past Dixie," published earlier this month, also singles out Schweitzer and makes the previously heretical claim that the Democrats' future lies in ignoring the South and embracing the West and Midwest, where voters are less evangelical and more independent.

"He's one of the new stars in the party," Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association, told me recently. "We're highlighting him wherever we can." Indeed, just 54 days into his term, Schweitzer was chosen to deliver the Democrats' weekly radio address, and he has been attracting notice from the party faithful ever since — like when he compared the president to a shifty cattle auctioneer hawking lousy bulls to dubious ranchers.

Six-foot-two and a beefy 205 pounds, Schweitzer has seized the heartland imagery generally monopolized by Republicans. "Schweitzer is the antithesis of the Democrat stereotype," Markos Moulitsas Zuniga, of dailykos.com, the partisan Democratic blog, told me. "Too many Democrats look like targets for the school bully. Schweitzer is a tough guy. And people like guys who will bar-fight their way across a state."

Schweitzer veers right on many economic and social issues: he opposes gun control, favors the death penalty and preaches about lowering taxes and balancing budgets. At the same time, he leans left on some issues that matter to progressives: championing energy conservation and environmental regulation, opposing governmental restrictions on abortion and criticizing free-trade deals. "He's as much a prairie centrist as he is a prairie populist," Bruce Reed of the Democratic Leadership Council told me. Schweitzer has the ability to reduce a complicated issue to a few sharp lines, reframing it with themes of patriotism and underdog know-how. "I was a critic of Nafta, I was a critic of Cafta and I'll be a critic of Shafta," he says of free-trade agreements, long the hobgoblin of even the most articulate liberal politicians. "Why is it that America supposedly creates the best businessmen in the world, but when we go to the table with the third world, we come away losers?"

The Democrats' enthusiasm for their new hero seemed to overlook the fact that the governor of a state as sparsely populated as Montana simply does not wield a lot of national clout. Schweitzer governs fewer than a million people, in a state with a single Congressional representative, only three electoral votes and a Legislature that meets for just 90 days, every other year. Indeed, Schweitzer's national celebrity has less to do with the way he has governed and more to do with Democrats' perception — or their hope — that he is leading a Western resurgence.

The elections next month will test that theory. Schweitzer has been campaigning for the two Western Democrats best poised to replace powerful Republicans. In Montana, a populist farmer named Jon Tester is posing a serious challenge to Senator Conrad Burns, whose close ties to the lobbyist Jack Abramoff have made him an attractive target for Democrats trying to paint the Republicans as corrupt insiders. A Tester victory would solidify Montana as a Democratic stronghold, marking the first time since 1989 that the state's two senators and governor were all Democrats. (Montana's other senator, Max Baucus, a Democrat, has held his seat since 1978.) In Colorado, meanwhile, Schweitzer has been stumping for Bill Ritter, the former Denver district attorney, who grew up on a farm with 11 brothers and sisters, began working construction at age 14 and is now running for governor. A Ritter win would complete what Schweitzer calls a "blue bridge from Alberta to Mexico," a string of Democratic governorships stretching across Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona — states that all broke for Bush in 2004.

Some of this has to do with demographics. In the last three decades, professional and service jobs have boomed in the Rocky Mountain states, and farming and mining jobs have not; those two sectors, once the mainstay of the region, now make up just 5 percent of all jobs. In Nevada, Arizona and Colorado, a sharp rise in the Hispanic population in the last decade may also have helped tilt the voting base to the left. But Governor Schweitzer says he believes that his success points to something more significant. "Is it that the population in the West is trending toward the traditional Democratic Party?" Schweitzer asked. "Or is it possible that some leaders in the Rocky Mountains are on the vanguard of realigning what the Democrats stand for?"

The Interior West has long been seen by Democrats on election night as simply a disheartening wall of big red blocks. Idaho, Utah and Wyoming haven't voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since Lyndon Johnson in 1964, and Montana, Colorado and Arizona have all gone Republican in 9 of the last 10 presidential elections. But below the surface, the map of the West is slowly becoming a little less red and a little more blue. In 2000, Democrats had not a single governor in the interior West states; now they have four. Democrats have gradually been picking up House seats, too. In 1996, they won 4 of 24 House seats in the region. But they've managed to pick up 1 or 2 seats in each of the last four elections and have now clawed their way up to 8 of 28. In 2004, the party's only bright spot besides Montana was Colorado, where Ken Salazar won a Republican Senate seat; his brother, John, picked up a House seat; and the Democrats took control of both state chambers.

"The pan-Western states — in an arc from Ohio, west to Montana and south to Arizona — are where the low-hanging and most-ripe-for-the-plucking electoral fruit for Democrats is to be found," writes Tom Schaller in "Whistling Past Dixie." The midterm election outlook seems to support Schaller's thesis. None of the region's eight Democratic representatives — the so-called Coyote Caucus — are considered at serious risk in 2006. But 10 of the 20 Republican-held seats are included in the list of 56 potential Democratic pickups compiled by Larry Sabato at the University of Virginia's Center for Politics. The Democratic Senate candidate in Arizona is putting up a surprising fight against the Republican incumbent, and the race for Nevada governor, an open seat vacated by a Republican, is listed by the Cook Report, an influential Washington political newsletter, as a tossup.

Local Democrats portray this trend as a grass-roots, homegrown phenomenon. "These advances were not the results of any national organization," Jim Farrell, executive director of the Montana Democratic Party, told me, "but of the emergence of great local leadership like Schweitzer and Salazar. The D.S.C.C." — the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, led by Charles Schumer of New York — "and other national groups have recognized the potential for gain, but they're chasing after a train that began rolling in the last two cycles here in the West."

It would seem to be true that Democrats in Washington long ignored the mountain states. As Pat Williams, a Montana Democrat who served in the House from 1979 to 1996, told me, "In 2000 you literally couldn't get an Al Gore button in Montana." But in recent years, the national Democratic Party has made some small but significant organizational shifts to increase the West's political brawn. In August, the Democratic National Committee inserted a Nevada caucus into the 2008 presidential primary schedule, between Iowa and New Hampshire, in recognition that the Southwest is the nation's fastest-growing region. The West has also gained influence through the elevation of Senator

Harry Reid, a pro-gun, pro-life Nevada Mormon, to Senate minority leader. Democrats have chosen Denver as one of two finalists to be host of their 2008 convention (the other is New York). If Denver is selected, it will mark the first time in a century that Democrats have held a convention in the interior West. The D.N.C. has hired as its Northwest political director Brad Martin, who as executive director of the Montana Democratic Party oversaw its 2004 gains, and

Howard Dean has dispatched more than 30 staff members to the Western states as part of his "50-state strategy."

Still, Democrats hasten to assure the region's notoriously prickly and independent voters that the national party's new Western focus doesn't mean that Washington will exercise any control over candidates in the region. "We're not trying to be a top-down organization like the Republicans," says Karen Finney, spokeswoman of the D.N.C. In the West, of course, being seen as refusing to take orders is a way to demonstrate your frontier spirit. Williams offers this advice to any Western candidate wondering whether to employ a regional strategy: "If it doesn't exist, create it. And then be against it."

As fertile as the West may seem for Democrats, some in the party remain skeptical that it matters much. "The problem with the Democrats is that they can't count," Dave (Mudcat) Saunders, a Democratic campaign strategist, told me. Saunders's book, "Foxes in the Henhouse," argues that the party would be wrong to focus on the West and ignore the South. He notes that 30 percent of the country's electoral votes come from the South, and that by 2025 that percentage will be 40. "Georgia and Florida have as many votes as all the West put together," Saunders points out.

Montana Republicans don't concede that the 2004 results show a Democratic trend in Montana — much less the rest of the West. Roy Brown, the leader of the Republican caucus in the statehouse, says that the Democrats' pickup of seats in the Legislature was not due to a sea change in the electorate but a result of gerrymandering perpetrated by a Montana Supreme Court that is "in bed with the Democrats." Although Montana does not require voters to identify party affiliation, Brown estimates that 40 percent are Republicans, 35 percent are Democrats and 25 percent are independents. He concedes that in recent years the independents have been leaning toward the Democrats, but he says that's not a consequence of a true shift in voter attitudes but a result of a "filter-down" effect from unpopular Republican candidates at the top of the ticket. (Schweitzer's Republican predecessor famously declared herself a "lap dog of industry.") In any event, the Democrats' success in 2004 was not an aberration; the party had been steadily gaining seats in the state chambers for the previous three elections.

Schweitzer agrees that Democrats should be careful about trying to extrapolate Montana's political trends to other states. "Montana ought not serve as a metaphor for the entire West," he told me. Indeed, Montana is the West's answer to New Hampshire: independent, contrary and unpredictable. Its demographic trends do not match that of the Southwest. The state's population is growing, but not skyrocketing the way it is in Arizona and Nevada, and with no city larger than 100,000 residents, Montana essentially does not have suburbs or exurbs like those spreading around Phoenix, Las Vegas and Denver. Hispanics account for less than 3 percent of the population; Montana's most sizable ethnic minority is Native American, at 6 percent of the population. And the state's voters have always been less conservative than their neighbors in Idaho, Utah and Wyoming. While it's true that Montanans voted for a Democratic president only twice in the past 50 years, they've often elected Democrats to the House and Senate. In fact, Max Baucus's Senate seat has been held by a Democrat since 1913. The meaning of the 2004 race is further complicated by the fact that Schweitzer chose a Republican — albeit a moderate of the Jim Jeffords variety — as his running mate.

Within the state, politics have historically been split between east and west. Western Montana, with two college towns, Missoula and Bozeman; the unionized mining town Butte; and the capital, Helena, tends to vote more like the liberal Pacific Northwest. The east is more like the Great Plains, with vast ranches, farms, strip mines and oil fields. When the state had two Congressional districts (they were folded into one in 1993), the western one was consistently held by a Democrat and the eastern one by a Republican. According to David Sirota, who was a strategist for Schweitzer in both 2000 and 2004 and who now lives in Helena, the swing vote in the state is in and around Billings, the state's largest city. ("It is Yellowstone County that is Montana's own Ohio," he says, "and Billings the state's Columbus.") But unlike the rest of the nation, where swing voters are generally characterized as socially conservative suburbanites, Sirota says that many Montana swing voters are rural and libertarian.

Marc Racicot, who served two terms as Montana's governor before he went on to be chairman of the Republican National Committee and President Bush's 2004 campaign committee, says his fellow Montanans are unpredictable voters. "You simply can't classify them," he told me, pointing out that in 2004 they simultaneously voted to ban gay marriage and to legalize medical marijuana. "They are conservative in some ways, but ruggedly independent and populist in others. Party affiliation isn't necessarily the dominant characteristic they consider." Montanans are more mistrustful of large institutions like government and corporations than their counterparts on the coasts, while less religious than the South. Fifty-three percent of Montanans say they are pro-abortion rights. In foreign policy they can be rather isolationist: a poll in September showed that Montanans break with the national trend and rank the economy as more important than national security or the Iraq war. They take a libertarian approach to homeland security that is rarely heard nationally; Jon Tester, in a recent debate, said, "With things like the Patriot Act, we'd damn well better keep our guns." And, contrary to the myth that Westerners are opposed to all environmental regulation, they tend to be conservationists. About 60 percent of Montanans favored the Roadless Area Conservation Rule, which protected land from logging; it was signed by Bill Clinton and overturned by George W. Bush. Bush's recent plan to auction off public lands was so unpopular in Montana that even Conrad Burns opposed it.

Montana's populist streak dates back more than a century to the mining labor movement, and it surfaced again in 1992, when Ross Perot captured more than a quarter of the vote, allowing Clinton to win the state. As the Republicans honed their populist message in the 1990's, their fortunes improved in Montana. Now, some say, the tide is turning. "The appeal of populism never changed," Sirota says. "The parties changed. The Republicans were the populists. Now the Democrats have learned that they can be populists, too."

It was a sunny day in June, and Brian Schweitzer and Max Baucus were flanked by Cessnas and helicopters, rallying with Jon Tester. Political rallies in other states might take place in hotel ballrooms; here in Montana everyone was gathered in an aircraft hangar outside Missoula. The place smelled like jet fuel. Corralling the top-ticket Montana Democrats in one place can resemble a "Bonanza" cast reunion, albeit with two Hosses and no Little Joe. Tester is a third-generation wheat farmer, president of the State Senate and a lumbering tank of a guy with a big gut and a flattop haircut. You want prairie authenticity? Have Tester show you his hand with just a thumb and a pinkie; the other three fingers were chopped off in a meat grinder when he was a boy. Tester, a progressive type, ran in the primary against a better-financed centrist, a career politician supported by the Democratic Leadership Council, and as soon as he won, Schweitzer leapt in to claim him as a brother. Onstage at the airport, Schweitzer played the down-home card. "Jon's grandparents homesteaded just 20 miles from my grandparents," he hollered, to a roar of approval from the hangar. "He and I were born in the same tiny hospital, up in Havre!"

Other than the fact that they grew up on farms, it's not immediately clear what unites Schweitzer and Tester, Ritter and the Salazars. With his outspoken criticism of the war in Iraq — "I was very public before we went in that it was a bad idea, and history has borne that out," he told me — Schweitzer has become a hero to progressives, while Ken Salazar has infuriated liberals with his support of Alberto Gonzalez's nomination for attorney general and his endorsement of Joe Lieberman's independent re-election bid. Governor Richardson of New Mexico suggests that such differences are evidence that the movement has no overarching strategy. "It's happening from the bottom up," he told me. "This is a natural evolution. It's no grand design." Or maybe it's that the region's Democrats simply don't have many core beliefs in common. Schweitzer remains an iconoclast; he says he supported

John McCain's presidential bid in 2000, though he has since soured on McCain because of the way he has courted the religious right, and he says he is now intrigued by the possibility of a presidential run by

Mitt Romney, the Republican governor of Massachusetts, in 2008. "If he gets the nomination, I might support him," Schweitzer told me.

Much of Schweitzer's attraction to voters lies in the fact that he doesn't seem like a politician. "I'm just a rancher who ended up governor of Montana," he likes to say. But Schweitzer is not a politician only in the sense that the young Cassius Clay was not a boxer; by the time his opponent realized he'd been hit, he was already on the mat. And since it's accepted in the West that politicians are generally not to be trusted, Schweitzer's greatest talent may be his endless insistence that he's not one, all the while winning your vote and changing your opinion to agree with his. Which is, of course, what a politician does. His success is not the happy accident of a novice or a rube or a cowpoke who happened to ride his donkey into the halls of power — but rather the work of an expert, a virtuoso or, perhaps, a natural.

Besides getting elected and getting on television, what has Schweitzer actually accomplished? Much of the attention he has received came from positions he has taken on national issues: writing an Op-Ed for The Times about the miracle of coal-to-gas liquefaction, or requesting that President Bush return the Montana National Guardsmen from Iraq to fight summer forest fires. His agenda for his first legislative session was hardly radical: it included an increase in education financing, setting a goal to produce more wind power and a tax-reform bill that favored small business over big by eliminating the tax on business equipment valued at less than $20,000, while withdrawing a pending cut on more expensive equipment. He introduced an ultimately unsuccessful plan to prevent government officials from moving directly into lobbying jobs. Still, Schweitzer bristles at the suggestion that he was not sufficiently tested by his first session. "I had 90 days to pass my agenda," he told me. "It was my first day on the job, and I was working with lobbyists and legislators who'd been there for years. We had a State Assembly that was deadlocked. But I pushed through the most progressive legislative agenda in the country. It was not easy. I took on the lobbyists. I wrestled them to the ground, and now I'm kicking them in the ribs."

Despite the boots and bluster, at his core Brian Schweitzer is something of a policy wonk and a science whiz. He says he sleeps no more than five hours a night, and he is at his computer well before dawn, consuming a host of newspapers and a string of political blogs. His true passion is energy independence. On his desk is a contraption of tubes and coils that, as he enthusiastically explains, convert sunlight into hydrogen. In addition to his horsemanship and riflery, Schweitzer likes to tinker with gadgets, and he holds degrees in both soil science and agronomy. He will preach to anyone who will listen about the Fischer-Tropsch process of coal liquefaction, or about his recent switch from a Tahoe S.U.V. to a biodiesel Volkswagen Jetta.

Schweitzer fancies that he will solve the energy crisis the Montana way, which is to say, with ethanol and syn-fuels and wind power, all readily available in a state that has more grain, coal and wind than it does people. He says he believes that he is setting an example for the rest of the world, and that tends to infuse even the most mundane details of his legislative work with a certain fervor.

When I was visiting with Schweitzer one day during the legislative session, an aide rushed into his office with news that a group of Democratic state representatives from the Great Falls area were threatening to withdraw their support from the governor's ethanol bill. Schweitzer was leaning back in his chair, beneath an oil painting of a Native American woman playing a flute, beside a window opening onto a view of snow-covered mountains. If Schweitzer is, as his critics contend, mostly a showman, he has chosen the perfect stage. Helena's domed State Capitol is a transcendent gallery of marble columns and stained-glass atria, a temple so sincere in its exultation of frontier democracy that, for the cynical, it may resemble a Frank Capra movie version of government more than it resembles the real thing. Citizens wander freely in the corridors of power and, from the Senate gallery, can observe their lawmakers beneath frescoes of Lewis and Clark meeting Sacagawea, and of General Custer about to take a dagger to the gut at Little Bighorn.

The Great Falls representatives refused to come meet Schweitzer in the governor's office — located about 800 steps from their chamber — because they were upset that the governor canceled a meeting with them earlier that day. "That's it," Schweitzer said, leaping up. "I'm taking 'em to the woodshed." In an instant he was stomping down the corridor to the rotunda, his dog at his heels, and charging up the staircase to the House chamber. The governor corralled the Great Falls representatives in a meeting room and listened to their grievances. He leaned forward intently, his head bobbing almost imperceptibly, his eyes wide open and blinking in a strict cadence, receiving and processing data as if it were an electrical current. He clutched the edge of the table, and I suspected that if he let go, the rotors spinning in his skull would have broken the pull of gravity and sent him spiraling into orbit.

Sufficiently charged, the governor whirred into action. His monologue combined pep talk and sales pitch, threats and promises, science lecture and economic briefing. He spoke at length on the difference between malt barley and high-protein wheat, and on the profit margin of ethanol refineries, pounding his finger on the tabletop for emphasis. He went on uninterrupted for seven minutes, and when the fusillade was over, one of the representatives voiced a small objection from an industry lobbyist that Montana wheat would make for low-grade ethanol.

"Now that," said the governor, slapping the table in triumph, almost evangelically, as if the Republic itself depended on this vote, "that sounds like somebody who didn't take a single class in agronomy!"

Later that day, everyone at the meeting voted yes on ethanol, and in the evenly split House, the bill passed 52-48.

Hungry and emboldened, Democrats are already looking past 2006. A few stalwart Western Republicans who have been in the Senate since the Nixon years are rumored to be contemplating retirement in 2008. Pete Domenici of New Mexico will be 76, and

Ted Stevens of Alaska will be 84. In Colorado, Democrats are so eager to oust Senator Wayne Allard that Representative Mark Udall has declared his candidacy a full three years before the election. Udall comes from the political dynasty that has spawned an Arizona Supreme Court justice and a handful of Democratic congressmen, and as a world-class mountaineer who says he is the only member of Congress to have made an attempt on Mount Everest, he fits the bill of an iconic Westerner.

As Democrats look to Montana to try to figure out how to replicate Governor Schweitzer's success, they can't help noticing one recent poll number: in August, 66 percent of Montana Republicans said they approved of Schweitzer, the same portion who said they approved of Conrad Burns, their own party's incumbent senator. It may be that this sort of popularity comes only to a larger-than-life personality like Schweitzer.

Democrats will be wise not to try to replicate Schweitzer himself. When non-Schweitzers try to act like Schweitzer, it usually doesn't work. In his book, Schaller recalls "campaign images of Al Gore wearing cowboy boots with his belt-clipped Blackberry, or a barn-jacket-clad John Kerry buying a goose-hunting license." Schaller goes on to write that these gestures force "liberals to avert their eyes in horror, while conservatives look on from afar with a mixture of disdain and disbelief."

As for Schweitzer's own future plans, he dismisses questions about further political ambitions with one of his trademark similes — something about having spent more days in a saddle than having been governor. Nonetheless, the scope of his battle is larger than Montana. In addition to campaigning for Jon Tester in Montana and Bill Ritter in Colorado, he also stumped recently at a fund-raiser in Jackson Hole, Wyo., for a singularly non-Western candidate: Eliot Spitzer of New York.

Debate In Texas Race Focuses On Border, Crime And Cigars (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 7 — Competing with the Friday night lights of a big Texas football weekend, Gov. Rick Perry and three challengers faced off in a Dallas television studio for their only debate in the free-for-all that is the governor's race.

But if the long-awaited one-hour showdown had its moments — Kinky Friedman, the comic songster and independent, pledged allegiance to his cigar; former Representative Chris Bell, the Democrat, remembered the Alamo; and Comptroller Carole

Keeton Strayhorn, a Republican running as an independent, forgot the name of the president-elect of Mexico — it hardly resolved the uncertainties, some political experts said.

With Mr. Perry, a Republican, leading in the polls a month before Election Day and positioned to become the longest-serving governor of Texas despite being opposed by about two out of three voters, the high-profile race in President Bush's home state is still fluid.

"There was no standout winner," said Harvey Kronberg, who publishes The Quorum Report, an online Texas political journal. In the night's version of "Survivor," he said, "we still have to see who gets thrown off the island."

Yet it was Mr. Perry's debate to lose, and he did not, said Cal Jillson, a professor of political science at Southern Methodist University who monitored the debate for its sponsor, the Belo Corporation, which owns WFAA-TV and The Dallas Morning News. "If he had fallen off the stage or fainted dead away, or fumbled badly, but he didn't do that," Dr. Jillson said.

Answering questions from reporters, viewers and each other with no studio audience, Mr. Friedman and Mr. Bell accused Mr. Perry of picking a date for the event to minimize attention and of ducking additional debates. Mr. Friedman laid it to politics: " 'Poly' means 'more than one,' and 'ticks' are blood-sucking parasites," he said.

Mr. Perry did not respond directly but recently told Texas Monthly that a crowded debate would not yield much substance.

The four candidates — a fifth, James Werner, a Libertarian, was excluded by Belo — squabbled over immigration and crime. Mr. Perry defended his dispatch of National Guard troops to secure the border against illegal crossers but faulted the federal government's actions as inadequate and said he would seek $100 million from the legislature for more enforcement.

Ms. Strayhorn, who goes by the moniker of Grandma, said, "I want the Texas Rangers in charge."

Mr. Friedman, in his black cowboy garb and waving his ever-present unlit cigar, called for taxpayer ID cards for immigrant workers and $25,000 fines for employing illegal immigrants.

Mr. Bell said he would also crack down on employers but asked, "Does anyone believe we could deport 12 million people if we couldn't even evacuate New Orleans?"

Mr. Perry said he would support the death penalty for repeat sexual predators. Ms. Strayhorn said she favored mandatory life terms.

Mr. Friedman, laying a 20 percent upsurge in crime in Houston to evacuees from Hurricane Katrina, called for spending $100 million on more police officers. But he was condemned by the others for remarks that some called racially offensive and that he defended as parody.

"Words matter," Mr. Perry chided.

Mr. Friedman was unrepentant. "Sure, everyone's ganging up on me," he said. "Tackle the guy carrying the ball."

He was also asked if, as governor, "will you have a cigar in your mouth so children will see you?"

Mr. Friedman said, "Yeah, I'll definitely smoke cigars."

Mr. Perry was assailed over a new business tax to remedy a school-financing crisis and lower property levies, and for a planned toll road complex that Ms. Strayhorn called "the Trans-Texas Catastrophe."

Mr. Bell accused Ms. Strayhorn as comptroller of giving half a billion dollars in tax breaks to clients of contributors. She denied it, vowing to install a "government in sunshine."

In a barrage of tricky questions, Mr. Perry was asked if he knew the going rate for a 30-year mortgage. He said 5.9 percent — it was actually 6.3 percent.

Ms. Strayhorn blanked on the name of the new president of Mexico (Felipe Calderón). "He won by a narrow margin," she ventured.

But Mr. Bell scored on a perilous question: when was the battle of the Alamo? (1836)

In his summation, Mr. Perry turned on Mr. Bell, saying Democrats were weak on national security, suggesting that the governor may now see the former congressman as his prime threat.

Spinmeisters from various camps immediately unleashed a flurry of e-mail messages dissecting the rivals' answers. As to who won, Ms. Strayhorn's campaign said, "Texans won this debate," but could not resist adding "and learned the truth about Gov. Perry's false tax cut." The Perry campaign countered with, "Strayhorn can't be trusted to keep her ethics pledges."

Beyond who won was another question: who watched? Fall Friday nights in Texas are famously devoted to the high school gridiron, and football fans are in a special froth over Saturday's annual Red River Rivalry between the University of Texas and University of Oklahoma in the Cotton Bowl in Dallas.

Still, Amy Powell, 41, a nutritionist, joined Perry supporters to see the debate at County Line Bar-B-Q in north Houston. She left less than enlightened. "I saw a lot of talking," she said, "typical political stuff."

California Candidates Spar Over Economy (AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0078296

The Associated Press, October 8, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides sparred over the direction of the state's economy Saturday in their only debate planned for the gubernatorial campaign.

In a series of sharp exchanges, Schwarzenegger and Angelides differed over higher education fees, taxes and the state of the middle class.

Angelides said fees at the California State University and University of California systems have risen by thousands of dollars under Schwarzenegger, a Republican. Schwarzenegger noted that college fees rose dramatically under his predecessor, former Democratic Gov. Gray Davis, and that he has capped them this year.

He also attacked Angelides as wanting to raise billions in taxes if he is elected Nov. 7.

"I can tell by the joy I see in your eyes that you love to raise taxes," the governor said to Angelides. "Why don't you just say right now, 'I love increasing your taxes.'"

Angelides said his plan was to raise taxes on the wealthy and close corporate tax loopholes, in part to help California balance its budget and fully fund education.

"Who can you trust to do the right thing by middle-class families in this state?" Angelides said.

Angelides contrasted the California in which he grew up with the one he sees now, where middle-class families struggle to pay health care, college and other costs. He vowed to provide "a different vision" from Schwarzenegger and "put the government back on the side of working people."

The governor noted the difference between California's economic situation today and three years ago, when Davis was ousted amid a record budget deficit.

Schwarzenegger said he has worked to reduce the deficit, strengthen the state's credit rating, improve the business climate and "make us shine again."

The debate, coming on the third anniversary of the historic recall election that swept Schwarzenegger into office, provided the campaign's first direct exchange between Schwarzenegger and Angelides, allowing a format in which the candidates could question each other. Those exchanges provided periodic fireworks.

After Angelides spoke on array of issues -- against the Iraq war, accusing Schwarzenegger of failing to secure sufficient homeland security funding, criticizing the governor for plans to overhaul state pensions -- Schwarzenegger shot back with a family reference.

"I feel a little bit like I'm having dinner with Uncle Teddy at Thanksgiving," the governor quipped, referring to Sen. Ted Kennedy, the uncle of his wife, Maria Shriver.

"He's a great man," Angelides shot back. "If my grandmother could hear me being compared to a Kennedy...."

The candidates did not differ sharply on immigration, with both calling for some kind of path to citizenship for illegal immigrants who already are in the United States.

Angelides rejected the idea of a fence along the border, instead saying he would lobby the Bush administration to provide more border guards. Schwarzenegger said the country needed a way for companies to "legally hire people from outside the United States."

The state treasurer has been the underdog since emerging from a bruising Democratic primary fight against state Controller Steve Westly. The race drained his campaign funds.

He has battled ever since to redefine himself, in part by trying to fashion himself as a champion of the middle class.

Schwarzenegger spent much of September highlighting bipartisan agreements with bill signings throughout the state. He has also shown a huge fundraising advantage.

Recent polls have given Schwarzenegger leads of 10 and 17 percentage points.

The debate at Sacramento State University was sponsored by the California Broadcasters Association.

Taxes Take Center Stage In Gov. Debate (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Schwarzenegger depicts his foe as a big spender. Angelides compares his rival to Bush, Hastert.

SACRAMENTO — Trailing badly in polls, Democrat Phil Angelides on Saturday used the first and only debate of the governor's race to question Arnold Schwarzenegger's integrity and try to yoke him to President Bush and embattled Republicans in Congress.

A jocular Schwarzenegger parried with one-liners and invoked major bipartisan agreements with state lawmakers, portraying Angelides as a big-spending liberal who was eager to hike taxes on those who could least afford it.

DOJ_NMG_0078297

The issue of taxes, the governor's preferred ground, dominated the debate. Schwarzenegger mocked state Treasurer Angelides for proposing tax cuts for middle-income families, saying the idea was inconsistent with his support for a $4-billion car-tax hike under former Gov. Gray Davis. Schwarzenegger reeled off billions of dollars in other tax increases that Angelides has supported over the years, including a tractor levy that would have hit "the poor farmers."

"You have been so far for every single tax increase since you have been in public office," Schwarzenegger told Angelides.

At one point, smiling across the stage at his rival, the governor taunted: "I can tell by the joy you see in your eyes when you talk about taxes, you just love to increase taxes…. Look out there right now and just say, 'I love increasing your taxes.' "

Angelides told Schwarzenegger he would not allow him to deceive viewers by repeating "what you've done in those $35 million of TV ads attacking me." Then he invoked a trio of Republican leaders, past and present.

"The fact is, when you speak like this you sound just like Newt Gingrich," Angelides said. "You sound like Speaker Hastert. You sound like George Bush attacking me on taxes."

While Angelides repeatedly linked Schwarzenegger with Bush and other prominent Republicans, the governor sought to lump his Democratic opponent with Davis, who was defeated in the 2003 recall exactly three years ago Saturday. The result was perhaps the liveliest exchange of the evening.

"During the most incredible decline of our economy, just a few years ago, you were part of that," Schwarzenegger said.

"Well, you know, your policies are the Bush policies, and I prefer [former President] Clinton to Bush any day," Angelides shot back.

"No, no, don't talk about Bush, because if you want to do that, go to Iowa," Schwarzenegger said, alluding to the site of the first presidential nominating contest.

"You went to Ohio, governor; I didn't," Angelides said, referring to Schwarzenegger's appearance alongside Bush late in the 2004 campaign. "You stood with President Bush and you helped him get reelected. And we didn't even get a T-shirt!"

The two then talked past each other for several seconds, the governor suggesting that Angelides was ready "to promise the people everything, and then increase the taxes."

"No, I've been clear, governor," Angelides retorted, "I'm going to close those corporate tax loopholes."

"Oh, sure. Of course," Schwarzenegger said, laughing sarcastically. "Very good. Exactly, yeah."

At various times Angelides sought to turn the tax issue on his opponent, reminding viewers that college and university fees had risen under Schwarzenegger. The governor, in turn, recalled student protests against similar moves by Davis.

"They marched in Sacramento, right by your office, treasurer," Schwarzenegger said, squinting his eyes at his opponent. "You were inside that office, and you looked out, and you didn't join them protesting…. Where were you?"

Angelides has proposed raising taxes by $5 billion a year for corporations and Californians who make more than $250,000 a year. In August, he offset that proposal with a plan for $1.4 billion in tax cuts, mainly for middle-income Californians and small businesses.

But over the years, Angelides has called for a variety of other tax increases that he no longer supports, and Schwarzenegger puts the total cost of them at more than $18 billion a year.

The joint appearance at Sacramento State University offered a crucial opportunity for Angelides to improve his standing in a contest that so far has tilted heavily in the Republican governor's favor. But with no moment of high drama or surprising revelations, the 55-minute session appeared unlikely to change the central dynamics of the race, now in its final weeks.

The two candidates, wearing similar dark suits, sat facing each other at separate tables, with the moderator, Stan Statham of the California Broadcasters Assn., seated between them.

Showing what he learned in Hollywood, the governor was careful to look directly into the camera as he spoke. Angelides spent much of his time addressing the studio audience, presenting a less flattering profile for the majority of those watching at home on television.

The debate, sponsored by the broadcasters association, was aired live on radio and television stations statewide. But the timing — a Saturday night, opposite major league baseball playoffs and college football — limited the size of the audience.

Angelides had hoped to debate Schwarzenegger as many as 10 times, but the governor had nothing to gain by offering his challenger such high-profile exposure on television and declined all other offers. As a result, the debate's terms were essentially the governor's. Statham, a former Republican assemblyman, is a registered lobbyist for the broadcasters.

Schwarzenegger, as the front-runner, spent much of the evening avoiding confrontation, allowing many of Angelides' accusations to go unanswered and breaking the tension with several apparently well-rehearsed quips.

In keeping with his political move to the middle, Schwarzenegger also stressed the bipartisan approach he has taken this year to working with the Democrats, who control the Legislature, on issues such as the infrastructure bonds on the November ballot.

DOJ_NMG_0078298

Asked which decision in public office he most regrets, Schwarzenegger cited last year's disastrous special election, in which voters overwhelming rejected his four initiatives after he went over the heads of lawmakers.

"I pushed too fast," he said, again sounding the note of contrition he struck in the days after the debacle. "I did not bring all the legislators on board. I did not bring people together enough.

"The people sent a message loud and clear," he added. "And that message was, 'Don't come to us for every little thing. Go to the legislators. You guys work it out.' And that's exactly what we've done since then."

Angelides responded that it was not a good idea "to attack working men and women" and cut school money, as he characterized Schwarzenegger's past efforts. "The one thing I want to say tonight is: Who can you trust next year to do the right thing? For three years, Arnold Schwarzenegger was very consistent. Only in the last 60 days, as he sought to save his own job, has he tried to move to the middle, so to speak."

At another point, Angelides returned to that theme, saying the election "comes back to who can you really trust?"

Given one chance to question each other directly, Schwarzenegger opted for a gentle approach, asking Angelides about the funniest moment he had experienced during the campaign.

"Every day is just a hoot — I can't tell you how much fun," Angelides joked. More seriously, Angelides expressed joy at the time he has spent with his family.

He then hit back hard, asking Schwarzenegger how he could justify a proposal — eventually withdrawn — that could have endangered the benefits of police widows and orphans.

The governor responded with his sharpest rejoinder of the evening: "I did not try to take anything away from any police officer or firefighter…. I will never take away the pension, or the disability or the death benefit from anyone, the firefighters, the police officers or anyone else as far as that goes. So you can stop that hype right there."

But more often, when things grew tense, Schwarzenegger tried to lighten the mood with a smile and clever aside.

After Angelides assailed his record on protecting the state from terrorism and criticized his treatment of the state's law enforcement officers, the governor drew a big laugh from the studio crowd — and a smile from Angelides — by suggesting, "I feel a little like I'm having Thanksgiving dinner with Uncle Teddy."

"Thank you so much," Angelides replied, delighted to be compared to U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the uncle of Schwarzenegger's wife, Maria Shriver.

O'Malley's Reach Sends Ehrlich To D.C. Suburbs (WP)

By John Wagner And Matthew Mosk, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

The road map that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. hopes will guide him to reelection has sent the Republican to an unlikely place in search of votes: the heavily Democratic Washington suburbs.

A month before the Nov. 7 election, Ehrlich has stepped up his efforts in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, a tacit recognition that the strategy he rode to victory in 2002 cannot be fully replicated this year against Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D).

Four years ago, in edging Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend to become the state's first Republican governor in a generation, Ehrlich piled up unprecedented vote totals in the suburban counties that ring Baltimore. That region is home to significant numbers of registered Republicans as well as blue-collar Democrats who were willing to give an affable local congressman a shot at the governor's mansion.

With O'Malley, however, Ehrlich faces an opponent whose popularity extends beyond the borders of his own heavily Democratic city into parts of the surrounding suburbs. So the governor has turned toward Washington to help make up the difference.

In the past week, Ehrlich has conducted a half-dozen interviews with news outlets in the Washington market, attended several fundraisers and picked up the Montgomery County Chamber of Commerce's backing.

"Last time, I was a complete stranger" to the D.C. suburbs, Ehrlich said in an interview. "We tried, but we got beaten there. Badly. This time, it's a different story. . . . This time we're looking for a major uptick in support."

In 2002, Ehrlich won statewide by 66,170 votes in a race in which 1.7 million ballots were cast. To win reelection, he is seeking to offset gains the Democratic nominee could make in the Baltimore suburbs by improving his performance elsewhere. The voter-rich Washington suburbs provide the most enticing target, despite their decidedly Democratic tilt.

"It's really a matter of numbers," said John Willis, a former Maryland secretary of state. "If my opponent is eating into the margin in my base, I've got to go eat into the margin in his base."

DOJ_NMG_0078299

Last week, O'Malley and his top aides expressed confidence that the mayor, who grew up in Montgomery, was not losing ground to Ehrlich in the Washington area. To the contrary, as he becomes better known in the region, his support among Democrats is firming up, O'Malley said.

"We are picking up strength all over the state, most notably in the last few weeks in the Washington suburbs," he said. "We're going to continue to gain strength there."

Tomorrow, Democrats will hold a unity rally in Prince George's, the state's most heavily Democratic jurisdiction, to build interest in O'Malley and other candidates on the ballot.

When he ran for governor in 2002, Ehrlich said, he arrived in the Washington suburbs as a largely unknown Republican congressman from Baltimore County. Since then, he said, he has worked hard to build trust and political support.

"I think we'll see a substantial increase from Prince George's as a function of our performance and our record," Ehrlich said. "It's very different than four years ago."

Ehrlich said his support for economic expansion projects -- including National Harbor, the $2 billion waterfront development -- and his efforts to expand minority business opportunities have helped him with voters in Prince George's. He also cited efforts to forge a relationship with County Executive Jack B. Johnson, a Democrat. The two played golf together over the summer to discuss the possibility of attracting the national NAACP headquarters to the county.

State Sen. Ulysses Currie (D-Prince George's), whom Ehrlich identified as someone who has warmed to him, said he has noticed the governor's attempts at courtship. "I think he has tried," Currie said. "But I don't think at the end of the day it's going to necessarily help him."

Currie said he believes that Prince George's residents are not going to be willing to cross party lines in a year when, nationally, Republicans are on the ropes.

"With what's going on at the national level now, I don't see him doing significantly better than what he did in 2002," Currie said. "People know he's a Republican."

Four years ago, Ehrlich attracted more votes than the GOP's 1998 gubernatorial nominee, Ellen R. Sauerbrey, in every Maryland jurisdiction save one: Prince George's. Despite his historic selection of a black running mate from the county, Michael S. Steele, Ehrlich drew 6,178 fewer votes there than Sauerbrey did in 1998.

Townsend wound up outpolling him in Prince George's nearly 77 percent to 23 percent.

O'Malley aides point out the significant growth in the county's Democratic voter base since 2002. The number of Democrats has increased by nearly 50,000 in Prince George's since Ehrlich's election; the Republican side has gained 200.

If he is not able to persuade Prince George's residents to vote for him, Ehrlich may be able to sour them enough on O'Malley that they stay home. That, Democrats say, is the aim of a radio ad Ehrlich has been airing in the county that accuses the Baltimore police department of unlawfully arresting thousands of African Americans a year.

The ad is narrated by William H. Murphy, a prominent black criminal defense lawyer in Baltimore and a longtime friend of Ehrlich's.

"He sanctions and directs the arrests of thousands of Baltimore City people, predominantly black, without ever charging them with a crime," Murphy says in the ad, referring to a policy of stepped-up enforcement of "quality of life" offenses, such as loitering, under O'Malley.

Police say the strategy helps break up drug corners and deter serious crimes. But it has generated some outspoken critics, including members of Baltimore's legislative delegation.

"He's trying to play the politics of division and fear," O'Malley said when asked about Ehrlich's ads last week.

In Montgomery, Ehrlich won 38.3 percent of the vote in 2002 -- not significantly better than other recent GOP nominees for governor. He predicted improvement this year. "I'm not going to say it's a sea change, but it's significantly different."

Ehrlich said Montgomery's Jewish community will be part of that difference. In the 2002 election, Ehrlich said, he was successful in forging ties with Baltimore's Jewish community. As governor, he has reached out to Montgomery's large Jewish population, in part by helping alter homeland security regulations to enable Jewish schools and facilities to get federal grants for security upgrades.

State Del. Luiz R.S. Simmons (D-Montgomery), who used to be a Republican, called the governor's suggestion that he can win broad support in the Jewish community "fanciful."

"He would be exaggerating his connection with the Jewish community to believe that he is going to somehow roll up large numbers," said Simmons, who is Jewish. "There's no basis for that."

Simmons said that if Jewish voters shy away from Ehrlich, it will be because of his approach to issues Jewish voters consider important: higher-education funding and stem cell research.

DOJ_NMG_0078300

"If you look at the tuition rises at the University of Maryland, this is not something that's going to sit well," Simmons said. "Not only that, but Jewish voters are disproportionately committed to support for stem cell research, and Ehrlich has waffled on the issue."

While Ehrlich is hoping to make inroads into the Washington suburbs, O'Malley aides point to polls suggesting that he is making strides in Ehrlich strongholds.

Their confidence is born of O'Malley's popularity in the Baltimore region, which has been bolstered by his constant presence on the local news the past seven years. The expansive Baltimore media market reaches more than half the state. Ehrlich has sought to counter O'Malley there with a series of television ads highlighting the low performance of Baltimore's schools and its continuing struggles with crime.

O'Malley aides are banking on the ads having limited impact, given how much people in the region know about the mayor and governor.

"It's not possible to know two candidates in a region better than people know Ehrlich and O'Malley," said O'Malley spokesman Steve Kearney.

Pay For Good Behavior? (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

Ten years ago, when he signed the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, thus "ending welfare as we know it," President Bill Clinton blunted a debate over poverty that had been increasingly harmful to the Democratic Party. In fact, welfare reform proved so successful at both shrinking caseloads and reducing poverty levels that the issue lost its urgency. And for the last five years, of course, American politics has been focused on very different threats than the threat of destitution.

About 37 million Americans continue to live below the poverty line. No one living in a big city can be blind to the plight of the poor. In his second inaugural speech, in 2005, New York's mayor, Michael Bloomberg, vowed to focus on poverty reduction, and last month he announced the findings of his blue-ribbon Commission for Economic Opportunity. The panel — not surprisingly, perhaps, given its carefully chosen name — offered a post-ideological blueprint likely to require relatively modest increases in spending by the city as well as the federal and state governments. The report described many ways the city could more effectively spend existing funds, including apprenticeships and training for the working poor and school-based programs for students at risk of dropping out.

Mayor Bloomberg embraced many of the proposals and offered several more daring ones of his own. He proposed that New York become the first city in the country to offer a child-care tax credit, limited to low-income families with children under age 3. And more controversially, he vowed to raise $24 million in private donations to finance "conditional cash transfers" to give poor New Yorkers an incentive "to stay in school, stay at work and stay on track to rise out of poverty." A mayoral aide later explained that this behaviorist approach to fighting poverty has become popular in the developing world and has had a "phenomenal" effect on school attendance in Mexico. (The Bloomberg administration has not stipulated how much it will pay or which behaviors it will reward.)

The mayor's own plan drew a good deal more attention than the commission report did, perhaps because it seemed to be at odds with the report's slightly-left-of-center ethos. Heather Mac Donald, a fellow at the conservative Manhattan Institute for Policy Research, welcomed Bloomberg's implicit acceptance of the view that "it is the underclass poor who need to change more than society or capitalism." At the same time, she argued that he had undermined the case for self-reliance by establishing "an expectation among the underclass that they have a right to cash for simply conforming to the norms of civil society." Bloomberg responded by noting that if you could use a tax credit to "encourage people to do certain types of economic activity," you could use cash just as well.

The mayor's idea has a conservative as well a third-world pedigree: Newt Gingrich once proposed paying children for good grades. Market-oriented conservatives proceed from the assumption that people make rational calculations of self-interest; theorists like Charles Murray and Lawrence Mead long argued that welfare payments encouraged recipients to stay on welfare rather than to work. Welfare reform eliminated that perverse incentive. Why, then, not offer affirmative incentives to engage in healthy behavior? Is there some reason you learn a lesson better from a stick than from a carrot? Or does it just offend our sense of justice to pay people to do what others do for nothing?

The liberal objection to paying for good behavior is that it assumes that behavior lies at the root of poverty. But this argument has steadily lost ground over the last generation, and the goal of policy is now both to encourage good behavior and to connect good behavior with good opportunities.

Moral considerations nothwithstanding, you could argue that Bloomberg's plan takes far too benign a view of the problem of self-destructive habits. "The stress of poverty," the mayor said in announcing the program, "often causes people to make decisions," by which he meant poor decisions. But many scholars would say that the problem runs much deeper, to the cumulative effect of "underclass culture." Lollipops for good behavior will not break those shackles.

The problem is, What will? A conscientious program of lollipop deprivation? Lectures about the dreadful consequences of cutting school or not making child-support payments? Heather Mac Donald would have Bloomberg stop bribing the poor and instead "call on private industry and ad councils to start a massive educational campaign about marriage." But why would we imagine that mere rhetoric could dislodge the deeply entrenched habits that lead to having children out of wedlock? It's true that poor people who adopt "middle-class values" generally succeed, but you can no more change their behavior by telling them so than you can produce democracy in the Middle East merely by preaching its virtues. The transformation of a culture is slow, arduous work, requiring material support as well as moral and intellectual renewal.

The whole thing is reminiscent of a famous maxim coined by Daniel Patrick Moynihan: "The central conservative truth is that it is culture, not politics, that determines the success of a society. The central liberal truth is that politics can change a culture and save it from itself." The central Bloombergian truth may be that in the absence of serious political energy, a modest appeal to self-interest will have to do.

Japan Warns North Korea On Nuclear Tests (AP)

By Hans Greimel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Tensions mounted over North Korea's threat to test its first atomic bomb, with shots ringing out Saturday along the border with South Korea and Japan warning of harsh sanctions if Pyongyang goes nuclear.

With a possible test expected as early as Sunday, the U.N. Security Council issued a stern statement Friday urging the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions and warning of unspecified consequences if the isolated communist regime does not comply.

Jittery nations have warned a test would unravel regional security and possibly trigger an arms race.

A midday incursion Saturday by North Korean troops into the southern side of the no-man's-land separating North and South Korea only stoked the unease.

South Korean soldiers rattled off 40 warning shots at the five communist troops who crossed the center line of the Demilitarized Zone.

It was unclear whether the North Korean advance was intended as a provocation, or was an attempt to go fishing at a nearby stream, an official at South Korea's Joint Chiefs of Staff said on condition of anonymity, citing official policy. No one was hurt, and the North Koreans retreated.

While such border skirmishes are not unheard of, they are relatively rare. Saturday's incursion was only the second this year, the official said.

Meanwhile, world powers were stepping up diplomatic efforts to avert a nuclear test. Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe left for Beijing Sunday for talks with Chinese President Hu Jintao and will then go on to Seoul for talks with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun the following day.

"North Korea must stop its nuclear tests," Abe demanded as he was leaving for his summits. "I will discuss the situation with leaders of both countries to achieve that goal," he said.

"I want to hold summits to clear the sky for the future of our countries," Abe added.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said Saturday the United States was concerned about North Korea's threat to test its first atomic bomb and the department was closely monitoring the high tensions.

Also Saturday, South Korea's nuclear envoy announced he will visit Beijing on Monday for two days of talks with Chinese officials about the threatened nuclear test.

Japan's Foreign Ministry said it was prepared to push for punitive measures at the United Nations if the North goes ahead with the test.

"If North Korea conducts a nuclear weapons test despite the concerns expressed by international society, the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures," the ministry said.

A top Japanese ruling party official warned of further sanctions if North Korea conducts a nuclear test. Tokyo began stepping up trade restrictions on North Korea in July after it test-fired seven missiles, including a long-range rocket, into the waters between Japan and the Korean Peninsula.

DOJ_NMG_0078302

"We have already imposed financial measures ... but we may have to go further, like stopping imports and exports (from North Korea)" if it conducts a nuclear test, Shoichi Nakagawa, the Liberal Democratic Party's policy chief, said on public broadcaster NHK.

The U.N. statement adopted Friday expressed "deep concern" over North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it is planning a test.

The council acted amid speculation that a nuclear test could come on Sunday, the anniversary of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's appointment as head of the Korean Workers' Party in 1997.

Japanese Vice Foreign Minister Shotaro Yachi told Japan's TV Asahi: "Based on the development so far, it would be best to view that a test is possible this weekend."

The U.N. statement also urged North Korea to return to six-nation negotiations aimed at persuading the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions in exchange for security guarantees and badly needed economic aid.

Those talks, which involve the United States, China, Japan, Russia and North and South Korea, have been stalled since late last year, when North Korea boycotted the negotiations in response to American economic sanctions.

A North Korea expert in China, the North's closest ally, said only the removal of the sanctions could dissuade the North.

"North Korea has already made a decision to carry out a test," said Li Dunqiu of China's State Council Development Research Center, a Cabinet-level think tank. But "if the U.S. removes sanctions ... then tensions can be eased. Otherwise launching a nuclear test is unavoidable for North Korea."

The United States imposed economic restrictions on North Korea last year to punish it for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

North Korea said Tuesday it decided to act in the face of what it claimed was "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war," but gave no date for the test. Washington has repeatedly said it has no intention of invading North Korea.

Nuclear Test Threat Strains Korea Border (WT/AP)

The Washington Times/AP, October 8, 2006

SEOUL -- Tensions mounted over North Korea's threat to test its first atomic bomb, with shots ringing out yesterday along the border with South Korea and with Japan warning of harsh sanctions if Pyongyang goes nuclear.

With a test expected as early as today, the U.N. Security Council issued a stern statement Friday urging North Korea to abandon its nuclear ambitions and warning of unspecified consequences if the isolated, communist regime doesn't comply.

Jittery nations have warned that a test would unravel regional security and could trigger an arms race.

A midday incursion yesterday by North Korean troops into the southern side of the no man's land separating North and South Korea stoked the unease.

South Korean soldiers rattled off 40 warning shots at the five communist troops who crossed the center line of the demilitarized zone, the inter-Korean buffer.

It was not clear whether the North Korean advance was intended as a provocation or was an attempt to go fishing at a nearby stream, an official at South Korea's Joint Chiefs of Staff said on the condition of anonymity, citing official policy. No one was hurt, and the North Koreans retreated.

Such border skirmishes are rare. The incursion yesterday was the second this year, the official said.

Meanwhile, world powers were stepping up diplomatic efforts to avert a nuclear test. Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe was to visit Beijing today for talks with Chinese President Hu Jintao and then proceed to Seoul tomorrow for talks with South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun.

A State Department spokesman, Kurtis Cooper, said yesterday that the United States was concerned about North Korea's threat to test its first atomic bomb and that the department was closely monitoring the tensions.

"If North Korea conducts a nuclear weapons test despite the concerns expressed by international society, the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures," the ministry said.

Japan plans to step up economic sanctions against North Korea, tighten trade restrictions and freeze additional North Korea-linked bank accounts if a nuclear test occurs, Japan's Nihon Keizai newspaper reported.

North Korea's nuclear weapon would kill up to 200,000 people if used against a city such as Seoul or Tokyo, the London Sunday Telegraph reported in a story filed from Pyongyang, which cited unidentified Russian military specialists.

DOJ_NMG_0078303

They say that the weapon, with the same 20-kiloton yield as the bomb dropped on Nagasaki, is about 10 feet long and weighs 4 tons. It is too big to fit onto any missile Kim Jong-il's regime possesses, but if detonated above ground, it could destroy everything within five square miles.

The Nagasaki atomic bomb used plutonium, an element now being manufactured by North Korea, as its explosive core.

The U.N. statement adopted Friday urged North Korea to return to six-nation negotiations aimed at persuading the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions in exchange for security guarantees and badly needed economic aid.

Those talks -- which involve the United States, China, Japan, Russia and North and South Korea -- have been stalled since late last year, when North Korea boycotted the negotiations in response to American economic sanctions.

Shots Fired On Korean Border As Tensions Rise (WP/AP)

SEOUL, Oct. 7 -- Gunfire rang out Saturday along the heavily fortified border between North and South Korea as regional tensions mounted over North Korea's threat to test an atomic bomb for the first time.

Seoul's Reconciliation Bid Faces Test (AP)

DIAMOND MOUNTAIN, North Korea -- A hollow building frame, idle cranes and no construction workers in sight at this North Korean mountain resort are bitter reminders of dashed hopes for building a permanent reunion center for families separated by the Korean border.

The building's construction at this South Korean-run resort has been on hold since the North launched a barrage of missiles in July over international objections.

With North Korea now pledging to test an atomic bomb, the fate of projects such as these and other attempts to end decades of hostility across the world's last Cold War frontier hang in the balance.

A test "poses a real problem for South Korea because it tried 40-odd years of containment, and now it's committed to engagement," said Michael Breen, author of books about the peninsula and a longtime Korea watcher. "They know if you disengage that things are going to get worse."

South Korea has consistently pursued dialogue with the North since their leaders held their first summit in 2000. That approach has also caused a rift with its longtime ally the United States, which favors a harder line in pressuring the communist regime to give up its nuclear ambitions.

Diamond Mountain is the only place in North Korea that foreigners can easily visit. More than 1 million tourists -- mostly South Koreans -- have come to hike the unspoiled mountains since 1998, but the number of visitors has dropped sharply since the North's missile tests.

North Koreans at the resort are quick to blame the United States for the standoff over their nuclear program. They also complain that South Koreans side with "the U.S. imperialists" rather than their own brethren in the North -- echoing the propaganda issued daily by the country's state press.

"It's all U.S. imperialists' faults," Chae Jung Hae, a North Korean guide, said during a trip to the resort just before the North said it would carry out a nuclear test. "If it weren't for the North's military, we wouldn't have been able to defend the Korean Peninsula from the U.S. imperialists who constantly try to devour the North and the South."

Another North Korean guide, Paek Soon Hee, said: "If North and South join forces and stand up against the U.S., there is no way the U.S. can tell us to do this and that on our own matters."

South Korea has warned the North against conducting a nuclear test, while stressing that it won't abandon its engagement policy toward the North.

The current South Korean government -- which follows a so-called "sunshine policy" that won former President Kim Dae-jung a Nobel Peace Prize -- has also faced growing domestic calls to take a tougher line.

North Korea's Nuclear Intentions, Out There For All To See (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

FOR much of the nuclear age, nations that sought the ultimate weapon kept their intentions and test sites veiled in secrecy, hidden from public view and foreign governments. The first detonations by the United States and the Soviet Union were top secrets and India's test in 1998 caught American intelligence agencies by surprise.

No more, or so it seems. North Korea all but yelled "look at me" in announcing that it plans to conduct its first nuclear test, which experts say might come at any time or perhaps never. "Shouting from the rooftops is new," said Robert S. Norris, author of "Racing for the Bomb" (Steerforth Press, 2002). "It's an unusual way to go about asserting your status as a member of the nuclear club."

What lies behind this outbreak of atomic exhibitionism? While deciphering the intentions of one of the world's most cryptic regimes seems next to impossible, analysts say likely factors include North Korea's taste for bold propaganda as well as its awareness that new classes of satellite technology are making it increasingly hard to hide nuclear sites anyway.

In the bad old days of the cold war, nations that aspired to nuclear fearsomeness wrestled with a fundamental conflict. While seeking to project a terrifying image, they also wanted to keep many test details secret so adversaries would face greater difficulty in crafting potential countermeasures and knowing the exact dimensions of the threat.

"If it was a dud, you didn't want to announce that it was a dud," recalled Philip E. Coyle III, a former head of weapons testing at the Pentagon and former director of nuclear testing for the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, a weapon design center in California.

Nuclear powers hid vast industrial complexes in the middle of nowhere and often tried to keep their tests secret. In 1949, it took weeks for Washington to find out that Moscow had detonated a bomb that ended the American atomic monopoly.

The United States responded with a costly array of instruments meant to pull back the veil — everything from high-flying planes that could sniff out whiffs of stray radioactivity to giant microphones that listened for the distant nuclear rumbles. Jeffrey T. Richelson, who profiles the era in "Spying on the Bomb" (Norton, 2006), said the gargantuan effort cost billions.

Today, a new factor is opening the secretive art to the public: a generation of commercial satellites that can peer down from the heavens to see objects on the ground as small as two or three feet wide, enough to distinguish between a car and a truck. The orbiting eyes can ogle hot tubs and backyard trampolines as well as troop movements and dictators' lairs, undermining what was once a government monopoly on such reconnaissance.

Last week, CNN broadcast satellite images of what it called a potential test site located in a valley in North Korea not far from its northeastern coast. Pentagon sources, CNN reported, confirmed suspicious movements there of people, equipment and vehicles that tended to buttress North Korea's claim that it could detonate a bomb.

GeoEye, a provider of commercial satellite pictures based in Dulles, Va., made available to The New York Times images of the same military complex, but focusing on a rocky site farther up the rugged valley. On July 31, the company's satellite looked down from a height of nearly 300 miles, its camera and telescope zooming in on what appears to be a tunnel entrance dug into the flank of a high mountain and, nearby, buildings that could store mining equipment.

"We provide customers with a map-accurate view of the ground they can't get any other way," said Mark E. Brender, a company spokesman. "Eyes in the sky are good for governments in the region who are concerned about this, and good for customers who need to know as much as they can about what may be going on in North Korea."

American officials say government spy satellites monitor about a half-dozen suspicious sites in North Korea but have also focused on the military base.

The much-scrutinized base would be an ideal spot for North Korea to set off an underground nuclear blast if it wanted to make a splash. A senior American intelligence official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of federal secrecy rules, noted that the mountainous redoubt "is a place they know we're looking at."

Along with lots of civilians. Google Earth, on the Web at earth.google.com, features some of the best public snooping on the isolated base, its software combining close-up images and altitude data so the surrounding mountains rise up in three dimensions. A viewer can zoom overhead like a spy plane. The images come from DigitalGlobe, a satellite company in Longmont, Colo.

Google views of the tunneling area, near 41.279 degrees north latitude and 129.087 east longitude, show a set of industrial buildings and what appears to be a mine entrance.

For North Korea, the emergence of the commercial spies would seem to cut two ways, either reinforcing its propaganda effort or threatening to undermine it by exposing a ruse.

And paradoxically, the best monitor of its actions, the world's largest and most sensitive network meant to detect nuclear blasts, run out of Vienna by the United Nations, is powerless to judge the North's real intentions until there is a test. This network, with its global arrays of hundreds of sensors, is meant to police a shaky global ban on the explosive tests, mainly by listening for the faint reverberations of shock waves.

If North Korea decides to go ahead and press the button, this network will help discern exactly what North Korea has succeeded in developing by way of nuclear arms — or not.

"Until they do, people can argue about their capability," said Dr. Coyle, the weapons expert. "But once they test, there's no question. The world will know."

A US `invasion' Of Korea (BOS)

By Catherine Lutz

The Boston Globe, October 8, 2006

AS WORLD attention is drawn to North Korea's missile launches and nuclear program, many South Koreans are attuned to a threat much closer to home. They have watched a group of rice farmers in the small village of Daechuri near the city of Pyongtaek attempt to defend themselves against invasion by the US military. The farmers' struggle against expansion of a nearby US military base has become a rallying point for Koreans who see their country being further militarized and their security and chances for reunification put at risk.

In May, South Korean police and soldiers descended on a schoolhouse where rice farmers and their supporters were resisting eviction. The police bloodied heads, destroyed the school, and backhoed rice fields and irrigation systems to prevent spring planting. They were sent by the Korean Ministry of Defense, at the behest of the US government, to claim a large swath of land to expand Camp Humphrey . Already covering 2 square miles, the base is slated to swallow an additional 2,851 acres.

Part of a grand plan of global military base restructuring announced by US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in 2003, the Pyongtaek base is meant to take in soldiers and equipment from closing military installations near the de militarized zone and in Seoul. However, the bases' relocation to Pyongtaek is part of a plan to use the bases to strike at will anywhere in Asia and to contain China. It is this ``expeditionary'' or aggressive role of the bases that is behind concurrent US negotiations with South Korea, seeking ``strategic flexibility'' to use the forces based there throughout Asia. Such an agreement would change the original defensive purpose of the base. So it concerns people across the region, who see remilitarization, arms races, and intensified danger where the United States simply claims realignment. Recent US and allied military exercises off Guam, itself targeted for a massive US military buildup, were of unprecedented size, and North Korea's missile launch might be seen as a response to that provocation.

While the arguments for this restructuring suggest the United States and Korea are mutual and equal allies, Korea in fact remains a semi sovereign state under US control in many respects. Most strikingly, Korean troops come under the command of an American officer in wartime. US military plans in Asia, then, necessarily implicate the Koreans and draw them into conflict with their neighbors. Imagining China as the new national enemy is a process well underway in Washington, and the Koreans know all too well that their surgical twinning to US strategic plans will make them China's enemy as well.

All of this is playing out within the context of a difficult relationship between the more than 30,000 US soldiers based around Korea and the local citizens who see them as a source of prostitution, crime, and pollution. Koreans can point to two young girls crushed by US tanks in 2002, multiple rapes and rape-murders of Korean women, and a recent leaked report showing stratospheric levels of soil and water contamination at closing US bases.

In Daechuri, the farmers have been holding a candlelight vigil every night for the last two years in a Quonset hut on the school grounds, under the thunderous thut-thut-thut of US helicopters passing in and out of Camp Humphrey . Supporters have come in from around the country by the thousands, members of groups from across a wide range of Korea's civil society, still vibrant with an enthusiasm for the democracy they achieved only in 1987 after years of brutal dictatorship (armed and supported by the United States). While a majority of Koreans want to see the US military leave, powerful business interests, conservative Christians, and an older generation convinced of the value of the US presence continue to support Washington's military plans and Korean annual payments of at least $625 million toward their execution.

The justification for the US military buildup across Asia is the advance of political and economic freedom. The residents of Daechuri might be forgiven for being suspicious of such claims. Some of the village's oldest residents with whom I spoke last fall remember the Japanese evicting their parents for a military base during Korea's pre war annexation. The US Army took over and expanded the base in World War II, and now, for some, their third eviction in the name of a misconstrued vision of military rather than human security is imminent.

Halting the eviction of Daechuri's farmers would be a good first step toward demilitarizing the peninsula and the region. Their homes are being destroyed in the name of America 's citizens, and we have more power than anyone to reverse the escalating rhetoric and reality of arms in Asia by calling on the US government to halt its regarrisoning of Korea, Guam, and Asia-Pacific region.

U.S. Project Could Start Atomic War, Experts Warn (HC/Hearst)

By Eric Rosenberg

Houston Chronicle/Hearst, October 8, 2006

Refitted missiles may sound alarm and prompt nuclear response by Russia

WASHINGTON — A Pentagon project to modify its deadliest nuclear missile for use as a conventional weapon against targets such as North Korea and Iran could unwittingly spark an atomic war, two weapons experts warned Thursday.

Russian military officers might misconstrue a submarine-launched conventional D-5 intercontinental ballistic missile and conclude that Russia is under nuclear attack, said MIT's Ted Postol, a physicist and professor of science, technology and national security policy, and Pavel Podvig, a physicist and weapons specialist at Stanford University.

"Any launch of a long-range non-nuclear armed sea or land ballistic missile will cause an automated alert of the Russian early warning system," Postol told reporters.

The triggering of an alert wouldn't necessarily precipitate a retaliatory hail of Russian nuclear missiles, Postol said. Nevertheless, he said, "there can be no doubt that such an alert will greatly increase the chances of a nuclear accident involving strategic nuclear forces."

Podvig said that launching conventional versions of a missile from a submarine that normally carries nuclear warheads "expands the possibility for a misunderstanding so widely that it is hard to contemplate."

Mixing conventional and nuclear D-5s on a U.S. Trident submarine "would be very dangerous," Podvig said, because the Russians have no way of discriminating between the two types of missiles once they are launched.

Russia, unlike the U.S., lacks sufficient satellites to supplement radar and confirm whether missile launches are false alarms.

Russian President Vladimir Putin warned that the project would increase the danger of accidental nuclear war.

DOJ_NMG_0078307

"The media and expert circles are already discussing plans to use intercontinental ballistic missiles to carry non-nuclear warheads," he said in May. "The launch of such a missile could ... provoke a full-scale counterattack using strategic nuclear forces."

Accidental nuclear war is not so far-fetched.

In 1995, Russia initially interpreted the launch of a Norwegian scientific rocket as the onset of a U.S. nuclear attack. Then-President Boris Yeltsin activated his "nuclear briefcase" in the first stages of a retaliatory strike before the mistake was discovered.

Rice's Tour Of Mideast Yields Little Progress On Key Issues (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 7 -- It was a tough week for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in the Middle East. On four issues pivotal to the future of the world's most volatile region, U.S. diplomatic efforts made no visible progress or came up against unexpected resistance during her five-day tour, according to Arab and Israeli officials and analysts.

On Iraq, Arab-Israeli peace, democracy promotion and fostering a so-called moderate bloc of Arab states to stand together against militancy, Rice pressed at each of six stops for new energy or more decisive action. Many of the Arab leaders she met share U.S. fears about the region's future, but there is a growing divide even with Washington's closest allies over what needs to be done, at what pace, in what order and by whom, according to Arab officials interviewed at each stop.

Several Arab officials and analysts privately dismissed Rice's tour as a cheerleading trip without substance. Others questioned the viability of the Bush administration's Middle East policy.

"It is obvious to anyone that U.S. policy built after 9/11 -- including Iraq and the 'you're with us or against us' attitude -- has now come to a dead end," said Paul Salem, the U.S.-educated director of the new Beirut center of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and son of Lebanon's former pro-American foreign minister.

The United States and the Arab world are now engaged in a chicken-and-egg argument over what happens next. Arab governments -- including Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and five oil-rich Persian Gulf sheikdoms -- all appealed to Rice to revive U.S. leadership to break deadlocks on several fronts because they have so far been unable to do it alone, Arab officials said. But Rice basically told governments at each stop that they must first take difficult steps to create conditions more conducive to greater U.S. involvement, U.S. officials said.

Rice did make some progress on a fifth issue, Iran, on her last stop in London, where six major powers agreed Friday to pursue sanctions for Tehran's failure to suspend nuclear enrichment, a process that can be used to develop a nuclear weapon. But on that question, too, the road ahead remains rocky for winning agreement at the U.N. Security Council on what punitive measures to take, U.S. officials conceded.

Rice insisted Friday that her exploratory trip to Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel, the West Bank and two Iraqi cities was beneficial as the Bush administration moves toward "intensive" discussions about next steps after the month-long war between Hezbollah and Israel.

"I'm very glad I came out at this time," she told reporters traveling with her. "I've really enjoyed this trip to the Middle East, because I wanted to come out in the post-Lebanon period and get a real sense of what people were thinking. . . . I have a much better sense of how the Lebanese events and this period are affecting people's calculations on what needs to be done."

Rice acknowledged that the Arabs and Israel appealed for new momentum to break the escalating cycle of violence and political division in several strategic countries.

"This is an absolutely crucial time in the Middle East, and I heard in every single place that this isn't a time to stand still," Rice said. "Everyone understands that a lot is changing in the Middle East and that we need to have a positive agenda."

U.S. officials say their goal is to find ways to fill the political vacuum that has developed in the region -- before militants or Islamic radicals fill even more of it. Over the past year, Hamas won parliamentary elections and formed a government in the Palestinian territories, the Muslim Brotherhood became the largest legal opposition force in Egypt, and Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah emerged as a hero in the Muslim world for challenging Israel and surviving. Also, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has taken some of the most defiant positions adopted by his country's leadership since the early days after the 1979 revolution.

Rice's trip, U.S. officials said, was partly intended to signal that the Bush administration is still fully engaged and interested, despite the growing unpopularity of the Iraq war at home and election season questions about its broader Middle East policy. But Rice's talks with nine Arab governments and Israel contrasted starkly with her earlier visits in the lack of specific initiatives. A senior Egyptian official called U.S. policy "increasingly unrealistic."

A wide range of senior Arab officials, who all spoke on background because of sensitive diplomacy with Washington, asserted that the administration's brick-by-brick approach to transforming the Middle East is so minimalist that it is unlikely to make significant progress during President Bush's remaining time in office. They also complained that Bush's personal role in the Middle East is nonexistent when compared with his early hands-on involvement in bringing Arabs and Israelis together or his public promises to ensure an end to more than six decades of war through a two-state solution.

The greatest pressure put on Rice at every stop was to do something to jump-start the moribund Arab-Israeli peace process, which Arab leaders almost unanimously described as the key to addressing other flash points as well. Yet Rice found herself negotiating some of the same issues she was engaged in last November, such as movement of people and trade in and out of the Gaza Strip. And Israeli withdrawal from parts of the West Bank, which had been promised by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, is even further away after the Lebanon war undermined his leverage and popularity.

After Rice met with Iraqi officials in Baghdad, some privately expressed concern about new tensions with Washington over the pace and sequence of handling the major challenges facing the government there, such as reconciliation and disarming militias. They complained that the Bush administration was working on its own schedule and not taking into account the potential for backlash among Iraqis if their leaders took controversial steps precipitously.

Senior Arab officials and analysts also said U.S. efforts to promote democracy and foster an anti-militant bloc were contradictory, because the moderates the United States is trying to rally against radical Islamic groups are some of region's most autocratic governments.

In Arab countries, said Salem, "the United States now looks more afraid of elections than some of the governments themselves."

Rice Wraps Up Snag-filled Trip To Middle East And London (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, October 8, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice wrapped up a six-day visit to the Middle East and London that was marked by multiple snags, both in terms of results and images.

Trouble began even before she left Washington Sunday night: A run of tell-all books on US President George W. Bush's handling of Iraq and the war on terror cast a harsh light on Rice, once the diva of the administration.

So an angry Rice began her tour with denials that she had ignored an urgent warning from George Tenet, who was CIA director, about the risk of an Al-Qaeda attack against the United States, two months before September 11, 2001.

Then she traveled to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia and Cairo to try to rally a front of eight moderate Arab governments to vigorously fight extremism and terrorism in the Middle East.

However, what she obtained was a unified message from Washington's Arab allies: the US government must engage seriously in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, or the new Middle East that she wants will never emerge.

The message was apparently received.

"I'm going to go back for extensive discussions with the president ... and with the national security principals because this is an absolutely crucial time in the Middle East," Rice said.

"And I heard in every single place this isn't a time to stand still in terms of a policy in the Middle East," Rice said.

She then traveled to Jerusalem and the West Bank town of Ramallah to support the moderate president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmud Abbas, while his Fatah faction and the Hamas Islamist movement that heads the government are locked in clashes that have left dozens dead.

However, she obtained only limited commitments from the Israelis to ease the humanitarian plight of the Palestinians.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said that the Karni crossing for goods and people between Israel and the Gaza Strip would be re-opened soon, without giving a date.

The Jewish state made no concession on an eventual exchange of prisoners and made no specific commitment to unfreeze funds owed the Palestinian Authority.

Then Rice traveled to Iraq to back the national reconciliation plan of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, but the snags piled up for the secretary of state, who is normally used to carrying out her foreign tours briskly.

While she never stops speaking of progress in Iraq, her plane had to circulate above Baghdad airport for nearly 45 minutes to wait for the end of a rocket attack in order to land.

She left a day later for Arbil, in Iraqi Kurdistan, but what should have appeared in the media as a virtuous effort to convince the Kurds to share their oil wealth with other Iraqis was beset by more difficulties.

The military plane loaned to the secretary of state suffered technical problems, forcing one of the world's most powerful women to wait for more than two hours for another plane.

DOJ_NMG_0078309

The trouble caused her to miss the start of a crucial meeting of six world powers on tackling the Iran nuclear crisis, her top priority. In the end, she managed to make the meeting for 45 minutes.

However, she and her counterparts from Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia had to pass up the group photograph, traditionally used to mark a display of unity, because some of them had appointments to keep.

Rice's Baffling Mideast Trip (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Dodging bullets while hyping progress is not a convincing performance by the secretary of state.

AFTER CIRCLING THE BAGHDAD airport for 40 minutes because of mortar and rocket fire, traveling by helicopter to the Green Zone to avoid the deadly bomb-strewn highway into the city and holding a meeting with President Jalal Talabani in darkness because the power was suddenly cut off, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held a news conference Thursday to talk about all the progress being made in Iraq.

This kind of clueless happy talk in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary might produce great material for political satirists, but it's not very encouraging for those looking for signs of hope in the Middle East. Rice's recently completed six-day trip to the region, which included her sixth visit as secretary of State to Israel and the Palestinian territories, probably ranks as her least productive. She spent most of her time talking with leaders who don't trust her about issues they'd rather not discuss.

In Egypt and Saudi Arabia on Tuesday, Rice met with leaders of eight moderate Arab governments whom she had hoped to persuade to join U.S. efforts to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions. Instead, they were more interested in pushing for a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. President Bush has said the United States will not impose a settlement; Arab leaders want at least as much focus on Israel as Iran.

The next stop was the West Bank. Last year, Rice was able to broker a deal to open border crossings between the Gaza Strip and Israel, but they have been mostly closed since Palestinian guerrillas captured an Israeli soldier on June 25. It's critical that they be reopened soon because Palestinian crops are nearly ready for harvest, and if they can't be exported, it will result in more suffering than the territories are already enduring in the face of an economic embargo. When Rice talked about the crossings with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, he was noncommittal.

Then onto Iraq. After some fruitless meetings with the Iraqi leadership, which is trying to govern a country in which political parties have devolved into armed camps at war with one another, Rice turned her attention to the comparatively prosperous and peaceful Kurdish north, which is threatening to secede in a dispute over oil. Even as she was meeting with regional President Massoud Barzani on Friday, news was breaking that a Kurdish lawmaker and his driver had been kidnapped and killed, the first legislator from the current parliament to be murdered.

No visit by a U.S. diplomat could begin to ease the discord that has wracked the region for decades. If there were a silver bullet for solving the Israel-Palestinian conflict or the war in Iraq, it would have been fired long ago. As Rice says, "what is necessary is to go step by step on the ground to really improve conditions." The worry now is that every step, including by the administration, is going in the wrong direction.

'He Was Like A Brother To Me' (NSWK)

On the 25th anniversary of Anwar Sadat's assassination, Jimmy Carter discusses the Mideast conflict

The Camp David accords that U.S. President Jimmy Carter negotiated in 1978 between Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin were supposed to be the beginning of the end of the Middle East's terrible conflicts. Yet the killing goes on, and the situation in the region continues to deteriorate. In his book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid" (Simon and Schuster), to be published next month, Carter takes a tough look at the reasons why. Last week, on the 25th anniversary of Sadat's assassination, the 82-year-old former president spoke by telephone with NEWSWEEK's Christopher Dickey about the critical turning points in the long struggle to build on the accords, and where the process might go from here.

NEWSWEEK: Do you remember the moment when you heard that Anwar Sadat had been assassinated?

Jimmy Carter: Absolutely. I got a call directly from Cairo. I was at home and they told me at first that Sadat had been attacked but had only been slightly wounded. So I prayed that he would recover. And then they called me back within the hour to say that Sadat had been killed. It was like losing my own brother because Sadat was the closest of all foreign leaders to me. I probably have met more than 100 foreign leaders and he was the boldest and most courageous and most effective leader I've known.

DOJ_NMG_0078310

Yet some Egyptians and other Arabs say he moved too far too fast, that his people weren't ready to make peace with Israel.

I don't think he was ahead of the vast majority of Egyptians. Obviously he parted ways with a fringe element of fanatics who later assassinated him. But behind the scenes, some of the other Arab leaders gave me every encouragement for the peace treaty and for the Camp David accords. And that included Saudi Arabia, Jordan and some others who later, because of a desire for unanimity among the Arab League, boycotted Sadat. But I don't think that he was ahead of the vast majority of his people. In fact, they still look upon the Israel-Egyptian treaty as one of the greatest things that ever happened to them.

But it's been a cold peace. Israel calls it a cold peace. There has never been a real mixing of the people, the Israelis and the Egyptians, back and forth, for instance, in serious tourism.

Well, that's not exactly true. When I was over there in the early '80s, I went up the Nile River and I visited the ancient sites and there was a vast array of Israeli tourists there. And I remember once they sang a very wonderful song to me and came over by the busload to thank me for making it possible for them to experience these tourist visits. But I don't think there ever has been a reciprocal visitation among Egyptians into Israel.

Why do you think that is?

Well, I'm not really sure. First of all I don't think that the Egyptian culture is all that highly attuned to visiting the holy places in Israel, with the exception of the Temple Mount. I don't think there was that encouragement to visit, although it was only later, when Israel had invaded Lebanon and was occupying Lebanon that Mubarak tightened down and put out the word that Israel had violated the spirit of the Camp David accords. Still, he didn't disavow the treaty.

Do you think the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon was the real turning point?

Well, they invaded Lebanon in '82 and they stayed there 18 years. As you know, they didn't come out until 2000.

Looking back, you have the accords, the treaty, then Sadat murdered in 1981, a few months later the completion of Israel's withdrawal from the Egyptian Sinai, and then, very quickly, Israel invades Lebanon.

That's true. Israel's withdrawal from Sinai was obviously the high point of the agreement because the Israelis did observe very carefully all the terms of the treaty. In fact, you say 'cold peace' and I wouldn't disagree with that now, but the fact is that not a word of that treaty that was so carefully negotiated has ever been violated.

Why do you think the peace hasn't grown warmer? Do you think both sides are to blame? Or do you think that either the Arabs have refused to make a real peace or Israel's actions have been too provocative?

You have to remember that the Camp David accords made some very substantial demands on Israel: that is, Israel agreed to withdraw its political and military forces from the West Bank and Gaza. And it agreed for the Palestinians to have full autonomy, and so forth. And Begin also agreed at Camp David to forgo the building of further settlements. Those kinds of agreements have obviously not been honored and I think despite those factors, which certainly have aroused consternation in some Arab countries and I would say coolness in Egypt, the treaty between Egypt and Israel has survived.

If you look at milestones since then, another turning point was the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995.

Out of the Camp David accords came the effort to have the Oslo Agreement between Rabin and Shimon Peres on one side and Yasir Arafat on the other. And it was out of that that the Palestine Liberation Organization was recognized by Israel. And there were further promises there for substantial withdrawal of Israel from the occupied territories and also for an agreement that over a five-year period, the full terms of the Camp David accords, including implementation of United Nations Security Council Reslutions 242 and 338 would be honored.

Obviously, at the time the Oslo Accords were consummated there were some prominent Israelis, including Ariel Sharon and Benjamin Netanyahu and others who disavowed the Oslo Accords. Sharon said "the Oslo Accords are national suicide for Israel." Despite that, Rabin went ahead with the early stages of the Oslo Agreement, including the formation of the Palestinian National Authority and permitting Arafat to be elected president and form a governing council or parliament.

I was over there, with Arafat at Arafat's request and with Israel's approval, to help hold that election. And it was an honest and fair and peaceful election and Arafat became the leader of the Palestinian National Authority. Subsequently, with Rabin's assassination and with the election of Netanyahu and later Sharon, of course the Oslo Agreement has not gone anywhere.

Is there a way to move forward now with the peace process?

Yes. We have a series of unequivocal and undeviating standards based on United Nations resolution 242 which Begin accepted without question, every word of it: that is, the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and the pledge to withdraw from occupied territories. That's still the basis of all the agreements. That was the basis of Camp David; that was the basis of Oslo. That is the international law. And that is also the basis for the so-called "Roadmap for Peace." And on several occasions the Israeli government has confirmed that commitment. And it has been approved not only by the Prime Minister at that time, but also ratified by the Knesset.

DOJ_NMG_0078311

But the process doesn't actually seem to move forward.

You're right.

I sometimes detect in your writings over the last few years, Mr. President, what really seems to be frustration if not anger with Israel on this score.

Well, I wouldn't say anger. I would say that in the last 30 years or so one of my main commitments in life, certainly in international affairs has been to bring peace to Israel. That has been a major goal and I've supported every move that's been made to bring a peace to Israel and acceptance by all the Arab countries of Israel's right to exist to live in peace. But I am frustrated when terrorist activities cause a serious setback as they have among the Palestinians and earlier by the PLO with cross-border raids, and by Hizbullah, and the reluctance of Israel to withdraw from occupied territories. All those things concern me very much because I see them as a major obstacle to a final peace for Israel with acknowledgement by the Palestinians and all of the Arabs of Israel's right to exist and the right of the Palestinians to have a state side-by-side with Israel.

Yet the title of your new book "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid" suggests that things could be running in an extremely ugly direction.

I use the word "not" to discourage that happening. What I want to see in the future is not apartheid, but I want to see peace.

Do you think it is possible to make peace with an organization like Hamas now running the Palestinian government?

Yes, I think within the bounds of a unity government, which is not beyond the realm of possibility—they have been on the verge of it recently—I think that the acceptance of that could lead to an accommodation among the Palestinian political parties, Fatah and Hamas. The Hamas leaders have stated publicly and often that they would accept any peace agreement negotiated between the Palestinian people and Israel if the Palestinians were permitted to approve it in a referendum. That was one of the premises of the Camp David accords: after any agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, that it should be submitted to the Palestinians for approval. So those things stay below the surface, they are still there.

This is purely speculative, but how different do you think things would have been if Sadat had remained alive?

The treaty has held up. And of course that has removed the preeminent military threat to Israel. There were four wars before that treaty over a period of 25 years. Some of them were quite serious threats to Israel; certainly the 1973 war was. And they were all lead by Egypt. To remove Egypt from the military equation obviously has been a major factor in protecting Israel from existential threat by its neighbors. I think that is still very significant. It is a document that has been binding.

And yet leadership is important in determining the quality of a peace: the question of whether the people on both sides can actually support it.

That's true. I don't think that there is any doubt though that the people on both sides do support that treaty. Although I can't argue with you when you call it a cold peace—it is a peace! And the Israelis have almost full confidence that they are not going to be attacked by Egypt, and I think that if you get any kind of opinion polling in Egypt you'll find an overwhelming portion of the Egyptians support the treaty that prevents Israel and Egypt going to war again.

Nobody, or almost nobody, on either side would seriously like to go back to war.

Right, well that's what the treaty does.

Even though provisions for the Palestinians and on many other fronts have not been observed by Israel.

Remember, that is not in the Egypt-Israel treaty. That was actually in the Camp David accords that were also signed and which included the framework for the treaty.

So, do you think it would have made a big difference if Sadat had lived?

I think it would have, yes. Because Sadat had a lot of influence on the Palestinians and Egypt has always been the preeminent Arab country, at least militarily. But I can't really answer that question, because as you know it wasn't until after Sadat was killed that Israel decided to go into Lebanon. And a big question in my mind is: would Israel have invaded Lebanon in '82 if Sadat had still been alive? I've always had doubts about that, because it could very well have been that if Sadat was living [the Lebanon invasion] would have caused a rejection of the peace treaty by Egypt. But that is just a matter of hypothetical conjecture.

Still, the personalities are important.

Of course Sadat looked on that treaty and the Camp David accords as inseparable. The Camp David accords, with all of Israel's commitment to the Palestinians, and the treaty with Egypt was one unit. And later I don't think that Mubarak had that commitment. He didn't feel that he was an author of and a party to the agreements by Israel concerning the Palestinians. But he did cherish the part of the agreements that I negotiated that related to Egypt.

Looking to the present day, I know you've been very critical of the wall that Israel is building on the West Bank.

The wall and the Jordan River actually completely circles what is left of the West Bank.

Do you see that as a sign of "apartheid" to come?

DOJ_NMG_0078312

It's a sign of division, obviously, between the two. I make it clear in my book that when I refer to apartheid I'm not talking about racism. But it is certainly a division and there is no place where the wall separates Palestinians from Israelis—the wall in its entirety separates Palestinians from other Palestinians. It's completely within the West Bank, and sometimes miles and miles within the West Bank. I've got an entire chapter in my forthcoming book describing the wall in detail, and in fact the cover of the book will be a picture of the wall.

Do you see the wall as an insurmountable obstacle to peace?

Yes, as presently located it is an insurmountable obstacle to peace.

Inside Hezbollah, Big Miscalculations (WP)

By Anthony Shadid, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

Militia Leaders Caught Off Guard By Scope of Israel's Response in War

BEIRUT -- The meeting on July 12 was tense, tinged with desperation. A few hours earlier, in a brazen raid, Hezbollah guerrillas had infiltrated across the heavily fortified border and captured two Israeli soldiers. Lebanon's prime minister summoned Hussein Khalil, an aide to Hezbollah's leader, to his office at the Serail, the palatial four-story government headquarters of red tile and colonnades in Beirut's downtown.

"What have you done?" Prime Minister Fouad Siniora asked him.

Khalil reassured him, according to an account by two officials briefed by Siniora, one of whom later confirmed it with the prime minister. "It will calm down in 24 to 48 hours."

More technocrat than politician, Siniora was skeptical. He pointed to the Gaza Strip, which Israeli forces had stormed after Palestinian militants abducted a soldier less than three weeks earlier. Israeli warplanes had blasted bridges and Gaza's main power station.

Calmly, Khalil looked at him. "Lebanon is not Gaza," he answered.

What followed was a 33-day war, the most devastating chapter in Lebanon's history since the civil war ended in 1990, as Hezbollah unleashed hundreds of missiles on Israel and the Israeli military shattered Lebanon's infrastructure and invaded its south. Nearly three months later, parts of the country remain a shambles and tens of thousands are still homeless as winter approaches.

In speeches and iconography, Hezbollah has cast the war as a "divine victory." But a reconstruction of the period before and soon after the seizure of the soldiers reveals a series of miscalculations on the part of the 24-year-old movement that defies its carefully cultivated reputation for planning and caution. Hezbollah's leadership sometimes waited days to evacuate the poor, densely populated neighborhood in southern Beirut that is its stronghold. Only as Israeli warplanes began reducing the headquarters to rubble did they realize the scope of what the Israeli military intended. Hezbollah fighters were still planning to train in Iran the very month that the soldiers were seized; Hezbollah leaders in Beirut had assured Lebanese officials of a relatively uneventful summer.

"They were prisoners of their assumptions," said Nizar Abdel-Kader, a retired Lebanese general.

The outcome of the war, still a matter of perceptions, reveals both the strengths and weaknesses of Hezbollah, perhaps the world's best-organized guerrilla group. The movement, even by the admission of its leaders, misjudged the Israeli response. But by virtue of its complex infrastructure and preparations -- years spent digging tunnels, positioning weapons, upgrading its arsenal and carrying out surveillance along the border -- Hezbollah survived.

"We were always prepared because we always knew that the day would come when we have to fight this war," said Hussein Hajj Hassan, a Hezbollah member of parliament. "We also knew that God was with us. He was with us."

Timur Goksel, a former spokesman and adviser to the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon, put it more bluntly: "Hezbollah did not expect this response, but they were ready for it."The Militia as Deterrent

On March 2, to great fanfare, leaders from across Lebanon's fractured political landscape began what was hailed as a National Dialogue. It drew together implacable foes: Walid Jumblatt, the chieftain of the Druze sect, sat across from Hasan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader; the two regularly traded thinly veiled insults. Michel Aoun, the most popular Christian leader, sat with Saad Hariri, a political novice who derives clout as the son of a former prime minister slain in a car bombing in 2005. For months, they tackled issues that threatened to tear the country apart: relations with Syria, the presence of armed Palestinians and the future of the isolated, pro-Syrian president.

Last on the agenda were Hezbollah's weapons.

Backed by France and the United States, U.N. Resolution 1559 was passed in September 2004. Under it, all militias in Lebanon -- diplomatic phrasing for Hezbollah -- were supposed to disarm. Five months later, Hariri's father, Rafiq, was assassinated, setting in motion events that forced Syria's withdrawal from Lebanon after a 29-year military presence. Deprived of the cover of one of its two main allies -- Iran is the other --Hezbollah was left relatively isolated, and its weapons became an even more pressing issue in a country whose sectarian tension was as pronounced as at any time since the civil war began.

Virtually no one expected the Lebanese army and its meager, outdated arsenal to disarm Hezbollah, which has cultivated broad support among Shiite Muslims through a variety of social services, political representation and a language of empowerment that resonates with the community's long sense of disenfranchisement. Only consensus could reach a solution short of strife.

On June 8, at the parliament building on place de l'Etoile, amid a security blanket that shut downtown, Nasrallah offered his defense at the National Dialogue. Dressed in clerical robes and a black turban, he spoke for more than an hour, participants recalled. Lebanese often remark on Nasrallah's highly organized speaking style; this speech was no different. Point by point, confident and determined but not arrogant, he explained why the militia -- what Hezbollah calls the Islamic resistance -- should retain its arms, from guns to thousands of missiles.

First, Nasrallah said, it provided a cover to the Lebanese state; in any battle with Israel, Hezbollah would suffer the consequences of Israeli reprisals, not the rest of the country. Second, Hezbollah had created a deterrent -- in the words of one participant, "a balance of fear and terror." Third, he said, the Lebanese army alone was not enough to protect a border that Israeli routinely violates by air and sometimes by sea.

In that session and the next on June 29, Hezbollah's critics at the dialogue questioned, sometimes sharply, the supposed balance of terror.

"I can reach Haifa and beyond Haifa," Nasrallah was quoted as answering them, according to Marwan Hamadeh, the telecommunications minister and a critic of Hezbollah who took part in the dialogue. Israel would not risk a Hezbollah missile attack, Nasrallah added, which could strike its petrochemical industry and the northern third of the country, including some of its most populated regions.

"He considered his potential threat as his deterrent," Hamadeh said, "that Israel would not escalate."

At the time, much of the talk was hypothetical. Participants were put at ease by what they took as Nasrallah's reassurance that nothing would disrupt the crucial tourist season, one of the Mediterranean country's lone patches of economic vitality. "He said this summer would be a quiet summer," Hamadeh recalled. "He said all the actions they would do would be reminders of their presence."

But almost as a footnote in Nasrallah's speech was a reiteration of a promise he had made many times before: the need to capture Israeli soldiers as leverage to win the release of three Lebanese prisoners. Hezbollah had tried before, in November 2005.

"He didn't say it to take approval," said Boutros Harb, a member of parliament, who sat three seats away from Nasrallah. Harb flicked his wrist in a flippant gesture. "He mentioned it like you'd write in the margins of a text."

"It didn't draw the attention of anyone at all."Preparing for Ground War

Goksel, the former spokesman for the U.N. force, has watched Hezbollah's evolution since its incarnation in the wake of Israel's devastating 1982 invasion of Lebanon. He recalled an incident in 2001-02, more than a year after the Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon. In two locales near the border, Khiam in the east and on the road to Naqoura on the coast, Hezbollah brought out excavation equipment and trucks, hauling away dirt. Men hung around, looking suspicious. And over as many as six months, in plain sight, tunnels were dug into the limestone of rugged southern Lebanon.

"We were meant to see these things," he said. "They were not making any effort to stop us looking."

At the time, he said he now believes, Hezbollah, farther from view, was digging other tunnels around Labouna, Aita al-Shaab and Maroun al-Ras, all along the Israeli border, that they employed for ambush and cover in combat to sometimes devastating effect during this summer's war.

"Looking back, they really fooled us on that one," Goksel added.

While Hezbollah's missiles were supposed to deter an all-out Israeli assault, the movement, by its own admission, also began preparing for a ground war almost from the day Israeli forces left in May 2000. Most of the militiamen were drawn from their villages and kept their weapons at home. Abdel-Kader said the town or village became the unit of defense, where other arms were stashed. The towns, in turn, were organized into three or four sectors, with a regional command.

"All the weapons were in the right place," he said. "They didn't need to mobilize."

Elias Hanna, another retired general, said the arsenal was updated over the past two years. In addition to rockets, anti-tank weapons were ferried through Syria; their use required at least some degree of training and their sophistication surprised Israeli forces.

As important to Hezbollah was surveillance. Goksel recalled fighters sometimes sitting for three months on the border "and they would write about everything that moves." He added, "They are the most patient watchers in the world."

DOJ_NMG_0078314

On July 11, Goksel and seven students from a university class he was teaching stood on the Qasmiya Bridge, which spans the Litani River, the natural border of southern Lebanon. "I said, 'Look at this bridge. If anything happens, this is the first target.' " He wasn't worried, though. It was summer, and towns were filled with vacationing Shiite expatriates, many of them Hezbollah supporters. "I've never been so wrong in my life," he said.

The cross-border raid was carried out at 9:05 a.m. the next day. Soon after, Israeli warplanes struck the Qasmiya Bridge.

Three months later, Hezbollah's timing remains puzzling.

"They don't attempt adventures. They're not adventurous types," Goksel said. In every operation, they would project "what it means for Shiites, what it means for the party, what it means for Lebanon, what it means for Syria."

He paused. "One wonders if that process collapsed somehow," he said.

Hezbollah officials have hewed to the line Nasrallah delivered that night: They had long telegraphed such an operation, and the opportunity arose. Nasrallah has acknowledged that they did not anticipate the Israeli response, though Hezbollah's officials say they believe the Israelis were planning to carry out such a campaign by this October. In statement after statement, Nasrallah has dismissed charges by critics that Iran and Syria, both under international pressure, encouraged or even ordered the ambush.

Others offer a domestic rationale. The last session of the National Dialogue was set for July 25, nearly two weeks after the war began. Hamadeh suggested that Hezbollah could return to the table "with the proof that the deterrence philosophy would work." But even he admits, "The precipitation has something of a mystery around it."Underrating a Threat

Two hours after the raid, Hassan, a reticent chemistry professor and one of the longest-serving members of parliament from Hezbollah, was sitting in a meeting for the committee on public works. His cellphone rang. "I smiled, hung up the phone and told the members of parliament in the room, 'Congratulations, our hostages will be coming home soon.' " Some smiled with him; others sat expressionless.

In another room, Nawwar Sahli, a Hezbollah representative who sends his children to an American-affiliated high school, sat in a parliamentary meeting on computerizing Lebanon's ministries. He, too, broke the news to colleagues.

"God help us," he recalled one of them responding.

Sahli went on with his day, getting an MRI exam at 3 p.m. for a pain in his neck. (He picked up the results after the war.) He listened to Nasrallah's speech, then went to his office at night to deal with paperwork in the Hezbollah-controlled southern suburbs known as the Dahiya. He ignored warnings by Hezbollah security not to stay late. From Khalifah, a local fast-food restaurant that was later bombed, he ordered a chicken fajita sandwich and Philly steak sandwich, then went for an interview on a Lebanese television station.

"I said that we shouldn't exaggerate, that Israel will just retaliate a bit, bomb a couple of targets and that would be the end of it," he recalled. "When I stayed in the office, I wasn't trying to be a hero. I seriously didn't think there was a threat."

Near the airport, Amin Sherri, another Hezbollah representative, sat with his wife, four children and three grandchildren.

"My family asked me if we should evacuate the house," he remembered. "I told them, 'Absolutely not.' " On that first day and early into the war, Hezbollah's political arm was relatively lax about security. Officials said they at times slept in other homes and changed their cars, but little else. Sherri kept his cellphone on throughout; Sahli said he was only occasionally advised to shut it off and remove its SIM card. Only by the third day, after Israeli forces had struck the airport road, Nasrallah's offices, Hezbollah's television and radio stations and several bridges, was the Dahiya fully evacuated, military officials said.

It was on that day, Sahli said, that he began getting worried.

But, he added, "I kept telling myself that no war lasts forever."A Fighter's Call to Duty

Along the rolling hills of southern Lebanon that face the Israeli border, Shadi Hani Saad was getting ready for breakfast in the village of Aita al-Shaab on July 12. He was the oldest son of Zeinab Hammoud and her favorite. But when he was as young as 8, with southern Lebanon still occupied, she remembered him asking her, "Will Hezbollah still be there when I grow up?"

Tall and broad-shouldered, Saad joined the Hezbollah youth movement in 2000 after the Israeli withdrawal. As a 14-year-old, he bypassed the lower grades of the Mahdi Scouts -- the Blossoms, the Cubs and the Sailors -- and had become Infantry. Within two years, he had achieved the highest rank, a Rover, and then carried out his first operation as a militiaman.

"They didn't tell us where," she said.

He trained once or twice a week. This summer, he was groomed for even more responsibility; his mother said Hezbollah was about to send him for six months of military training in Iran.

The trip never happened. A little after 9 a.m. on July 12, after Saad had gotten out of the shower, another fighter showed up at her door and whispered something to him. Saad grabbed his M-16 rifle, along with ammunition he kept at the house, and walked away in a T-shirt and jeans. "He told me, 'I might return, I might not return,' " his mother recalled.

Years of surveillance had given Hezbollah an idea of where the Israeli forces might cross the border, Goksel said. Of 24 gates, they entered four, and at each, Hezbollah had guessed right with its fortifications and defenses, he said.

Aita al-Shaab was one. "They were waiting for them," he said.

In addition, Lebanese analysts say Israeli hesitation in the early part of the war allowed Hezbollah, caught off guard, time to prepare its defenses. By the time Israeli troops entered in force, more than a week later, Hezbollah's men were in place in villages like Aita al-Shaab. Saad's mother said he called her the first day, then the second, using a land line they deemed more secure. On the third day, he planned to come home to visit and asked her to cook dinner.

That was the last time they spoke. Israeli raids escalated that day, and the Israeli military warned residents of border towns to flee. In a blue 1986 Mercedes, she left with her four other children for Tyre, then north to the Chouf Mountains. After they fled, Saad called an uncle. "Where's my family?" he asked. Nearly three weeks later, on a Thursday night, he was killed in an airstrike.

"What God wants to leave me, he'll leave," his mother said. "What he wants to take, he'll take."

She sat at her home, with a picture of Nasrallah on the wall. A school picture of Saad hung nearby in a black frame. A sprawling poster, with a purple tint, pictured Saad in military uniform and declared him a martyred crusader. Another picture showed all nine of the Hezbollah fighters who died in the village, among the 30 or so who stayed -- by local legend, against Nasrallah's wishes -- to face Israeli troops.

Her blue eyes glimmered with tears, and she recalled a conversation before the war. As they sat at home, Saad had asked that when he died he be buried among martyrs. "What do you mean martyrs?" she shot back, half-joking. "Why do you tell me this kind of stuff?"

She shook her head. "Who knew there would be a war?"

Bush Brings Faith To Foreign Aid As Funding Rises, Christian Groups Deliver Help -- With A Message (BOS)

By Farah Stockman, Michael Kranish, And Peter S. Canellos Of The Globe Staff, And Kevin Baron

The Boston Globe, October 8, 2006

PART 1: CHANGING THE RULES | EXPORTING FAITH

This story is the first of four parts

LAKARTINYA, Kenya -- The herders of this remote mountain village know little about America, but have learned from those who run a US-funded aid program about the American God.

A Christian God.

The US government has given $10.9 million to Food for the Hungry, a faith-based development organization, to reach deep into the arid mountains of northern Kenya to provide training in hygiene, childhood illnesses, and clean water. The group has brought all that, and something else that increasingly accompanies US-funded aid programs: r egular church service and prayer.

President Bush has almost doubled the percentage of US foreign-aid dollars going to faith-based groups such as Food for the Hungry, according to a Globe survey of government data. And in seeking to help such groups obtain more contracts, Bush has systematically eliminated or weakened rules designed to enforce the separation of church and state.

In Lakartinya, a simple hut built with funds from the US government is the first in the area to have a tin roof. It serves as a station for weighing babies, distributing food, teaching health classes -- and, until recently, initiating local people into the rites of Christianity, according to Food for the Hungry staff. Classes begin and end with prayers, and in some cases are followed by Christian services.

For decades, US policy has sought to avoid intermingling government programs and religious proselytizing. The aim is both to abide by the Constitution's prohibition against a state religion and to ensure that aid recipients don't forgo assistance because they don't share the religion of the provider.

Since medical programs are aimed at the most serious illnesses -- AIDS, malaria, tuberculosis -- the decision whether to seek treatment can determine life or death.

But many of those restrictions were removed by Bush in a little-noticed series of executive orders -- a policy change that cleared the way for religious groups to obtain hundreds of millions of dollars in additional government funding. It also helped change the message American aid workers bring to many corners of the world, from emphasizing religious neutrality to touting the healing powers of the Christian God.

Bush's orders altered the longstanding practice that groups preach religion in one space and run government programs in another. The administration said religious organizations can conduct services in the same space as they hand out government aid, so long as the services don't take place while the aid is being delivered. But the rule allows groups to schedule prayers immediately before or after dispensing taxpayer-funded aid.

Bush's orders also reversed longstanding rules forbidding the use of government funds to pay for employees who are required to take an oath to one religion. In addition, the president's orders allowed faith-based groups to keep religious symbols in places where they distribute taxpayer-funded aid.

And in implementing the president's orders, the administration rejected efforts to require groups to inform beneficiaries that they don't have to attend religious services to get the help they need. Instead of a requirement, groups are merely encouraged to make clear to recipients that they don't have to participate in religious activities.

Bush made some of the changes by executive order only after failing to get Congress to approve them; the bill faltered in the Senate, where moderate Republicans joined Democrats in raising concerns about breaking down the barrier between government and religion.

``I got a little frustrated in Washington because I couldn't get the bill passed," Bush told a meeting of faith-based groups in March 2004. ``Congress wouldn't act, so I signed an executive order -- that means I did it on my own."

The legality of Bush's moves is being challenged by a group advocating separation of church and state. The lawsuit, claiming both that Bush overstepped his powers and that the orders violate the Constitution, is inching its way through the federal courts.

Faith-based groups have long delivered humanitarian assistance in distant and dangerous places, marshaling an impressive array of volunteers. But Bush's initiative has put government dollars into faith-based providers in unprecedented fashion. A Globe survey of more than 52,000 awards of contracts, grants, and cooperative agreements from the US Agency for International Development -- which distributes taxpayer-funded assistance overseas -- provides the first comprehensive assessment of the impact of Bush's policies on foreign aid.

The survey of prime contractors and grantees, based on records obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, shows a sharp increase in money going to faith-based groups between fiscal 2001, the last budget of the Clinton administration, and fiscal 2005, the last year for which complete figures were available. Faith-based groups accounted for 10.5 percent of USAID dollars to nongovernmental aid organizations in fiscal 2001, and 19.9 percent in 2005.

Boost for Christians The numbers also show that the faith-based initiative overseas is almost exclusively a Christian initiative: Only two Jewish development groups and two Muslim groups of any type got any grants or contracts between fiscal 2001 and fiscal 2005, and Christians received 98.3 percent of all such funds to religious groups from fiscal 2001 to fiscal 2005.

The prime beneficiaries have been large groups including Catholic Relief Services and evangelical organizations such as World Vision -- the former employer of Bush's longtime USAID director Andrew Natsios -- and Samaritan's Purse, which is led by evangelist Franklin Graham, the son of Billy Graham, who guided Bush to his own religious rebirth.

Food for the Hungry, which is also evangelical, received its contract to run USAID programs in Lakartinya in fiscal 1999, during the Clinton administration, and it was renewed under Bush. The group's funding jumped from $7 million in fiscal 2001 to $20 million in fiscal 2005. Bush also appointed the group's president, Benjamin Homan, to chair USAID's advisory board.

Robert Snyder, Food for the Hungry's director for Kenya, said that the group seeks to segregate religious activities from aid programs, but that Kenyans don't usually believe in the concept of church-state separation.

``In Kenya, they don't separate things out," he said.

At Food for the Hungry's outpost in Lakartinya, staff members spoke openly of how they preach about Jesus while teaching breast-feeding and nutrition. Over the seven years that the group has been operating there, it has helped convert almost the entire area to Christianity, according to it's own field workers and villagers who participate in the programs.

Sante Dokhe, a 45-year-old mother of five from the Samburu tribe, became one of the health program's first ``contact mothers." She said she used to practice a traditional African religion. Then came her US-funded classes, which impressed her by drastically lowering the infant mortality rate in the village.

``The first time that I changed my mind is when we were learning the health education and our teacher was also talking about God," Dokhe said. ``We used to go to the rivers and pour milk for the god who stays in the mountain. But I learned through our classes that that is a very tiresome god. Now we have known that you don't need to struggle to please God. Now I have learned through health education that God is everywhere."

Christian missionaries have crisscrossed the world for generations, seeking to save souls by converting people.

US foreign-aid programs, however, began after World War II for the purely secular aim of winning friends for the United States. Now, aid packages and equipment purchased with government funds are stamped with the words ``From the American People" so beneficiaries can see the fruits of US generosity.

``The point of foreign assistance is national security," said Harriet Babbitt, who was USAID's second-ranking official during the last years of the Clinton administration.

DOJ_NMG_0078317

Foreign aid programs have been criticized by some conservatives as unnecessary -- frittering away money that could be used in the United States. But in the late 1990s, evangelical groups began to focus on AIDS in Africa, and conservative Christian leaders became vocal supporters of government-funded programs.

Clinton's last USAID administrator was Brady Anderson, the president's boyhood friend and an evangelical Christian. Relations between USAID and faith-based organizations were strong, according to Babbitt and Anderson.

Nonetheless, after Bush took office in 2001, he surprised many people by declaring that religious groups had been systematically discriminated against in the awarding of government contracts. His administration issued a report called ``Unlevel Playing Field" that declared that faith-based groups faced too many restrictions. ``Some government rules require faith-based providers to endure something akin to an organizational strip search," the report said.

A push for applicants To counter the alleged discrimination against churches, Bush used federal funds to hire outreach workers to hold training sessions and attend religious conferences in hopes of getting groups to apply for funds. The initiative, Bush promised, would ``open up billions of dollars in grant money competition to faith-based charities."

USAID workers began fanning out to religious events. They tried to convince skeptics that evangelical groups could follow government guidelines while still spreading the word of the Lord.

Clydette Powell, a doctor in USAID's public-health bureau, staged a workshop on public-private partnerships in tuberculosis at an evangelical conference last year in Louisville, Ky., proclaiming, ``There are tremendous opportunities, actually, for Christians -- and for, frankly, evangelistic purposes -- within a public health strategy such as TB. "

She added: ``I think Christians, who are so much more relational in this thing, have a leg up on, you know, just the regular public system because there is interest in developing a relationship -- in fact, hopefully, a relationship that leads them to know Christ as their savior and their lord in their lives."

When key senators balked at approving Bush's faith-based initiative, he claimed that they, too, were discriminating against churches.

But James Towey, who was director of the White House Office of Faith and Community Based Initiatives from 2002 until June 2006, said the major hang-up was Bush's desire to allow religious groups to reject candidates for government-funded jobs because the workers didn't practice the group's religion.

``The hiring provision gave everybody a lot of indigestion," Towey said.

In 1965, President Lyndon Johnson signed Executive Order No. 11246, a landmark directive that required all federal contractors to consider applications ``without regard to race, color, religion, sex or national origin."

Frustrated by Congress's refusal to reconsider Johnson's policy, Bush issued his own order in 2002 specifically allowing faith-based groups to discriminate in hiring for government-funded positions.

Bush explained himself in a speech in New Orleans on Jan. 15, 2004. Standing in front of a huge cross, the president said the federal government used to tell faith-based programs to ``take the cross down from the wall" to get government money.

``The problem is, faith-based programs only conform to one set of rules, and it's bigger than government rules," Bush said.

His rule changes were encouraged by both the Catholic Church, which was already the largest faith-based recipient of government money overseas, and the National Association of Evangelicals, whose leaders say it represents 30 million people.

The Catholic US Conference of Bishops declared, ``It is more important than ever to make sure that all charities, faith-based or secular, have access to the public and private resources they need" to serve the needy.

Robert Cizik, the evangelical association's vice president for governmental affairs, said, ``Without the faith-based service providers, there is no way to begin to stem the tide of AIDS."

He said Bush's rule changes -- including the reversal of Johnson's non-discrimination order -- were needed to give smaller evangelical providers ``an equal shot at the federal pie."

Other churches protest Yet leaders of many large Christian denominations believe it is wrong for religious groups to discriminate based on religion when using government funds. And while Bush has portrayed many restrictions intended to enforce the separation of church and state as hostile to religion, many religious leaders disagree: They say the separation of church and state has allowed religions to flourish.

Many large Protestant denominations say the administration is catering to the religious right -- particularly evangelical groups seeking funding for missions whose ultimate aim is recruiting new members.

Bishop Frank Griswold, the presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church, the faith in which Bush was raised, said he strongly opposed allowing faith-based contractors to discriminate in hiring. But the bishop said he was unable to express his concerns to Bush.

``I must say it has been very difficult for me -- and I think I can speak for the mainline churches as well -- to have any substantial engagement with the president," Griswold said. He said he has been ``shunted to one side" by the White House, which has been more interested in rewarding the religious right.

DOJ_NMG_0078318

``I think it has to do with politics and power," Griswold said. ``It has a great deal to do with what Mr. Bush perceives to be his base."

Criticism also comes from representatives of the faith that Bush now observes -- the United Methodist Church.

James Winkler, general secretary of the church's General Board of Church and Society, compared Bush's claim of discrimination against faith-based organizations to his assertion that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

``We heard all the time that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction, and we heard all the time that there has been all this discrimination against faith-based groups," Winkler said. ``We kept on saying we haven't noticed any discrimination. The grants are there. This really came from the religious right as political payback for their support for the president."

The Southern Baptist Convention, which is the largest of several Baptist organizations, also has strong reservations about Bush's faith-based initiative, preferring to maintain a separation of church and state.

Richard Land, president of the convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, advises Southern Baptist churches not to take federal money. Noting how some British colonies in America financially supported the Anglican Church while persecuting Baptists, he said Baptists have in their ``genetic code" a dislike of such government funding.

Most Jewish groups have not aggressively sought foreign-aid contracts, some leaders said, because they do not seek to convert people, and a prime motivation for religious groups to be active overseas is to win new converts.

``Jews are not missionaries," said Ruth Messinger , president of the American Jewish World Service. ``The whole concept of proselytization is alien to us. Not only alien, almost offensive to us. Jews just don't do that."

Many Christian groups, however, acknowledge that they aim to convert new members, while denying that they proselytize.

``We would like for everyone to become a Christian, that is part of our faith as Christians," said Mark Howard, general counsel of World Vision.

Nonetheless, neither Natsios, who headed USAID from May 2001 to this year, nor Kent Hill, the assistant administrator for Global Health Programs, said they have ever received complaints of a religious contractor violating rules against proselytizing. But Natsios, at a conference last spring, acknowledged that USAID does not monitor groups for proselytizing.

Outsiders point out that members of the administration -- including the president -- sometimes seem to endorse the use of government funds for religious objectives. Speaking before religious leaders in Los Angeles on March 2, 2004, Bush discussed the difficulties of faith groups.

``I think if you ask them their biggest problem, they'd say, `Well, we need to expand, there's more souls to be saved, we need a little extra space for our rescue mission,' " he said. He then assured the groups: ``The government has got resources."

Robert Tuttle, a George Washington University law professor who has studied USAID policies, said he was dumbfounded that the agency chose not to require that aid recipients be told that they don't have to attend services: ``It is scandalous in the sense that if you really are interested in protecting the religious liberty of beneficiaries, then why not inform them of their rights?"

The government's General Accountability Office this year examined 13 federally funded faith-based organizations in the United States that offer prayer or worship. The agency concluded that four of the 13 ``did not appear to understand the requirement to separate these activities in time or location from their program services."

K. Hollyn Hollman, general counsel for the Baptist Joint Committee, which represents 14 Baptist organizations, said she is alarmed by the administration's policy that a religious group doesn't have to change its ``religious character" when distributing government aid.

Said Hollman: ``If the religious character of my organization involves evangelizing, changing your life through Christian witness, then I will be tempted to do that in a government-funded program."

The Globe's research found that in the absence of clear standards such as a prohibition on running government programs where services are conducted, religious groups feel free to ask recipients to pray, discuss their spiritual needs, and attend services.

Since many groups combine government and private funds, they feel unrestricted about proselytizing so long as they can say they were using private money. For instance, USAID has paid for tens of millions of dollars in equipment for religious hospitals, where patients learn about the Gospel while receiving care. But since the missionaries themselves are not on the government payroll, no rules apply.

Graham, whose Samaritan's Purse receives USAID funding for medical centers in Sudan and Angola, said in an interview: ``Of course you cannot proselytize with tax dollars, and rightfully so. I agree with that. But it doesn't mean that we can't build buildings, we cannot provide housing and buy bricks and mortar. The proselytizing or the preaching or the giving out of Bibles, people give us funds for those."

More Christian converts In the dusty village of Lakartinya, Lucia Loltome, a 34-year-old nurse employed by Food for the Hungry, says proudly that she begins and ends each health class with a prayer.

Loltome became a Christian when she attended a Catholic high school. Now she is in charge of projects that involve 730 households and 1,300 children. She is proud of how she laces her lessons about typhoid, parasites, and breast-feeding with education about the Christian God.

``Before 1999, these people were not even going to church," she said. Now, all the contact mothers in the program and nearly every family in nearby villages are churchgoers, Loltome said.

A similar story is told three miles away, in an area known as Nkirmat, where Food for the Hungry began a similar project under the same USAID grant. In Nkirmat, contact mothers began learning about health education in 1999 and recently began breeding milk-producing goats. As with Lakartinya, the USAID program here has been accompanied by a wholesale conversion to Christianity, according to Antonella Kupona, the lead mother of the goat project.

``There was a church built here in 1972 but people were not going because of the traditional beliefs," she said. ``But now they are taking it up in great numbers. . . . As we go for the health education, we also learn about God."

Ex-President Bush Seeks More Quake Aid (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

Former President George H.W. Bush has appealed for nearly $100 million in aid for survivors of last year's South Asia earthquake, saying tens of thousands face another winter living in tents.

"If they're in tents, that's not good enough," Bush told a news conference Friday to mark the first anniversary of the Oct. 8, 2005 quake that killed more than 80,000 people and left more than 3 million homeless in Pakistan and India. "But it's a heck of a lot better than it was a year ago."

Bush, the U.N. envoy to promote help for survivors of the 7.6-magnitude quake, recalled predictions immediately after the disaster that Pakistanis in rugged mountains would have difficulty getting through the winter. "And it didn't happen," he said.

"Nearly 300,000 people have now returned home safely after living in tents for nearly half a year," he said. "However, full-scale reconstruction and the full resumption of basic services is going to take years."

Bush said snow was already falling in some parts of Pakistan and it was critical to get access to people in remote locations.

"If the upcoming winter were to be harsh, elderly people and young children can face renewed vulnerabilities," he said. Aid agencies expect mountain dwellers to start pouring soon into lowland camps to escape the coming freeze.

Bush said the Pakistani government was determined "that even if the winter might be harsh, people will have protection — so I think they're moving very hard to try to move toward permanent housing."

Reconstruction, however, has moved slowly, constrained by rigorous new quake-proofing rules.

According to the relief agency Oxfam, 1.8 million survivors are still living in tents or makeshift shacks.

At the news conference, Hina Rabbani Khar, Pakistan's minister of state for economic affairs, disputed that figure and insisted that only about 30,000 people were still living in tents — just 5 percent of the original number last year. She said helping such a small number during the coming winter will be "very manageable."

Bush didn't address the discrepancy in the numbers, but he said the early recovery plan for quake-affected areas had received just two-thirds of the $255 million needed.

"We're still missing $94 million which is still critical for bridging the gap from relief to recovery," he said. "The sectors that remain underfunded are water and sanitation, housing and support for vulnerable people."

Pakistan's President Gen. Pervez Musharraf appealed Thursday for $800 million to cover additional reconstruction costs, Khar said.

Bush told reporters he wasn't satisfied with his efforts to get donors to fulfill aid pledges, saying donor fatigue was part of the problem.

"We've made some progress, but heaven knows I've got a long way to go before I can express total satisfaction," he said.

Pakistani Quake Survivors Still Fearful (AP)

AP, October 8, 2006

Dozens of girls have been skipping school in this Pakistani Kashmir mountain town, but neither bullies nor boredom is to blame. Teachers say pupils fear being crushed in an earthquake like the one that killed 80,000 people one year ago Sunday.

Among the dead were 34 students of the Government Girls Middle School in Chikar, which collapsed in a heap of rubble and trapped scores of pupils and teachers. Four tents have been raised on top of the ruins to serve as classrooms for some 400 pupils aged 14-16.

DOJ_NMG_0078320

"There has been low school attendance recently," Saira Bhatti, a teacher at the school, told The Associated Press. "They are so scared that the quake might strike again. Sometimes when the wind blows hard, the children are terrified and start crying because they think it is another quake."

Fear is palpable among many locals in Chikar, which was ravaged by the 7.6 magnitude quake that townspeople claim killed at least 10,000 in and around the hilltop settlement.

Most said they are sleeping outside now in case Sunday's anniversary leads to a repeat of last year's disaster that killed thousands as they slept in homes, studied in schools or worked in offices.

All said they will offer special prayers Sunday for those who died in the earthquake, which devastated cities, towns and villages across northern Pakistan and in the Indian-controlled part of Kashmir.

Javed Iqbal, 42, said he is not afraid of sleeping inside his home, but acknowledged that he was an exception, particularly after reports spread that tremors had been felt late Friday in Balakot, the worst-affected Pakistani city in the earthquake where more than 30,000 people died.

"News spread throughout Chikar so quickly that there had been an earthquake in Balakot and fears of aftershocks here have forced most people to spend the nights outside," said Iqbal, who works as a curtain maker in Saudi Arabia and returns to his Pakistani home three months each year.

In Chikar, concrete and metal that once formed shops are still heaped throughout the town's main bazaar. Cracks in walls of houses and offices give passers-by a glimpse of the rooms inside.

But earthquake-proof houses with shiny corrugated iron roofs are popping up inside the town and on steep, pine-covered mountainsides. And health clinics run by aid groups are providing around-the-clock primary health care to anyone who asks.

Safia Bibi, a 35-year-old mother of four, received compensation from the government for the deaths of her infant son and mother who were crushed under the rubble of their mud brick house, but said the payments have not healed her pain.

"There remains so much fear and tension since the earthquake and no amount of money will change that," said Bibi, while two of her children underwent routine immunizations at a Chikar health center.

But others see compensation as their best chance at regaining some semblance of normalcy.

More than 1,000 survivors rallied in the capital Islamabad on Saturday demanding that delays in the release of compensation to quake victims be overcome so they can reconstruct housing.

Chanting slogans such as "Stop taking bribes!" "Stop cheating us!" and "Build our homes before snowfall," the protesters marched from the parliament to the government department responsible for releasing aid money for reconstruction.

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf has said that his government will ensure the provision of basic facilities to those affected by the quake and he hopes that 80 percent of the reconstruction will be over in the coming three years.

Muslim Lawmaker Assimilated And Berated (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Denmark's Naser Khader is praised by secular Europeans as a voice for moderation and unity. Islamists consider him a traitor.

COPENHAGEN — Ever since he left the laundry-draped alleys of his Syrian village and glimpsed the red-light district of Copenhagen, Naser Khader's life has been a curious, and sometimes dangerous, navigation between Islam and the West.

A man with "democracy" tattooed in Arabic on his arm, the Danish lawmaker epitomizes Europe's struggle to integrate moderate Islam into secular democracy. The Danes view him as the ideal Muslim, a multilingual author with European sensibilities for tolerance. Islamists regard him as a traitor, a factory worker's son who bartered his identity for a bit of Western acceptance.

It is sensitive cultural and political terrain, but Khader's convictions are anything but opaque. This was apparent early this year when he condemned violent Muslim protests against a Danish newspaper's publication of caricatures of the prophet Muhammad. Khader argued that the worldwide demonstrations were orchestrated by radical clerics to aggravate tensions between East and West.

"If you don't want to look at the cartoons, don't buy the paper," Khader, one of three Muslims in the Danish parliament, said in a recent interview at his office. "I understood why Muslims were upset. But you protest in the frame of democracy.

"Why this overreaction? I asked the Islamists why they didn't demonstrate when Abu Musab Zarqawi killed innocent hostages in Iraq. Why didn't they protest when Bin Laden sent planes into New York? This is against Islam too."

Such sentiments earned Khader, who travels with bodyguards and a wry sense of humor, at least one death threat from an extremist imam. A sturdily built man who perfected his Danish on neighborhood soccer fields, he is bemused by the discreet men who shadow him. "I think it's sad," he said, "that police have to protect those who speak for democracy. But the world has changed. This is my life."

The 43-year-old lawmaker and his adopted Europe are caught amid disturbing agendas. Radical Islamists and anti-immigration attitudes are jeopardizing Muslim integration, giving rise to right-wing political groups such as the Danish People's Party. Muslims with immigrant backgrounds often face high unemployment and alienation, which has led to terrorist threats, including an alleged plot several weeks ago by three men to detonate a bomb in Denmark.

Khader has tried to become a unifying voice; his politics spring from a childhood of trying to fit in and succeed. But his unapologetic political message, praised by secular Europeans, has irritated conservative Muslims. They consider him a man who has drifted too far to the other side, marrying a native Dane, not attending Friday prayers, sipping beer and attending soccer games in a jersey that resembles the Danish flag.

"Naser Khader is irrelevant to Muslims in this country," said Ahmed abu Laban, an outspoken Islamic leader in Copenhagen. "His role is to keep bombarding Muslims and Muslim values. He represents that strain of thought in Europe that's too cowardly to face legitimate Muslims. So they get people like Khader to act as a human shield and to spit in our face."

David Trads, a political analyst who has written a book on Islam in Denmark, said:

"Many are saying that Khader's like an Uncle Tom. That's not a fair criticism, but he wants to make sure everyone in Denmark understands that there's a very serious situation with the Islamists. He wants also to build a bridge between moderate Muslims and Danes."

Dressed in a blue blazer and pinstriped shirt open at the collar, Khader sat the other day at a table strewn with papers, a folder and a book titled "Cradle of Islam." A biography of U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton sat on a nearby shelf. Khader, who is straightforward instead of tactical when it comes to politics, weighed the aspirations and pitfalls of being identified as a European and a Muslim in the same breath.

The atmosphere was less volatile in 1974, when an 11-year-old Khader and his mother, three brothers and a sister left their Syrian village to join his father in Copenhagen. The elder Khader, a Palestinian, was among those who had come to Denmark years earlier to fill Northern Europe's need for laborers and factory workers. His parents weren't religious — his father was a Marxist — and unlike today, Islamic head scarves were rarely spotted along the city's canals and alleys.

"There was no Islamophobia in Denmark in the 1970s," said Khader, who first tasted rye bread and licorice on the sidewalks of his new city, where sometimes the "working girls" near the red-light district bought him ice cream on his way home from school. "It was a different world. I had come from a village where the only TV set was in a coffee shop for men."

The tone in Denmark shifted a decade later, however, when refugees from the Lebanese civil war began arriving. More Muslim immigrants landed throughout the 1990s, along with imams financed by radical Islamic groups in the Middle East.

The gap between the parallel societies of Muslims and Danes widened after Sept. 11, and the controversy over the Muhammad caricatures further exposed the integration failures in a nation that prided itself on equality.

Danes were left with the moral question of how far the vaunted tradition of Scandinavian tolerance extended. Muslims, who account for about 200,000 of the population of 5.4 million, are split between those such as Khader and the more extremist voices angry about discrimination and issues such as the participation of Danish troops in the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

"It's not a clash of civilizations. It's a clash of ideologies, and the largest part of that is between Islamists and moderate Muslims," Khader said, adding that Middle East extremists were trying to exploit Muslim integration problems in Europe. "I've founded a group called Democratic Muslims. We're going to hold an international conference. We need to oppose the well-organized Islamists.

"We don't know enough about the Islamists," he said. "Who are they? What's their thinking? Why is radical Islam so attractive to people even born in this country?"

Khader says much of the blame lies with religious leaders such as Abu Laban, who organized a Muslim delegation to the Middle East to gain diplomatic support for protests against the Muhammad cartoons. The demonstrations in Europe were largely peaceful, but the outrage in the Middle East and other regions led to violence, deaths and the storming of Danish embassies.

"I went to Abu Laban's mosque when I was younger, but then I got tired of his politics," said Khader, a former Copenhagen city councilman with a master's degree in political science. "He started talking about then-President Reagan and the first President Bush. I couldn't listen to him anymore.

"In Denmark today there are between 100 and 120 imams, but only five or six of them [radicalized] the controversy around the cartoons."

Abu Laban said that he was opposed to violence and that "relations between Danes and Muslims are not so fearful as some might imagine."

When asked about Khader, Abu Laban said, "Unfortunately, Mr. Khader is riding two horses, and in my opinion, he doesn't fulfill even the minimum of being called a Muslim."

DOJ_NMG_0078322

Khader said he was aware that some might perceive him as a patsy for the West's idea of a Muslim. Europe constantly sifts through the rhetoric of radical mullahs and fundamentalist ideologues to find what it considers palatable Muslim voices. This search is growing more intense as the continent's population ages and immigrants are needed to bolster its economies and fund its welfare states.

Khader said Danes had begun to move away from stereotyping Muslims, but overall the society had been slow to embrace multiculturalism. There are indications that since the publication of the cartoons, Danes are more skeptical about Muslim integration.

The Danish People's Party controls 13% of the parliament; the nation's new bestseller compares radical Islam to Nazism, calling it a threat to Western freedoms.

"It's not enough to think that all Muslims must look like me," Khader said. "Integration has to be for liberal and conservative Muslims, for Muslims who wear head scarves and for Muslims who are devout. Europe must accept this fact."

Khader had to accept it within his family. Five years before his death, Khader's father rediscovered his faith and became an observant Muslim. Khader's mother, who wore no head scarf when she arrived as an immigrant, wears one today.

One Man Leads Often Dangerous Quest To Quell Violence In Yemen (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

SANA, Yemen — With his mobile phone buzzing incessantly, the radio blaring and a band of young men standing by the phones for any word of trouble, Abdelrahman al-Marwani waited nervously as the polls closed in Yemen's presidential elections on Sept. 20, eager to see the results of his decade-long campaign.

Success, however, had nothing to do with voting or who might win and everything to do with whether election day remained peaceful.

"People are usually riled up now, and they're easily triggered to seek revenge," Mr. Marwani said on election day, listening to the news wearing his traditional tribal headdress and a sports jacket. "This is usually the most dangerous time."

The election, in which President Ali Abdullah Saleh was re-elected and local councils were chosen, was something of a victory for Mr. Marwani, the son of a tribal sheik who has struggled to bring the issue of violence and the need for gun control into the spotlight here. For the past decade, he has led a lonely and often dangerous fight to quell tribal wars, seeking to break a cycle of revenge and retribution that kills as many as 1,200 people a year.

Through his organization, Dar Al Salam, or the House of Peace, which he formed in 1997 to spread the message of tolerance, he says he has negotiated cease-fire deals between warring tribes and even persuaded some to disarm.

This year he persuaded the government to declare election day a weapons-free day. Then he helped cajole Yemen's combative tribes to sign a contract agreeing to leave their weapons at home, and he enlisted businessmen to plaster his trademark symbol, a pistol crossed out with a thick red line, on billboards, in newspapers, and on bottles of water and laundry detergent, among other items.

Eight people were killed on election night, The Associated Press reported, but that was down from the 67 killed and more than 100 wounded during local council elections in 2001.

Yet the fact that it took Mr. Marwani so long to get the government's support for just one day of peace is a measure of the difficulty of changing Yemen's mind-set, one person at a time.

"The law doesn't work here," as it should, he said. "It takes months or years to get justice." And even then, he added, the judges are not impartial.

Mr. Marwani formed his organization largely with his own money, persuading select tribal elders to represent their tribes, giving his group more political weight. Today, it has more than 400 members, he says, and can draw on more than 1,000 volunteers throughout Yemen. The group holds exhibitions, classes and theater workshops. He relies on individual donations and has received some help from the government, but operates on a shoestring budget.

Mr. Marwani said he formed the group out of the dogged conviction that if something was not done about the violence soon, Islamic militants would take over the country.

Yemen, one of the poorest countries in the Arab world, is an ally of the United States in the effort to curb terrorism, but it is also a breeding ground for extremism. With a weak, preoccupied central government, law and order in the hinterlands is left to tribes that exist in a perpetual state of war.

At any time, Mr. Marwani said, Yemen has many tribal conflicts, ranging from family squabbles to warfare with heavy weapons and, in some areas, armor from Yemen's civil war a decade ago.

Mr. Marwani traces his determination to end the violence to a severe injury he suffered at age 12, when he and his friends were playing with a grenade that exploded. Although the wounds have healed, he says, he can never forget the damage that the continuous conflict had done to Yemen's society and culture. He had long planned to do something about it, he said, but was waiting for the right moment.

In 1996, with the civil war finally over, he formed a council to try to settle tribal disputes in his region. But when he tried to settle a feud in another province, they refused his services and chased him out of town, he said.

He said he realized he had to broaden his effort, to reach out to other tribes and, "We simply needed to be more organized."

A year later, he started Dar Al Salam with the help of friends and colleagues with the express aim of bringing warring tribes across the country to the negotiating table. In one case in 2004, a man belonging to the Beni Shar tribe was killed while working for members of the Beni Hushaysh tribe, and a tribal war exploded. Mr. Marwani rounded up hundreds of his men and they drove straight between two ridges where the tribes were fighting, he said. In a scene his group videotaped and in photographs, Mr. Marwani could be seen running between the combatants holding up a white flag and beseeching each side to hold its fire. Then, his men, including many elders from various tribes climbed up on either ridgeline and tried to persuade the tribesmen to hand over their weapons.

Once tempers cooled, he said, he set up a makeshift trial, and negotiated a settlement, with livestock exchanging hands as restitution.

In other cases, his group has intervened in revenge attacks, with a goal of finding the original attacker and bringing him to confess and to apologize. "And then it gives the other side a sense of pride and dignity in offering forgiveness," he said.

The work is decidedly dangerous. He has been shot three times, he said, and nine of his volunteers have been killed and 15 injured over the years. Volunteers' cars have been attacked and they have been forced to leave towns and villages where they have tried to intervene.

He estimates he has settled more than 165 feuds over the past 10 years with almost no input from the government. But ultimately, Mr. Marwani said, his battle is to change the public discourse in Yemen from one of trigger-happy intolerance to one of open debate and acceptance.

The small victories keep him going. "I never thought I could get even this far, but people have begun to listen to me," he said. "Extremism is not new, but the oil, the wars, all have turned it into something very dangerous. And now is the time to deal with it."

Knocking It Off In China (AP)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press

The Associated Press, October 8, 2006

By the time David S. Pearl II saw one of the knockoff versions of his company's refrigeration-testing devices, the damage had been done.

For more than 35 years, Uniweld Products Inc. had painstakingly built its reputation in the air-conditioning-hungry Middle East. But as cheap counterfeits entered the market, sales plummeted. Workers were laid off, consumer confidence destroyed.

The reason for Uniweld's misery sat before him, just out of an express-mail package: a Chinese-made, nearly identical version of the real thing -- one of a flood of pirated American products, the bulk from China, that the United States blames for costing thousands of jobs, robbing companies of profits and seriously harming the U.S. economy's ability to compete.

In Mr. Pearl's case, the bogus equipment matched the original right down to the name, trademark, address and phone number of his manufacturing company's headquarters in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

The differences, though, were crucial: The fake products cost half as much as the real ones, and they didn't work. Mr. Pearl estimated that over the years Uniweld lost more than $1 million, a significant amount for a small company.

"You look at them side by side, it is absolutely amazing how well they copied them, and it's scary," said Mr. Pearl, Uniweld's executive vice president. "The United States is a country of thousands and thousands and thousands of small businesses, who employ the majority of the employees in the country. For them to be hammered by Chinese counterfeits is a serious problem."

U.S. lawmakers, government officials and businesses agree that stopping the theft of American brands abroad would save companies billions of dollars and would help to correct a U.S. trade deficit that hit a record high of $202 billion with China last year.

But the accord often ends there.

Businesses want lawmakers to do more; Congress urges the Bush administration to take a harder line on China's lax enforcement of existing copyright-protection laws; and the U.S. government threatens China with punitive action in the World Trade Organization (WTO) if progress is not made.

Meanwhile, rampant theft of copyright American products continues.

DOJ_NMG_0078324

Officials estimate that piracy and counterfeiting worldwide cost U.S. industry as much as $250 billion a year.

China is a major culprit, U.S. officials say, accounting for nearly 70 percent of all pirated products seized at the U.S. border last year -- more than 10 times greater than any other American trading partner. Russia also is a problem, with American business groups urging stronger pledges from Moscow to protect intellectual property before being allowed WTO entry.

Sen. Carl Levin, a Democrat who represents Michigan's auto-parts makers, says China is thought to be responsible for about $9 billion of the $12 billion in the industry's estimated losses annually to counterfeits.

"There China sits while our government dawdles," Mr. Levin told a recent congressional advisory panel. "We need to stop merely putting China on lists and start taking more effective action."

U.S. officials say they are working hard to get Beijing to fight the problem more aggressively and to follow through on commitments made when China joined the WTO in 2001.

The United States posted its first intellectual property attache in Beijing in 2004 and plans additional attaches this year. Dozens of copyright-protection training programs have been conducted with Chinese officials since 2001, the U.S. government says.

Last year, the U.S. trade envoy formally requested that China document what it was doing to enforce copyright protection under its WTO obligations. Though China's response was "less than forthcoming," officials say they continue to push for those details.

The United States has placed China on a "priority watch list" over concerns about Beijing's failure to improve protection of intellectual property.

A meeting between top U.S. and Chinese officials on the eve of President Hu Jintao's April visit to Washington "yielded measured progress" on the issue, said Timothy Stratford, an assistant U.S. trade envoy for China affairs. China committed to take stronger action against producers of pirated optical discs and to make sure computers are pre-installed with legal operating-system software.

Still, many were disappointed that Mr. Hu did not make greater commitments to crack down on piracy when he met with President Bush.

Above all, the United States has signaled its willingness to wield what is considered one of its most powerful weapons: a formal WTO complaint against China for inadequate enforcement of copyright protections. A ruling against China could lead to strict sanctions.

"Results are what matter to us," Mr. Stratford recently told the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission. "We will not shy away from using dispute settlement at the WTO when we feel China is not living up to its commitments."

Critics say warnings are meaningless. The Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, Mr. Levin said, "is a paper tiger, I'm afraid."

Lack of government leadership, the senator said, has forced the auto industry to "do too much of the policing itself and at great expense."

Bill Primosch, director for international business policy at the National Association of Manufacturers, said the U.S. government is faced with obstacles as it considers a WTO case. First, he said, it must make sure it can win. If the WTO ruled against the United States, it could send a message to Beijing that its current approach is sufficient.

Another problem is that U.S. companies are reluctant to cooperate publicly. Mr. Primosch said many are afraid that if they complain too loudly, China will retaliate, forcing them out of what is considered the most important major growth market in the world for U.S. manufacturers.

Until the problem is solved, industry representatives say, many U.S. companies eyeing China face bleak prospects.

Patricia Schroeder, president of the Association of American Publishers, estimated in recent testimony that U.S. publishers in China lost $52 million last year, part of a "staggering amount of book piracy plaguing this most promising of markets."

Mrs. Schroeder, a former member of Congress from Colorado, summed up the problem faced by many U.S. industries working in China: "China is a country that boasts millions upon millions of eager potential readers and scholars," she said. "And these readers are largely being supplied with illegal goods."

Castro Foe With C.I.A. Ties Puts U.S. In An Awkward Spot (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

EL PASO, Oct. 6 — Thirty years ago, long before liquids and gels were restricted on airliners, a tube of Colgate toothpaste may have brought a plane down from the sky.

Cubana Airlines Flight 455 crashed off the coast of Barbados on Oct. 6, 1976, killing all 73 people aboard. Plastic explosives stuffed into a toothpaste tube ignited the plane, according to recently declassified police records.

DOJ_NMG_0078325

Implicated in the attack, but never convicted, was Luis Posada Carriles, a Cuban exile who has long sought to topple the government of Fidel Castro.

Today, Mr. Posada, 78, is in a detention center in El Paso, held on an immigration violation while the government tries to figure out what to do with him. His case presents a quandary for the Bush administration, at least in part because Mr. Posada is a former C.I.A. operative and United States Army officer who directed his wrath at a government that Washington has long opposed.

Despite insistent calls from Cuba and Venezuela for his extradition, the administration has refused to send him to either country for trial.

Intensifying the problem is that Mr. Posada, who was arrested last year in Miami after sneaking into the country, may soon go free because the United States has been reluctant to press the terrorism charges that could keep him in jail.

That prospect has brought a hail of criticism of the Bush administration for holding a double standard when it comes to those who commit terrorist acts.

"The fight against terrorism cannot be fought à la carte," said José Pertierra, a Washington lawyer who is representing the government of Venezuela in its effort to extradite Mr. Posada. "A terrorist is a terrorist."

The Bush administration has stopped short of prosecuting him as a terrorist, however, even though the Justice Department called him as much this week. In papers filed in federal court in El Paso on Thursday, it described him as "an unrepentant criminal and admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks on tourist sites."

Instead, Mr. Posada faces immigration charges, as the Bush administration tries its best to deport him somewhere else, where he would walk free.

Few countries seem willing to take him. So far, Canada, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico and Panama have all turned down American requests to take Mr. Posada, who denies that he bombed the plane but who is linked to the case in declassified C.I.A. and F.B.I. files.

"Who would want him?" asked one lawyer close to the case, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified because of the delicacy of the litigation. "Wherever he goes there will be intelligence agents from a variety of nations following him, not to mention hit squads."

Two countries do want Mr. Posada: Venezuela, where he is wanted for blowing up the plane, and Cuba, where he is viewed as an enemy of the state who has repeatedly tried to assassinate Mr. Castro.

An immigration judge has ruled that Mr. Posada may be subject to torture in those two countries. But because no other country has stepped forward, and because he has not been officially deemed a terrorist by the American government, a federal judge recommended last month — coincidentally on Sept. 11 — that Mr. Posada be released.

The Bush administration is now invoking a law that bars the release of an illegal immigrant who poses adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States. That tack has placed it in the awkward position of, in effect, having to call Mr. Posada a terrorist even as it refuses to charge him as one.

Mr. Posada has longstanding links to American intelligence agencies, and his colorful past helps to explain why this is not a garden variety terrorism case. One immigration judge involved in the proceedings described them as being "not unlike one of Robert Ludlum's espionage thrillers."

A former sugar chemist and exterminator in Cuba, Mr. Posada has been working in the shadows to carry out a policy not unlike the one Washington has advocated over the decades — the removal of Mr. Castro.

"How can you call someone a terrorist who allegedly committed acts on your behalf?" asked Felipe D. J. Millan, Mr. Posada's El Paso-based lawyer. "This would be the equivalent of calling Patrick Henry or Paul Revere or Benjamin Franklin a terrorist."

Mr. Posada received military training in the United States and worked for the C.I.A. as far back as the failed Bay of Pigs invasion. He played a role in supplying the contras in Nicaragua. He has admitted, but subsequently denied, involvement in a string of bombings of Cuban tourist facilities.

By the time the Cubana Airlines plane exploded, Mr. Posada was no longer in the employ of the C.I.A. But records show that he may have notified his former bosses that a bomb was going to be set off on a plane shortly before it happened.

Venezuela and Cuba staged events on Friday, the 30th anniversary of the airplane bombing, where Mr. Bush was condemned for his government's failure to turn over Mr. Posada. A billboard posted outside the United States Interest Section in Havana features the image of Mr. Bush, Mr. Posada and Hitler.

Some of the anger directed at the Bush administration's handling of the case originates closer to home. Roseanne Nenninger Persaud, whose 19-year-old brother, Raymond, was one of the passengers who perished, recently wrote a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales urging him to brand Mr. Posada a terrorist.

DOJ_NMG_0078326

"It feels like a double standard," Ms. Nenninger, who was born in Guyana but has since become an American citizen, said in a telephone interview from New York. "He should be treated like bin Laden. If this were a plane full of Americans, it would have been a different story."

A majority of the victims were Cubans, including the entire Olympic fencing team, which was returning from a competition in Venezuela. Guyanese and North Koreans made up most of the other passengers.

"Luis Posada Carriles is a terrorist, but he's our terrorist," said Peter Kornbluh of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, which has been unearthing documents on Mr. Posada's case. "The historical baggage that he brought with him when he sneaked into the U.S. has created this dilemma for the Bush administration."

Getting out of jail has not been a problem for Mr. Posada in the past. In Venezuela, where he was held in the prison bombing, he had associates bribe a guard and he walked out dressed as a priest in 1985. In Panama, where he was implicated in a plot to kill Mr. Castro during a visit there, the departing president pardoned him in 2004.

He appears headed for release again, this time from a nondescript holding center ringed by barbed wire near El Paso's airport.

Mr. Posada's cloak-and-dagger past — his aliases, his fake passports, his life on the run through Latin America — is over, insists his Miami-based lawyer, Eduardo R. Soto.

In fact, even before Mr. Castro fell ill and ceded power to his brother, Mr. Posada declared his campaign to topple the Cuban leader by force to be over.

"The Cuban government is in a very deteriorated condition, inexorably reaching its end, and I sincerely believe that nothing would help to go back to the past with sabotage campaigns," Mr. Posada said.

Mr. Posada's case has eerie parallels with the case of Orlando Bosch, an associate who has also been accused of playing a role in the bombing. The administration of Mr. Bush's father released Mr. Bosch from prison in 1990, a step praised by many in Florida's Cuban community. Now 80, he lives outside Miami.

Mr. Posada is two years younger and in failing health, partly the result of a 1990 assassination attempt against him. His application to become a United States citizen has been rejected by the government, but Mr. Posada, who is a naturalized Venezuelan citizen, is pursuing the matter on appeal.

Mr. Soto says Mr. Posada wants to devote whatever time he has left in life to members of his family who live in South Florida, and to a hobby he picked up years ago in prison — painting.

"Mostly nature scenes," Mr. Soto said. "He's seen a lot of those."

In Caracas, Thousands Support Opposition (AP)

By Elizabeth Nunez, Associated Press Writer

Associated Press, October 8, 2006

Thousands marched Saturday in the biggest show of public support yet for Venezuela's main opposition presidential candidate, who pledged to undo what he called the ills of President Hugo Chavez's government.

Manuel Rosales accused the government of mismanaging the country's oil wealth and ignoring crime. He also played on fears that Chavez's close friendship with Cuban leader Fidel Castro was leading Venezuela down the same path as the communist island.

"They say the Venezuelan people rule — that's a lie," said Rosales, governor of oil-rich, western Zulia state, who faces Chavez in the Dec. 3 election. "(We have) a government that is a puppet of a communist, totalitarian system. ... We have a government that is governing from Cuba."

Venezuelan authorities had promised to have as many as 2,500 officers on the streets to ensure security amid concerns about violence as Rosales' supporters traversed sectors of the capital that are pro-Chavez.

A government helicopter flew overhead and a heavy police presence was on hand, but there were no reports of disturbances.

Caracas' metropolitan police estimated the crowd at about 9,000, but reporters on the scene estimated the turnout was more than 10,000. The crowd packed full a 2-mile avenue.

"I'm marching for a different future, for better education," said Julia Pena, a 50-year-old teacher, who came out to show her support for the opposition for the first time since April 2002, when a short-lived coup toppled Chavez before he returned amid a popular uprising.

Chavez grabbed headlines recently when he called President Bush "the devil" and slammed U.S. leaders for trying to block his country from taking a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0078327

Rosales also appeared to rule out the possibility of a boycott against the Dec. 3 presidential election, urging people to vote despite worries about transparency and electronic voting machines. Major opposition parties boycotted congressional elections last year over such concerns.

"We must vote on Dec. 3 and not believe in the threats of the government," he said. "That doesn't help anybody."

Germany Drafts Policy For Europe To Strengthen Russian Ties (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 7 — The German Foreign Ministry is preparing a new policy toward the east that aims to tighten ties between Russia and Europe, but does not address human rights, a theme dear to Chancellor Angela Merkel.

According to Foreign Ministry officials, the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin, has been informed of the policy and likes it. He will visit Germany on Tuesday for a meeting of the Petersburg Circle, a group established five years ago to promote economic, cultural, social and youth links between Russia and Germany.

The policy is described in an internal paper prepared by the ministry. The subtext is clearly Europe's increasing dependence on Russia to meet its energy needs.

But Mrs. Merkel won support from the German public last year by promising a more critical approach toward Russia, and her advisers say she prefers an approach to the east that takes into account the interests of Poland and the Baltic states, not just Western Europe's ties to Russia.

"The view of the chancellery is that we have to take care of Poland, Ukraine and the immediate neighborhood," said Jörg Himmelreich, a regional expert in the Berlin office of the German Marshall Fund of the United States.

The Foreign Ministry paper advocates the adoption of this policy by the European Union during Germany's six-month presidency of the bloc, which begins Jan. 1.

The gap in the approaches is, at least in part, a reflection of the power-sharing arrangement created after inconclusive elections last September. To create a governing coalition in Parliament, Mrs. Merkel crafted a deal between her Christian Democratic Party and the rival Social Democratic Party in which they split the posts in the 16-member cabinet and she became chancellor.

The Foreign Ministry's paper, titled "The German E.U. Presidency: Russia, European Neighborhood Policy and Central Asia," states that "Russia will play a central role in the German E.U. presidency."

In the ministry's vision, this policy would actively engage Russia and the post-Soviet states to bring them closer to Europe.

The section on Russia highlights the energy ties with Europe that were strengthened by Chancellor Gerhard Schröder, a Social Democrat, from 1998 to 2005.

Mr. Schröder developed a friendship with Mr. Putin. On losing to Mrs. Merkel last year, Mr. Schröder was immediately appointed to head a German-Russian gas consortium dominated by Gazprom, Russia's state-owned monopoly.

Some analysts say the Foreign Ministry's outlined policy is shortsighted, because it does not challenge energy relations.

"Germany is becoming increasingly dependent on Russia for its energy," said Prof. Claudia Kempfert, an energy expert at the German Institute for Economic Research. "This dependence is dangerous, given how Putin is trying to push foreign investors out."

Other experts note that it is uncertain that the policy described in the Foreign Ministry paper would lead to better relations.

"We don't have influence with Russia," said Roland Götz, a Russian expert at the government-financed German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "We cannot integrate Russia into NATO or the E.U., because Russia does not want to be integrated. We have no levers."

Germany's Comeback (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

BERLIN -- Germany's richly deserved 60-year holiday from leadership abroad is ending sooner than many here would like. Since World War II, Germans have become comfortable with standing in the shadows of power while the Americans, the French and others shoulder the costly burden of claiming to run the world.

War-imposed modesty no longer shelters Angela Merkel's coalition government from having to show leadership in defining Europe's new relations with a suddenly assertive Russia, fixing an independent Kosovo's place in the Balkans and perhaps even shaping a broad response by secular societies to the challenges posed by militant Islam.

This is an especially daunting agenda for Merkel's ideologically dissonant coalition. The chancellor's Christian Democrats and and their Social Democrat "partners" have been battling openly in recent months over domestic reforms. As a result, the chancellor's once-high approval rating has dropped like a stone.

But with power vacuums developing on the country's eastern and western borderlands and the United States bogged down in Iraq, Berlin understands that it is condemned to lead. A visitor finds the capital beset with angst -- but also bubbling with ideas -- about the approaching German moment in international affairs.

In January, Germany takes over the rotating presidency of the European Union for six months while also serving as host for next year's Group of Eight summit. Both jobs involve setting agendas for others, organizing joint action plans and putting out unexpected diplomatic brush fires when national interests collide.

Merkel will stand pretty much alone in doing this. A looming leadership change and urgent domestic problems in France render inoperative the French-German duopoly that often runs European affairs. Britain and Italy are disabled as potential leadership partners for similar reasons.

To the east, political turmoil in Poland and Ukraine makes the task of designing an E.U. "neighborhood policy" more difficult and more urgent. And Germany will be in the saddle as negotiations get underway on a 10-year strategic cooperation agreement between the European Union and Russia just as Russia is flexing its muscles toward Georgia, other ex-Soviet states and an energy-needy Europe.

Fortunately, Merkel continues to distance herself from President Vladimir Putin -- or rather from the unhealthily supine relationship with Putin pursued by her predecessor, Gerhard Schroeder, now employed by Russia's national pipeline company to oversee a deal he blessed while in office.

Merkel returned fuming from a triangular summit last month with Putin and French President Jacques Chirac, suggesting privately that this would be the last such gathering of the three-power group, which originated in opposition to the U.S. invasion of Iraq. Merkel's mood was not helped by Chirac's public announcement that the meeting would be held in the northeastern French town of Compiegne -- the site of Germany's surrender in World War I and of Hitler's infamous victory jig in 1940 -- before he informed Merkel.

In any event, Merkel and Putin are circling each other cautiously as the Russians seek a legally binding new "strategic partnership" with the European Union that would dilute Europe's transatlantic commitments. Merkel instead would like to see a common European-American energy strategy take shape to reduce the political leverage of Russia and other oil and gas producers. That idea has not evoked enthusiasm in Washington yet, but it should.

Moscow also plays hardball with Berlin by demanding that the final status of the former Serbian province of Kosovo be determined through a negotiated settlement with the Serbs.

Official German thinking projects Kosovo moving next year from U.N. administration to declared independence with limited sovereignty. The new state would have no army, and U.N. membership and other diplomatic recognition would be phased in over a decade.

Too timid for the Kosovars and perhaps for the Bush administration, the ideas will nonetheless anger Russia and upset Serb allies in the European Union. The Kremlin is already warning Berlin that Kosovo independence of any kind will bring disaster. It will set a precedent for breakaway factions in Georgia, Moldova and other places where there are "frozen conflicts" to pursue self-determination, with Russian help.

Berlin's new diplomatic activism complements the recent groundbreaking German military deployments abroad that have been the subject of previous columns, and the efforts by Wolfgang Schaeuble, Merkel's highly able interior minister, to counter militant Islam's challenges to European concepts of freedom of speech and equality of the sexes, the subject of a future column here.

For now it is time to welcome the Germans back from the frustrations and joys of living on history's outskirts and to hope that this time their ideas are stronger than their angst.

A Dying Population (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

The nation is succumbing to a low birthrate, disease and despair. Leaders see the trend as a security threat.

Welcome to Kstinovo, population one.

Antonina Makarova, 78, spends her days watching news and soap operas in her peeling wooden dacha, the only inhabited structure in two lanes of sagging cottages that once were a village. Her nearest neighbor, 80-year-old Maria Belkova, lives in adjacent Sosnovitsy, population two. But she can't hear anymore, and all in all, Makarova finds the television better company.

DOJ_NMG_0078329

"All the houses here were filled with people. There was a cheese factory. But now everyone else has died. God has taken care of them, and he's still making me suffer," Makarova said. "Even the thieves have disappeared."

The Tver region, along the upper reaches of the Volga River 130 miles north of Moscow, is dotted with more than 1,400 villages such as Kstinovo labeled nezhiloye — depopulated. Since 1989, the number of people here has shrunk by about 250,000 to about 1.4 million, with deaths outnumbering births more than 2 to 1.

The Tver region is far from unusual in this country.

Russia is rapidly losing population. Its people are succumbing to one of the world's fastest-growing AIDS epidemics, resurgent tuberculosis, rampant cardiovascular disease, alcohol and drug abuse, smoking, suicide and the lethal effects of unchecked industrial pollution.

In addition, abortions outpaced births last year by more than 100,000. An estimated 10 million Russians of reproductive age are sterile because of botched abortions or poor health. The public healthcare system is collapsing. And many parents in more prosperous urban areas say they can't afford homes large enough for the number of children they'd like to have.

The former Soviet Union, with almost 300 million people, was the world's third-most populous country, behind China and India. Slightly more than half of its citizens lived in Russia. The country has lost the equivalent of a city of 700,000 people every year since the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, only partially offset by an influx of people from other former Soviet republics.

A country that sprawls across one-eighth of the globe is now home to 142 million people.

The losses have been disproportionately male. At the height of its power, the Soviet Union's people lived almost as long as Americans. But now, the average Russian man can expect to live about 59 years, 16 years less than an American man and 14 less than a Russian woman.

Sergei Mironov, chairman of the upper house of Russia's parliament, said last year that if the trend didn't change, the population would fall to 52 million by 2080.

"There will no longer be a great Russia," he said. "It will be torn apart piece by piece, and finally cease to exist."

That may be an overstatement, but there are serious questions about whether Russia will be able to hold on to its lands along the border with China or field an army, let alone a workforce to support the ill and the elderly.

The government, flush with revenue from record prices for the country's oil exports, has started to respond. President Vladimir V. Putin this year pledged payments of $111 a month to mothers who elected to have a second child, plus a nest egg of $9,260 to be used for education, a mortgage or pensions. He also called for renewed efforts to attract ethnic Russians still living in the former Soviet republics.

"Russia has a huge territory, the largest territory in the world," Putin said. "If the situation remains unchanged, there will simply be no one to protect it."

'This Infection in Us'

The economic earthquake of Russia's transition from communism to capitalism plunged tens of millions into poverty overnight and changed the value systems upon which many had planned their lives.

A small minority, mostly in urban centers such as Moscow and St. Petersburg, were able to exploit the absence of rules in the chaotic 1990s to become fabulously wealthy. But such a profound social transition, coming at the end of a century of war, revolution and ruthless social experimentation, condemned a great many more to a deep malaise.

Those who lost out have proved susceptible to drinking, smoking and other habits that killed millions of Russians even in the best of times. In more extreme cases, they kill themselves.

The suicide rate jumped nearly 50% during the 1990s; half a million people killed themselves from 1995 through 2003. Russians fling themselves from balconies, slash their wrists or simply walk out in the snow on a bitter night.

Russia's suicide rate, at about 36 per 100,000 people, is second only to that of Lithuania, according to the Serbsky National Research Center for Social and Forensic Psychiatry. In some remote areas of Russia, the rate exceeds 100 per 100,000.

Nikolai Zavada, a 21-year-old musician who goes by the name Serial Self-Killer, posted a song on http://www.mysuicide.ru , a well-known website that was later shut down because of public pressure:

I'm going out.

And it doesn't matter whether it's up or down.

Or who's holding your hand, an angel or otherwise….

The cold has worn me out.

"People have a lack of hope," Zavada said in an interview. "That all their efforts are in vain. And also, they have a feeling of eternal emptiness."

Russia's transformation from a society that guaranteed employment means that millions of people, especially in the provinces, "have become surplus; they do not have a place in the current economy," said Andrei Demin, president of the Russian Public Health Assn., a nongovernmental advocacy group.

"They do not protest openly. They protest inside," he said. "And the most extreme form of protest is just dying."

Others tried to adapt, and still failed. Birthrates declined, not only because couples such as those elsewhere in Europe elected to have fewer children, but because they couldn't afford to have large families.

Roman Kiptenko, 35, has a family, his health and two university degrees, but his life is turning out far differently than he had imagined. The national parks institute where he worked disintegrated in the Soviet collapse. He now works as a technical director in a friend's advertising company in Moscow. But the firm is small and its future uncertain. His wife was laid off last spring from her job as a dental office manager.

Kiptenko has begun to realize that they might never do better than the $330-a-month apartment — a cramped living room adjoining a tiny kitchen — where they live with their 10-year-old daughter. Kiptenko and his wife sleep on a pullout sofa. Their daughter's bed in the corner seats guests by day, her toys stacked neatly to one side. Clothing is stacked in cupboards next to Kiptenko's computer.

"At first, situations would come up when my wife would talk about wanting another child," he said. "But gradually, she stopped raising those questions."

Alexei Chaika, another Moscow resident, blamed the heart attack he suffered at 27 on stress from his job as a transportation manager for a construction company. Recovering at a clinic in the capital, he said he had worked every day until 11 p.m., and every weekend for months on end, all for a salary of $525 a month.

"At work, the tension is very high, and you have to quarrel with people," he said. "Somebody hits me on the back of my head; I hit someone lower than me; he hits somebody else."

Although the problems are surfacing in the post-Soviet period, some argue that their cause can be found in communism's willful destruction of generations of the country's most capable and adaptable people.

"Seventy-five years of Bolshevik life in this country led to the formation of a tribe of people which was cultivated to listen to orders, and fulfill them," said Alexander Gorelik, a St. Petersburg physician. Stalinism, he said, aimed for "the planned and gradual physical destruction of the most moral, the most creative group of the population."

"There is such a thing as a will for life. And the whole trouble is that the Russian public in general, and especially the male population, has a big deficiency in this area."

Vyacheslav Pushkarev, a Russian Orthodox priest who oversees several congregations in Siberian villages now too small to have a full-time cleric, said the Soviet system destroyed bodies and spirits in equal proportion.

"We are left with this infection in us, this sickness of degradation in everything around us because we were all part of it," he said. "We're living in a huge bowl here, and we're all getting boiled together."

Drowning in Alcohol

Many a Russian village that once might have been the subject of an idyllic painting of ruddy-cheeked peasants leading tired horses through the fields are now part of a twilight world of illness, drunkenness and stunning lethargy.

Moscow has the second-largest concentration of billionaires in the world. But one-fifth of all Russians live on less than $38 a month, many of them in the countryside. The collapse of collective farming and the failure to replace it with viable private agriculture has left thousands of villages in limbo, their residents living on minuscule government stipends, odd jobs, kitchen gardens — and vodka.

There is a long history of alcohol abuse in Russia. Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev tried to tackle the problem 20 years ago by limiting the production and distribution of liquor. Male life expectancy increased three years.

But consumption levels shot back up as soon as the controls were eased. The average Russian drinks five gallons of pure alcohol a year, causing an estimated 900,000 deaths over the last decade from acute alcohol poisoning, fights and accidents, according to figures released by Tatyana Yakovleva, head of the Russian parliament's healthcare committee. Others suffer permanent brain damage or liver damage from homemade alcohol.

"People drink, and they drink a lot, and they drink for a long time, because they can't help but drink," said Yuliya Kovgan, 25, her voice trembling as she struggled to sit without falling over in a potato field on the edge of Ryazanovshchina, a Siberian village northeast of Irkutsk.

She was surrounded by a few dozen seed potatoes, an empty shot glass, a bottle of industrial-grade alcohol and her reeling brother, an unemployed roofer. Standing to the side in an old housecoat was Larisa Berezhnaya, her 53-year-old mother, tapping a grimy foot and affecting a disdainful air; it became apparent that she was drunk too.

"This is our life; we call it normal. We plant potatoes, we dig them out, and that's it," Berezhnaya shrugged. "There's nothing for people here."

DOJ_NMG_0078331

A few decades ago, Ryazanovshchina was a collective farm center with thriving livestock operations and about twice its current population. Men would go into the forests to fell timber all summer and the women would celebrate their homecoming with samovars of tea in the street. But without the support of the Soviet state, one by one the farms failed.

Last winter, villagers say, someone burned down a neighbor's hay shed when she wouldn't give a bottle on credit. In a nearby town, a drunk grandmother threw a crying infant out the window of her fifth-floor apartment. Pushkarev, the regional archpriest, confided that the church in nearby Tikhonovka was not functioning because "the priest is on a drunken rampage."

Olga Kolotygina, 36, one of several women who have assumed leadership of the Ryazanovshchina town council, estimates that no more than half a dozen men among the village's 160 people are sober and "trying to improve their lives."

Much more typical is the filthy two-room shack at the end of a street where Lyudmila Borisova, 16, is looking after her three younger siblings. Her mother moved to the next town with her boyfriend, leaving the children behind.

While Borisova earns money by tending cattle in a pasture outside town, her siblings wander the village gathering handouts. They retire each night to a pair of bare mattresses. Borisova says she doesn't blame her mother for leaving, and she'll do the same when she can.

"There's nothing good here," she said.

AIDS Strikes the Young

It has been five years since Svetlana Glukhova was diagnosed as HIV-positive, but she says she still has no idea whether she needs drug therapy. Doctors at the only AIDS center in her city do not have the necessary laboratory equipment to decide that.

She does know that even when she took her first AIDS test, the sores on the fingers she once used to inject heroin already were failing to heal.

The United Nations says Russia has more people infected with HIV than any other country in Europe, due in part to "extraordinarily large numbers of young people who inject drugs."

But the disease has spread widely through the population, and more than half of all new cases result from heterosexual intercourse. Officially, more than 300,000 Russians are infected with HIV or have AIDS, but the U.N. says the number could easily be much higher.

The problem is not as serious as Africa's. The difference, experts say, is that African birthrates are high enough to replace those who die. Not so in Russia.

Compounding the problem, the prevalence of AIDS among young people threatens to add to the population decline by killing them before they can bring a new generation into the world.

Murray Feshbach of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, one of the world's leading experts on Russian health and demographics, said in a study that 80% of Russian AIDS patients are younger than 30. In the West, it's nearly the reverse: 70% are older than 30.

That means 5 million to 10 million Russian teenagers could contract the disease within a few years, federal health officials say. The Russian Military Medical Commission has recorded a twenty-fivefold increase in the number of HIV-positive military conscripts in the last five years, Feshbach said.

"Even optimistically, you're looking at 250,000 deaths a year from AIDS alone in 2020, and pessimistically, we're talking about 650,000 a year," Feshbach said.

Deaths among adults between the ages of 25 and 49 would be particularly devastating, he said.

The Russian government pledged in 1995 to provide free AIDS treatment. But more than a decade later, only about 5,000 people are getting antiretroviral drug therapy.

Putin announced a twentyfold increase in funding this year, providing $120 million for the treatment of perhaps 15,000 AIDS patients.

A coalition of nongovernmental organizations known as the Global Fund is allocating another $120 million to treat as many as 50,000 additional patients through 2010.

But the World Health Organization said in June that shortages in AIDS drugs had developed in several regions, apparently resulting in interruptions in treatment and possibly some deaths.

Akrom A. Eltom, the agency's AIDS program leader in Moscow, said patients who had been coaxed with great difficulty into a healthcare system that strongly stigmatized them might not return, endangering their health and encouraging the development of drug-resistant strains of the disease.

Glukhova said AIDS patients in the city of Tula, the arms manufacturing center 112 miles southwest of Moscow where she lives, would be ostracized if they went public. She said she wouldn't dare talk to Russian news media without covering her face.

"If I uncover my face, I will be eaten alive at the bus stop tomorrow," she said in an interview. "I will lose my job, without any doubt."

Glukhova headed a support network of fellow HIV patients in Tula until international funds ran out in 2004. She said doctors told her they estimated that 1,000 people in Tula — population 600,000 — needed drug therapy for AIDS, but only 10 were getting it — and only partial treatment at that.

"When I asked the doctors in the AIDS center about this therapy, they just shrugged their shoulders. Because when I told them I heard there are three drugs you're supposed to take, they had a notion of what I was talking about, but they don't have access to it. The maximum they can offer you is just one drug," Glukhova said.

Sitting in a dimly lighted cafe that doubles as a dance hall on Saturday nights, Glukhova wiped away tears and said she was watching her friends slowly die.

"One person I know, he was trying to stifle all his pangs by injecting and injecting himself with drugs. He couldn't even get up from his bed anymore, but he continued to call his friends and ask for more drugs," she said.

"When I said to him, 'Let me take you to the hospital, let me try to get something for you,' he waved me away.

"Some people have such moments of despair that they just don't have the guts to struggle for their life anymore."

Outspoken Putin Critic Shot Dead In Moscow (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 7 -- Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian journalist whose byline defined the fading craft of investigative and crusading reporting in President Vladimir Putin's Russia, was fatally gunned down Saturday in the lobby of her apartment building in central Moscow.

Politkovskaya, 48, was renowned for her probes of the brutality of Russia's military campaign in Chechnya as well as the banality of corruption permeating Russian life, from the remote provinces to the bright lights of Moscow.

Born to Soviet diplomats in New York in 1958, Politkovskaya, who also had American citizenship, chronicled nearly every major story in Russia in the past decade. Her reporting often clashed with official versions of such events as the hostage crisis at a theater in Moscow in 2002 and the bloody end of a school siege in Beslan in 2004.

She was a harsh critic of Putin's rule and was working on a story about torture in Chechnya, where a Kremlin-backed strongman has all but routed a separatist movement that sparked two bloody wars, at a cost to Russia that has yet to be measured.

The article was to be published Monday, according to her newspaper, Novaya Gazeta, one of the few independent media outlets in a country where much of the press is timid if not directly controlled by central authorities or regional power brokers.

Former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, who is said by friends to be concerned about the increasing lack of pluralism in the country, became a minority shareholder in the newspaper this summer.

"It is a savage crime against a professional and serious journalist and a courageous woman," Gorbachev told the Russian news agency Interfax. "It is a blow to the entire democratic, independent press. It is a grave crime against the country, against all of us."

The Kremlin issued no immediate comment on the killing.

The attack was the highest-profile killing of a journalist in Russia since July 2004, when Paul Klebnikov, an American editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine, was gunned down outside his office. Twelve journalists have been killed since Putin came to power in 2000, and most of the cases remain unsolved.

Politkovskaya's name carried the kind of weight in Russia that the names Woodward and Hersh carry in the United States. She was unapologetically contrarian and distinguished by her willingness to go to the scene of whatever crisis captured her attention.

During the Moscow theater siege, she entered the building and spoke directly to the hostage-takers. On her way to Beslan to report on the crisis there, she became ill, leading to allegations that she had been poisoned to prevent her from reaching the school, where 331 people later died, most of them children.

"We had different positions on many issues, including issues related to the situation in the North Caucasus, but we always admitted Anna Politkovskaya's amazing fearlessness and inner freedom and her ability to defend her point of view," said Dmitry Rogozin, a member of parliament and former leader of the Motherland party.

Politkovskaya was shot twice, once in the head, at 4:20 p.m. The weapon was thrown at her feet, according to Vitaly Yaroshevsky, deputy editor in chief of her newspaper. He said police had obtained a surveillance tape from a camera on the street. The authorities described the attack as a contract killing, which they said was carried out by a young man dressed in black.

DOJ_NMG_0078333

"There is no doubt she was killed for her professional activities," said Igor Yakovenko, general secretary of the Russian Union of Journalists. "She was an absolutely hard-edged person and honest journalist who tackled the toughest subjects."

Politkovskaya's newspaper said it would conduct its own investigation of the killing.

The shooting occurred on Putin's birthday and closely followed the birthday of his anointed leader in Chechnya, Ramzan Kadyrov. Angry journalists here could not let the coincidence pass.

"Apparently, this was a present for the two leaders," Yakovenko said.

"Why do I so dislike Putin?" Politkovskaya had asked in her book, "Putin's Russia." "I dislike him for . . . his cynicism, for his racism, for his lies . . . for the massacre of the innocents which went on throughout his first term as president."

Politkovskaya, the mother of two children, is also the author of "A Dirty War: A Russian Reporter in Chechnya".

In New York, the Committee to Protect Journalists described Politkovskaya's death as a "devastating development for journalism in Russia."

Journalist Critical Of Chechen War Is Shot Dead (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 7 — Anna Politkovskaya, the veteran Russian journalist and author who made her name as a searing critic of the Kremlin and its policies in Chechnya, was found dead on Saturday in her apartment building, shot in the head with a pistol, the authorities and her colleagues said.

Ms. Politkovskaya, 48, was a journalist with few equals in Russia. She was a special correspondent for the Novaya Gazeta newspaper and had become one of the country's most prominent human rights advocates.

In recent years, as the Russian news media faced intensifying pressure under the administration of President Vladimir V. Putin, she maintained her outspoken stance. And she became an international figure who often spoke abroad about a war she called "state versus group terrorism."

She was a strident critic of Mr. Putin, whom she accused of stifling civil society and allowing a climate of official corruption and brutality.

She was found dead by a neighbor shortly after 5 p.m. A Makarov 9-millimeter pistol had been dropped at her side, the signature of a contract killing, Vitaly Yaroshevsky, the deputy editor of Novaya Gazeta, said in a telephone interview.

"We are certain that this is the horrible outcome of her journalistic activity," he said. "No other versions are assumed."

In Washington, the State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the United States "urges the Russian government to conduct an immediate and thorough investigation in order to find, prosecute and bring to justice all those responsible for this heinous murder."

The former Soviet president Mikhail S. Gorbachev, a shareholder of the newspaper where Ms. Politkovskaya worked, called her killing "a savage crime."

"It is a blow to the entire democratic, independent press," he told the Interfax news agency. "It is a grave crime against the country, against all of us."

Accounts about where she died conflicted, with some law enforcement authorities saying she was found inside the entrance of her apartment building and others saying she was in the elevator.

The police said a security video camera had recorded the image of her presumed killer: a tall young man in dark clothes and a black baseball cap. They said a search for him had begun.

Ms. Politkovskaya, who had two adult children, had worked for Novaya Gazeta since 1999, and covered the second Chechen war and the terrorist siege of a Moscow theater in 2002. One of her books, "A Small Corner of Hell: Dispatches from Chechnya," recorded her impressions of the war's unrelenting and often macabre cruelty, and the manifest corruption of many of its participants.

She wrote of torture, mass executions, kidnappings to gain ransom and to eliminate rebel suspects, and the sale by Russian soldiers of Chechen corpses to their families for proper Islamic burial. Her writing cemented her place as one of the war's most vocal domestic critics.

"The army and police, nearly 100,000 strong, wander around Chechnya in a state of complete moral decay," she wrote. "And what response could one expect but more terrorism, and the recruitment of new resistance fighters?"

Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, Russia has been one of the world's more difficult and dangerous countries for journalists. The climate has continued in recent years; at least 12 journalists have been killed in Russia in contract-style murders since 2000, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists.

None has been solved, including the contract killing in 2004 of Paul Klebnikov, the American editor of Forbes magazine's Russian-language edition.

Ms. Politkovskaya had received death threats in the past, and at least once had left the country fearing for her safety. In 2004 she claimed to have been poisoned while en route on an airplane to cover the public school siege in Beslan; she passed out on the flight but survived. Mr. Yaroshevsky also said that Novaya Gazeta had briefly placed her under protective guard a few years ago.

But as prosecutors opened an investigation into what they called premeditated murder, her colleagues expressed astonishment that she had been killed in such a fashion, saying her public stature had seemed to lend her an aura of invincibility.

"She was doing such risky things for such a long time that it seemed she had transcended the danger," said Tanya Lokshina, chairwoman of Center Demos, a Moscow-based human rights organization. "I am ashamed to say it, but we all felt she was next to a monument, and that she was an icon."

Ms. Lokshina said she had been with Ms. Politkovskaya two weeks ago in Stockholm, and that nothing seemed out of order. "She never spoke about any current threats," she said. "Everything seemed quite normal. She seemed happy and never referred to anything suspicious."

Mr. Yaroshevsky said that Ms. Politkovskaya had been at work on Saturday finishing an article for the Monday paper about torturers in the government of Ramzan A. Kadyrov, the pro-Kremlin premier of Chechnya. He said the story included evidence and pictures.

In an interview in April with The New York Times, Ms. Politkovskaya said she had evidence of torture in Chechnya by Mr. Kadyrov's police and other gunmen, including at least one witness who had been tortured by Mr. Kadyrov himself. Mr. Kadyrov has always vigorously denied such allegations.

Mr. Yaroshevsky said there were no immediate theories about who might be behind her killing, and noted that it might be convenient for an enemy of Mr. Kadyrov to kill Ms. Politkovskaya in order to blacken the Chechen premier's name.

The paper had been expecting her to file the article on Saturday night, he said, and she had apparently been killed after she left her apartment for a trip to a nearby store. The RTR television station reported that investigators believed that she had been followed throughout the day.

Russian Who Reported On Chechnya Killed (AP)

By Maria Danilova, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

A journalist who chronicled Russian military abuses against civilians in Chechnya, garnering awards and accolades from around the world, was found shot to death Saturday in her apartment building. Prosecutors suspect her killing could be connected to her investigative reporting.

Anna Politkovskaya, 48, was found dead in an elevator in the building in central Moscow, police, prosecutors and a colleague said.

Prosecutors have opened a murder investigation, said Svetlana Petrenko, spokeswoman for the Moscow prosecutor's office. Investigators suspect the killing could be linked to her work, Vyacheslav Rosinsky, Moscow's first deputy prosecutor, said on state-run Rossiya television.

Rosinsky said a pistol and bullets were found at the site of the crime. The RIA-Novosti news agency, citing police officials, reported that Politkovskaya was shot twice, the second time in the head.

The ITAR-Tass news agency reported that work was under way on a composite sketch of the attacker based on footage recorded by a security camera at the building. The assailant, believed to have acted alone, wore black.

Politkovskaya, who wrote for the Novaya Gazeta newspaper, chronicled the killings, tortures and beatings of civilians by Russian servicemen in Chechnya in reports that put her on a collision course with the authorities but won her numerous international awards.

"People sometimes pay with their lives for saying out loud what they think. People can even get killed just for giving me information," Reporters Without Borders quoted her as saying at a press freedom conference in Vienna in December.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States was shocked and profoundly saddened by the murder of a journalist who devoted much of her career to "shining a light on human rights abuses and other atrocities of the war in Chechnya" and the plight of Chechen refugees.

"The United States urges the Russian government to conduct an immediate and thorough investigation in order to find, prosecute, and bring to justice all those responsible for this heinous murder," McCormack said in a statement.

Politkovskaya also wrote a book critical of Russian President Vladimir Putin and his military campaign in Chechnya, documenting widespread abuse of civilians by government troops. And she was a persistent critic of Chechnya's Moscow-backed Prime Minister Ramzan Kadyrov, accusing his security forces of kidnapping and torturing civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0078335

In "Putin's Russia," Politkovskaya wrote of more than a million soldiers and officers who have passed through the Chechnya experience.

"Poisoned by a war on their own territory, they have become a serious factor affecting civilian life. They can no longer simply be left out of the social equation," she wrote.

Politkovskaya began reporting on Chechnya in 1999 during Russia's second military campaign there, concentrating less on military engagements than on the human side of the war. She wrote about the Chechen inhabitants of refugee camps and wounded Russian soldiers — until she was banned from visiting the hospitals, said Oleg Panfilov, director of the Moscow-based Center for Journalism in Extreme Situations.

"Whenever the question arose whether there is honest journalism in Russia, almost every time the first name that came to mind was Politkovskaya," he said.

Politkovskaya had frequently received threats, Panfilov said. A few months ago, unknown assailants had tried unsuccessfully to break into a car her daughter, Vera, was driving, he said.

In 2001, she fled to Vienna, Austria, for several months after receiving e-mail threats alleging that a Russian police officer she had accused of committing atrocities against civilians was intent on revenge. The officer, Sergei Lapin, was detained in 2002 but the case against him was closed the following year.

"There are journalists who have this fate hanging over them. I always thought something would happen to Anya, first of all because of Chechnya," Panfilov said, referring to Politkovskaya by her nickname.

In 2004, she fell seriously ill with symptoms of food poisoning after drinking tea on a flight from Moscow to southern Russia during the school hostage crisis in Beslan. Her colleagues suspected the incident was an attempt on her life.

She was one of the few people to enter the Moscow theater where Chechen militants seized hundreds of hostages in October 2002 to try negotiating with the rebels. She later devoted much of her investigative reporting to that crisis, in which 129 victims died, the overwhelming majority succumbing to the gas used by special forces to knock out the hostage-takers.

"Anna was a hero to so many of us, and we'll miss her personally, but we'll also miss the information that she and only she was brave enough and dedicated enough to dig out and make public," said Joel Simon, executive director of the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists.

The 46-nation Council of Europe, a leading human rights watchdog whose executive body is currently led by Russia, called for her death to be investigated quickly and convincingly.

"We have all lost a strong voice of the kind which is indispensable in any genuine democracy," said the council's secretary general, Terry Davis.

Politkovskaya's murder is the highest-profile killing of a journalist in Russia since the July 2004 slaying of Paul Klebnikov, editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine.

Russia has become one of the deadliest countries for journalists. Twenty-three journalists were killed in Russia between 1996 and 2005, many in Chechnya, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. At least 12 have been murdered in contract-style killings since Putin came to power, Simon said.

"None of those have been adequately investigated," he said. "We do know that record creates an environment where those who might seek to carry out this murder would feel that there would be few likely consequences."

The intimidation and murder of 12 journalists in Russia in the past six years, including American citizen Paul Klebnikov on July 9, 2004 is an affront to free and independent media and to democratic values.

In addition to her daughter, Politkovskaya is survived by a son, Ilya, Panfilov said.

During her career, Politkovskaya received more than 10 awards and prizes, including an award for human rights reporting from the London-based Amnesty International; a freedom of speech award from the Paris-based watchdog Reporters Without Borders; and a journalism and democracy award from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Acclaimed Reporter Killed In Russia (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 8, 2006

Anna Politkovskaya, known for writing about human rights abuses in Chechnya, is shot in an apparent assassination.

MOSCOW — A prominent Russian journalist known for reporting of human rights abuses in war-torn Chechnya was shot and killed Saturday in her apartment building in what colleagues and authorities described as an apparent assassination.

Anna Politkovskaya, 48, was shot in the chest as she was getting out of an elevator, then shot in the head, the Russian news agency RIA Novosti reported, citing investigative sources. The image of the suspected killer was captured on a surveillance videotape, the agency said.

DOJ_NMG_0078336

"We have a feeling, almost an assurance, that it is political murder," said Vitaly Yaroshevsky, deputy editor of Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where she worked. "It was certainly related to her professional activities."

Politkovskaya, known to her friends as Anya, was one in a series of prominent officials and journalists to die violently in post-Soviet Russia, and her slaying sent a chill through Russia's community of pro-democracy and human rights activists.

Last month, gunmen shot and killed a senior central banker, Andrei Kozlov, who had been involved in shutting down banks suspected of money laundering. American journalist Paul Klebnikov, editor of the Russian edition of Forbes magazine, was gunned down near his office in 2004.

Politkovskaya, a mother of two, was considered one of the toughest critics of Russian President Vladimir V. Putin and of pro-Moscow Chechen Prime Minister Ramzan Kadyrov. One of her areas of expertise was documenting mistreatment of ordinary Chechens by Russian troops or forces loyal to Kadyrov.

Yaroshevsky said Politkovskaya had been working on an article about torture in Chechnya that was due to run in Monday's paper.

"As far as I know she was planning to write about Kadyrov people who torture people in order to get confessions from them for anti-government activities," Yaroshevsky said. "I don't know whether she managed to complete her story. But if she did, or there are some drafts left, we will certainly publish it. We know that she had testimonies from those who were tortured, and photos of them."

Former Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, who recently purchased a major interest in Novaya Gazeta, described Politkovskaya's killing as "a savage crime against a professional and serious journalist and a courageous woman."

"It is a grave crime against the country, against all of us," Gorbachev told the Russian news agency Interfax.

The killing of Politkovskaya led to speculation that it was ordered by someone loyal to Kadyrov or Putin who wanted to eliminate an influential critic. But Yaroshevsky said he didn't think the Kremlin was involved.

"If we were to think that, it would mean that we live in a country of cannibals," he said.

Gorbachev said he thought the killing was ordered by someone "who wants to cast a shadow both on the leadership of the country" and on the "positive" developments taking place in Chechnya, where separatist rebels appear to have been greatly weakened and Kadyrov has reimposed a semblance of order.

Politkovskaya had an exceptionally high international profile for a Russian journalist. She was frequently quoted as an analyst by Western media, and she received more than 10 awards and prizes in her career from groups such as Amnesty International, Reporters Without Borders and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

In a 2002 opinion piece for the Los Angeles Times, Politkovskaya chided the West for its faith in Putin.

"Today's regime in Russia, as personified first and foremost by Putin, is interested only in power — to keep it, consolidate and augment it, and do it in such a way that opponents would not even be able to raise their heads," she wrote.

Politkovskaya was scheduled to be in Los Angeles to receive a Courage in Journalism Award from the International Women in Media Foundation in Beverly Hills on Oct. 24, 2002, but instead returned to Moscow in an effort to help resolve the takeover of a theater by Chechen militants. She was one of the few people to enter the theater and attempt to negotiate with the hostage-holding rebels, but the effort failed and authorities eventually stormed the theater. At least 129 hostages and all the rebels died.

After another hostage crisis in 2004, the seizure of a school in Beslan, Politkovskaya became seriously ill on a flight to the region and was hospitalized.

She and her doctors suspected poisoning, but it was never proved.

"I always had a list of journalists whose lives I am scared for," said Oleg Panfilov, director of the Moscow-based Center for Journalism in Extreme Situations. "Anya was first on my list."

Alexei Venediktov, editor in chief of Echo of Moscow radio, one of the few broadcasting outlets still pursuing Western-style journalism in Russia, said that after word of Politkovskaya's death spread, some of his friends urged him to start using bodyguards.

"I think that this murder may contain a signal for all of us, but this signal is secondary," he said. "The first and primary target was Anna herself, as a journalist."

Lyudmila Alexeyeva, a former Soviet-era dissident who heads the Moscow Helsinki Group human rights organization, said she was sure the attack on Politkovskaya was "a purely political murder."

"As for me personally," she said, "I am not scared because I will turn 80 next year, so what can I be scared of?"

Murder In Moscow (WP)

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

The Putin era of brutality claims a victim of rare courage.

DOJ_NMG_0078337

ANNA POLITKOVSKAYA, who was murdered in her apartment building yesterday, knew it was dangerous to be an honest reporter in President Vladimir Putin's Russia. Yet, as he wielded a combination of blandishments and bullying to gradually reimpose authoritarianism on his country, Ms. Politkovskaya, 48 and the mother of two, never yielded. Whether reporting on Mr. Putin's dirty war in the separatist region of Chechnya or on the diminution of freedom at home in Moscow, she remained, if not unafraid, unbowed.

Chances are Ms. Politkovskaya's murderer will never be officially identified. At least a dozen other journalists have been murdered in contract-style killings in the past six years, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists, and not one of those murders has been solved. Human rights advocates and pro-democracy politicians have been struck down in the same way.

Yet it is quite possible, without performing any detective work, to say what is ultimately responsible for these deaths: It is the climate of brutality that has flourished under Mr. Putin. A former KGB agent himself, he inherited an imperfect democracy and systematically undermined its institutions. The media, political parties, local government, private business -- each in turn was neutered. Loyalty to Mr. Putin has become the quality that matters most, and any opponent is labeled an enemy, to be bankrupted, imprisoned or worse. Meanwhile, ugly nationalism was permitted to flourish.

Now you can see these same values being applied to foreign policy. The independent nation of Georgia, to Russia's south, has not displayed adequate fealty in Mr. Putin's view; it wants to be a democracy, with normal ties to the West. So the czar has launched an ugly campaign of threats against the country and the hundreds of thousands of ethnic Georgians who live in Russia. It is a dangerous moment.

Through all this, the Bush administration has responded with timid complaints bracketed, until recently, by absurd protestations that Russia was moving, overall, in the right direction. France and Germany, dependent on Russian natural gas, have bowed even more cravenly. Against these studies in amoral pragmatism, the courage of small nations, such as Georgia, and lone heroes, such as Anna Politkovskaya, shines all the more luminously.

"Taking a risk comes with the job," she said in 2002, as she accepted an award for courage from the International Women's Media Foundation. "And if you cannot take it any more, if you are unwilling to risk, you have to leave.

"As for myself," she concluded four years ago, "I am not tired yet."

Our Failure In Europe's East (WP)

By Bruce P. Jackson

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

At Warsaw University in 2002, in what many believe to be his finest speech, President Bush advanced a vision of a free and complete Europe that would stretch "from the Baltic to the Black Sea." At the end of next month, when they gather in Riga, Latvia, on the shores of the Baltic Sea, Bush and the NATO allies will have cause to wonder what happened to their hopes for Europe's East.

At the most superficial level, things never go well in Europe when the United States is preoccupied elsewhere. This was true in 1956 during the Suez crisis, when the Soviet Union invaded Hungary, and again in 1968, when the Vietnam War drowned out interest in the suppression of the Prague spring. Given NATO's difficulties in Afghanistan and the bloody frustration of the United States in Iraq, it is not surprising to see Russia bullying its way around its former empire and threatening energy-dependent Europe.

But the newly powerful Kremlin, flush with oil money, is not the real problem of Europe's East. Even truculent Turkey, which now seems lost in a strange haze of anti-Americanism, anti-Semitism and vaguely Islamist nativism, is not the problem. Turkey has been the "sick man" of Europe for at least a century, and Russia has been a threat to its neighbors far longer. What has changed is that Europe has finally reached the frontiers of its influence and has no idea what to do with its new neighborhood.

To the south of Vienna lie Croatia, Macedonia, Serbia, Montenegro, Bosnia, Albania and Kosovo, which have been waiting on Europe's doorstep since the wars of Yugoslav succession ended in 1999. This year at the NATO summit the top three candidates, Albania, Croatia and Macedonia, can only hope for an honorable mention on the back pages of the summit communique.

The rest of the Western Balkans has even less interaction with Europe. Over 70 percent of university students in Serbia have never set foot outside their country. This may not be surprising to Americans, but it is shocking on a continent as interconnected as Europe. Albanian students have given up trying to get visas to visit Italy and now spend their vacations in Libya.

Comparatively, however, the Western Balkans are the most fortunate of the countries in Europe's East. In December, when Romania enters the European Union, Europe will border Moldova, whose gross domestic product is roughly half of Haiti's. Moldova's wine, by far its most important product, is embargoed both by Russia, because of Moldova's deviationist pro-Western tendencies, and by the European Union, because of the high quality and low cost of the wine itself. In a triumph of enlightened

E.U. policy and in keeping with the law of unintended consequences, Moldova's largest cash export to Europe today is sexually trafficked women.

Like Moldova and the western Balkans, Ukraine also suffers from the tendency of both Washington and Brussels to isolate what they do not understand. Since the early 1990s the United States has pursued a manic-depressive policy toward the largest country in Eastern Europe -- and for that matter toward the country with the largest Jewish population remaining in Europe.

At first, in the infamous "Chicken Kiev" speech, delivered by President George H.W. Bush in 1991, we advised Ukraine to remain part of the Soviet Union. We then celebrated Ukraine's independence and its common-sense president, Leonid Kuchma -- until we decided that Kuchma was an autocrat who sold radars illegally to Saddam Hussein. It turns out that this did not happen, but you get the point. The same unpredictable volatility characterizes the ups and downs of our response to the coalition government in Kiev today. Seventeen years after the fall of the Berlin Wall, the United States and Europe cannot maintain a consistent policy toward Ukraine from one day to the next.

What confounds both Europe and the United States are the complexity of post-Soviet societies and the impotence of Western institutions. But instead of combining our efforts with those of the European Union to end the isolation of Europe's East, we have allowed the fecklessness of the European Union and the impatience of U.S. policy to re-create what the Soviet Union used to call its "near abroad." In effect, a vacuum of crime, underdevelopment and squabbling political elites now stretches from the Baltic states to the northern shore of the Black Sea. This is the sad Marshall Plan of our generation.

The problem of Europe's East is simply the loss of political vision in Washington and Brussels and the failure to keep the commitment to a Europe that is whole, free and at peace. One wonders: If this is the best Europe can do in its neighborhood and the best the United States can do together with Europe, what chances do we have in the Greater Middle East, where our ideas and influence count for far less than they do in Europe's unloved East?

In A Long-Ago Revolution, Echoes For Today (NYT)

By Roger Cohen

The New York Times, October 8, 2006

FUNNY with history, how remote it can seem, and how close, even in teeming Times Square, scarcely an oasis of retrospection. Charles Legendy recalled being there the other day when his gaze turned to a black-and-white billboard of a tank emblazoned with the words “1956 Hungary” and, beneath that, “Our Revolution Was Not a Movie.”

His wife, Annemarie, also looked up, and the elegant young man on the left of the tank in a European city rising in revolutionary ire against the Soviet empire caught her eye. She knew him, she felt, with a certain intimacy. “Charlie,” she said, grabbing her husband and pointing at the photograph, “that’s you!”

A half-century can concertina in a moment, eliding exile and a whole American life, and leaving a 69-year-old New Yorker, Mr. Legendy, back in the Budapest of his youth, on the eve of the Hungarian uprising of Oct. 23, 1956, living once again “that electric atmosphere, that absolute exhilaration.”

Mr. Legendy’s disorientation — he said it took him some time to accept that he was indeed captured in an image he’d never previously seen — is in some measure also every American’s at this 50th anniversary. The Hungarian events are far away, but are they? Once again, in Middle Eastern guise, the United States confronts issues of containment or rollback, of moral principle or pragmatic caution, of liberty or stability.

“The same quandaries are posed, most fundamentally the question of how America can behave responsibly and whether it may be more tragic to engage in war against tyranny or refrain from it,” said Paul Berman, an author who has written widely on European political history.

President Bush, who chose to tear down the status quo in Iraq and unleash violent instability in the name of liberty, has not hesitated to draw a straight line from Budapest to Baghdad.

He has compared the Iraqi government’s pursuit of democracy to that of the patriots of 1956 and told Hungarians: “We’ve learned from your example, and we resolve that when people stand up for their freedom, America will stand with them.”

That has a ring to it and the stamp of post-cold-war, neoconservative certainty. But the Eisenhower administration had also vowed to roll back Communism from Eastern Europe. Nonetheless, when Hungary rose, it was left to a bleak fate beneath the Soviet yoke. Liberty was set aside in favor of circumventing World War III.

Worse, America misled the freedom fighters. Radio Free Europe, Washington’s mouthpiece, egged on the uprising, declaring on Nov. 4, 1956, that a “practical manifestation of Western sympathy is expected at any hour.” At the same time, it disparaged the revolution’s leader and martyr, Imre Nagy, as a compromised Communist.

A less felicitous mixture of misleading near-promises and maximal demands from an American knight-turned-bystander is hard to imagine. That rankles still, as all blots do on the idealism inextricable from the freedom-bearing narrative of American foreign policy.

"You can't incite people and then do nothing to help them," said Max Boot, a conservative commentator at the Council on Foreign Relations. "The closest parallel is what happened in 1991, when we told the Kurds and Shia of Iraq to rise up and abandoned them. That was really inexcusable, even more so than in 1956, when there were not really military options short of starting a world war."

Or were there? History happens, but only just. Few events are as tantalizing as the Hungarian uprising, whose initial few days saw Soviet hesitation and a growing belief that Nagy, the prime minister, could engineer some form of pluralist democracy — Titoism-plus — even within the Communist orbit. Might the exercise of militant American principle over pliancy have ushered Hungary toward the neutrality achieved by Austria in 1955?

The hypothetical has little value: what happened, happened. Thousands died; Hungary waited another 43 years to be free. But we now know from the Soviet archives that as late as Oct. 30, 1956, a week into the revolution, Nikita Khrushchev was still talking of "a military path," that of "occupation," or "a peaceful path" — "the withdrawal of troops, negotiation."

The die, it seems, was not altogether cast from the outset. Certainly that was the impression on the street, where Mr. Legendy, then a student at Budapest's technical university, recalled: "It seemed we could change the system. Russian troops were ordered to put down the uprising, but were inefficient, hesitant. We were almost sure America would intervene. After all, we were being attacked for being pro-American, and Radio Free Europe was encouraging us to end the regime."

But the United States was not ready to challenge the division of Europe between free and totalitarian spheres; and Britain and France were embroiled in the simultaneous Suez crisis, a Western attempt to reassert empire in the Middle East that proved less successful than Khrushchev's ultimate decision to impose Communist imperialism through force of arms.

No wonder Eisenhower expressed unease, in a discussion with his secretary of state, John Foster Dulles, at feelings that "we have excited Hungarians for all these years," and are "now turning our backs on them when they are in a jam." To which Dulles, according to a memorandum of the conversation on Nov. 9, 1956, responded that "we always have been against violent rebellion."

So goes history — and myriad human lives — floating on the whims and hesitations and little hypocrisies of the powerful. But Hungarian bloodshed and loss were not without catalytic effects.

The revolution jolted the West European left into the beginning of a rethinking of Communism, long an affair of the heart. "Hungary signaled to the West that it was not true that the masses supported Communism," Mr. Berman said.

It also carried Hungarians, on the wrong side of two world wars and Europe's division, to a rediscovered pride. Arthur Koestler is quoted in Kati Marton's "Great Escape," a new book on Budapest's loss of its Jewish intelligentsia, as saying that, "To be Hungarian is a collective neurosis." That state was eased by an uprising that became a collective point of reference in the nation's journey toward NATO and the European Union.

Finally, and perhaps most important, Hungary became an example for the Czechs, the Poles and others in the web of dissent and defiance that would lead to the fall of the Berlin Wall.

An optimist, and someone prepared to take the long view, might look to all these developments — a catalyzed region, a changed Western view of the acceptability of a totalitarian ideology, rediscovered national pride — and argue that the Iraqi invasion, for all its own terrible human cost, has also set in motion a cycle that will prove to be a liberating one.

Mr. Legendy, who fled Budapest in November 1956 and later studied at Princeton University, supports the invasion strongly, although he's a Democrat and believes grave mistakes have been made. "Because of my experience of Hungary, I feel very strongly about Iraq," he said. "The Baathists and the Communists are so close, first cousins. The cause of liberty is a great one."

His 23-year-old son, Gabriel, also a Princeton graduate and now a second lieutenant with the United States Army, is in Baghdad. Almost a month ago, on Sept. 11, Lt. Gabriel Legendy sent his parents a letter from Iraq saying he felt melancholy as he recalled the attack on America. "That day and my thoughts and feelings on it are such a benchmark in my life," he wrote. "Maybe this letter is my way of observing a moment of silence."

So a line of sorts does run from Budapest to Baghdad, from a Hungarian student in revolt against Communism a half-century ago to his son, a young American officer trying to fashion a free Iraq. But how best to craft liberty?

A realist might conclude from the events of 1956 and what followed, as well as from today's Iraqi mayhem, that totalitarianism must be tackled not by frontal assault, but by fostering resistance within — through a Polish pope, say, or the anti-Soviet, American-financed mujahedeen of Afghanistan of the 1980's.

Through subtlety, that is, and long-term probing, and knowledge and effective agents of influence — all apparently absent in the Iraq whose freedom the Bush administration likes to trumpet.

But perhaps there is a third view, and that is simply of history as tragedy, a process where sometimes no options, whether transformational or incremental, are good, and events may be as arbitrary as Mr. Legendy's extraordinary sighting of himself in Times Square.

The billboard was put up at a cost of $100,000 by the Hungarian Cultural Center, whose director, Laszlo Jakab Orsos, said: "What happened to Mr. Legendy illustrates the nature of history, which is no more than a chain of stories and lives, all interwoven, often in the most unexpected ways."

Latvia's Coalition Government Leads (AP)

By Gary Peach, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 8, 2006

The governing coalition in the former Soviet republic of Latvia was poised to retain power in Saturday's parliamentary election, nearly complete results showed.

With 89 percent of votes counted, Prime Minister Aigars Kalvitis' center-right coalition of three parties had 45 percent, the electoral commission said. The results give the coalition far more support in parliament than the main opposition New Era party which has no partners and cannot form a government.

If the results hold up, it would be the first time since Latvia regained independence in 1991 from the crumbling Soviet Union that a sitting government survived an election.

New Era and the People's Party are both right-wing parties but have historically been at odds, and earlier this year New Era dropped out of the coalition government. Both parties are pro-European Union and favor eventual adoption of the euro currency.

With few hot issues in the campaign, the main question was which of the similar right-wing parties would be given a mandate to lead the traditionally shaky coalition government. Latvia has had 12 governments in 15 years of independence.

Gaining admission to the EU and NATO were the dominant goals after winning independence. With that achieved, a sense of complacency set in, analysts said. Latvia will host a NATO summit next month, seen as a way to cement the country's place in the international arena.

"I voted for the People's Party because I like Kalvitis and the way he's brought stability to the government," said Aija, 56, who refused to give her last name.

The electoral commission said voter turnout was 62.3 percent, 10 percentage points lower than in the last election in 2002.

President Vaira Vike-Freiberga urged voters to go to the polls as she cast her ballot in the capital, Riga.

"If a citizen does not make his choice now, someone else will make the choice for him," she said, according to the Baltic News Service.

Although the Baltic country remains among the poorest in the European Union, its economy was the fastest-growing in the bloc in 2005 when gross domestic product soared 10.2 percent.

In all, 19 political parties, consisting of 1,024 candidates competed in the race to fill the 100-member Saeima, or parliament.

The Toughest Job On Earth (WP)

By Edward C. Luck

The Washington Post, October 8, 2006

It's not easy being the U.N. secretary general. The men who've held the post like to call it the most impossible job on Earth. Its duties are largely undefined, and the whole world claims the right to weigh in on how the job should be done. Some clamor for a crusading international leader, on the model of current Secretary Kofi Annan, others for a low-key administrator who'll stay out of the limelight and just make sure the organization runs smoothly.

So when the contest for the eighth secretary general opened earlier this year, it was widely expected to result in prolonged bickering. Some feared that the recent anti-American rants by Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad before the General Assembly would sour the Security Council's deliberations on the candidates. Meanwhile, editorialists the world over pleaded for the appointment of a political rock star -- an amalgam of Bill Clinton, Mother Teresa and Bono -- who could command headlines and rally supporters.

The Security Council had other ideas. Tomorrow, it is expected to nominate -- unanimously -- Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's minister of foreign affairs and trade. If tradition holds, the 192-member General Assembly will vote within a week or two, without debate or dissension, to complete the appointment (in an arcane rubber-stamping process -- see securitycouncilreport.org).

In selecting Ban, the council chose competence over charisma, performance over promise. Ban proved his diplomatic mettle in the on-and-off six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear ambitions (something he may now have to delegate to envoys from other parts of the world). His campaign received a decisive boost from the fact that three permanent Security Council members -- China, Russia and the United States -- plus the most influential non-permanent member, Japan, were his partners in those critical negotiations.

In 1945, the founders decreed that the council should nominate the secretary general to ensure that he (and someday she) has the confidence of the major powers, which is hard to earn and even harder to sustain. Whenever a secretary general has clashed openly with one of the great powers -- Trygve Lie and Dag Hammarskjold with Moscow in the 1950s and early '60s and Boutros Boutros-Ghali with Washington in the 1990s -- the organization and its efforts to build bridges between rivals have suffered. And as Annan's tenure has confirmed, the pressures to pose as a secular pope rallying the world against U.S. domination are incessant these days, particularly with a United-States-vs.-the-rest mentality already so prevalent at the United Nations.

The popular image of an outspoken world leader, morally and intellectually above the fray of crass and narrow interstate politics, doesn't reflect the gritty realities of the job. Secretaries general are most effective when they are quietly defusing regional crises and cajoling member states behind the scenes to modernize the United Nations' creaky and sometimes corrupt machinery. Unless Ban is considered an honest broker by all sides of the mistrustful, divided membership, he will have little chance of moving the stalled U.N. reform agenda forward. The less ego and identification with past political glories, the better. For a rookie secretary general, quiet modesty in public and candor in private have their virtues.

Truth be told, the council has never tapped an orator or media star to be secretary general. Hammarskjold and Annan grew into their public personalities while in office, and Ban could do the same. But Lie, U Thant, Kurt Waldheim, Javier PÃ©rez de CuÃellar and Boutros-Ghali never mastered that side of the job.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton called earlier this year for "a proletarian" secretary general, who would stick to improving internal management and be little more than the chief administrative officer mentioned in the U.N. Charter. But that is far too narrow a job description. Leading a diverse secretariat and dealing with a 192-member board of directors demands keen political instincts, as well as tough, fair and open management. Paul A. Volcker's Independent Inquiry Committee report on the oil-for-food scandal at www.iic-offp.org provides a chilling look at what can happen when no one is accountable at the top and member states and secretariat leaders prove equally adept at finger-pointing. But the committee also underlined that the secretary general serves as the United Nations' "chief political and diplomatic officer" and that "in unsettled times, those responsibilities tend to be all-consuming."

World-class proletarian diplomats, not to mention proletarian managers (an oxymoron if ever there was one), are in short supply.

No doubt, as former undersecretary general Brian Urquhart asserts in "The Next Secretary-General: How to Fill a Job With No Description," in the current issue of the journal Foreign Affairs, "history has shown that a great secretary-general not only is important for the U.N. but also is a priceless asset for the world at large." Having served every secretary general since 1946, he should know. His classic 1972 biography, "Hammarskjold," depicts the office's lows as well as its highs. There are times when the secretary general is called upon to scramble around the world, breathlessly trying to resolve brutal crises, as journalist William Shawcross described in his 2000 book, "Deliver Us from Evil: Peacekeepers, Warlords and a World of Endless Conflict." At other points, however, the mediating capacity of the office is underemployed by the powers of the day, leaving the secretary general to wait for some juicy assignment, a bit like the passive hero Chauncey Gardener in the movie "Being There."

Two memoirs by past holders of the office tell us more about their authors than intended. PÃ©rez de CuÃellar's 1997 "Pilgrimage for Peace: A Secretary-General's Memoir" is solid, dependable -- and dull. In contrast, Boutros-Ghali's "Unvanquished: A U.S.-U.N. Saga" from 1999 is as lively as it is tendentious and self-serving. Annan's roller-coaster ride as secretary general, which will end on Dec. 31, has spurred a record batch of biographies and commentaries. Two upcoming journalistic accounts look especially promising: James Traub's "The Best Intentions: Kofi Annan and the UN in the Era of American Power," out this month, and Stanley Meisler's "Kofi Annan: A Man of Peace in a World of War," to be released in December.

Those who want to dig deeper into the role will have to wait for Simon Chesterman's "Secretary or General?: The UN Secretary-General in World Politics," which will be published next spring.

After all that, if you still find the United Nations and its top post to be enigmas, you're on the right track.

Edward C. Luck is a professor at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs and the author, most recently, of "UN Security Council: Practice and Promise" (Routledge). He has consulted for several secretaries general.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Will Investigate Alleged Guantanamo Beatings. The AP (10/7, Watkins) reports, "The Pentagon said Friday that it will investigate a Marine's sworn statement that guards at Guantanamo Bay bragged about beating detainees and described it as a common practice." Several DOD officials are quoted promising a full investigation. The AP writes about the camp, "Human-rights groups have roundly criticized the Bush administration for detaining most without criminal charges, but U.S. officials have defended the detentions as necessary in the war on terrorism and say the detainees are treated humanely."

The New York Times (10/7, Cloud, 1.21M) also reports the unnamed Marine paralegal's claims "that guards at the United States military prison at Guantanámo Bay bragged about beating prisoners and denying them privileges to anger them."

Isolation Becomes Gitmo Norm. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Williams, 918K) reports, "A May riot in which dozens of detainees attacked U.S. soldiers, the suicide of three prisoners in June, and changes in the camp population -- including the arrival of 14 'high value detainees' -- have transformed Guantanamo into a largely maximum security facility." The Times adds, "The hardening of Guantanamo detention dispirits the detainees and their lawyers, who see it as part of U.S. political posturing in an election year. ... Rank-and-file guards express little concern or curiosity about the conditions of the prisoners' confinement, noting that they are just doing their duty."

Richard Epstein Argues For Habeas Corpus. In a commentary for he Wall Street Journal (10/7, A7, 2.03M), law professor Richard Epstein argues for retaining habeas corpus for Guantanamo detainees, "The law [MCA] allows the government to hold any prisoner -- even if he is not an unlawful enemy combatant -- in custody for the rest of his life, with no due process and no recourse to the courts. No one deserves that fate. Truth must count. Innocence must matter."

US Denies Wrongdoing In Idaho Computer Terrorism Suit. The AP (10/7, Boone) reports from Boise, ID, "The United States says it did nothing wrong when federal agents arrested and detained an American citizen as a material witness in a computer terrorism case. … The government's formal response to the lawsuit brought by Abdullah al-Kidd was filed in U.S. District Court on Friday." The AP continues, "In his lawsuit, al-Kidd contended that the federal government and several of its agents - including former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft and his successor, Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert Mueller, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and others - violated his civil rights by improperly using material witness laws. … The individuals named in the case have until Nov. 27 to respond; the United States' response deadline was Friday." The AP adds, "In its response, filed by Justice Department lawyer J. Marcus Meeks, the United States denied al-Kidd's allegations and said that al-Kidd was not entitled to any damages. … The lawsuit arose after al-Kidd - a former student at the University of Idaho who played football for the Vandals under the name Lavoni Kidd - was arrested in 2003 as a material witness in the government's case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen. Al-Kidd and Al-Hussayen both worked on behalf of the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators alleged funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States. .. .A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia."

Harper Raises Arar Rendition Case With Bush, Will Seek Investigation. AFP (10/7) reports Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper "has protested to" President Bush "about the deportation to Syria of a Canadian, who was tortured and held for a year. Harper spoke about Maher Arar, a Canadian of Syrian origin, in a 15-minute telephone call with Bush following a Canadian inquiry's report that cleared Arar of any terror links." He later told reporters that he "indicated to" Bush that Foreign Minister Peter MacKay "would be sending a letter today to" Secretary Rice "to launch a formal protest on the treatment of Maher Arar." Harper is further quoted saying Bush "said that he would look at the complaint seriously, and we are expecting a response, an official response, to our complaint as well as assurances that we will not be facing that kind of conduct on the part of US authorities in the future."

Detainees May Have Been Questioned In Germany Before Guantanamo. The Washington Post (10/7, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "The chief plotter of the Sept. 11 hijackings and another al-Qaeda leader who spent time in secret CIA prisons might have been interrogated in Germany before their transfer last month to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to lawyers for other terrorism suspects in U.S. custody." The statements "challenge repeated denials by the German government that it played any part in the U.S. government's secret network to detain and transport terrorism suspects after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. The statements also open the possibility that the CIA held prisoners on a U.S. military base in Germany without the knowledge of the host government in the early days after the attacks." The German and US governments respectively dismissed and denied the report.

Francis Fukuyama Sees Historical Pattern Of Excessive Secrecy. In the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M), scholar Francis Fukuyama reviews US government secrecy during the Cold War and argues, "Then, as now, there was a pronounced tendency to assume the worst, and for the government to claim enormous discretion in protecting the American public. The Bush administration has consistently argued that it needs to be protected from Congressional oversight and media scrutiny. ... But the American government does have a track record in dealing with similar problems in the past, one suggesting that all American institutions — Congress, the courts, the news media — need to do their jobs in scrutinizing official behavior, and not take the easy way out of deferring to the executive."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US And EU Agree To Deal On Airline Passenger Data. The Financial Times (10/7, Laitner) reports, "The FBI and other American anti-terror agencies will have easier access to sensitive personal information on passengers flying from the European Union to the US, under a deal agreed on Friday. Brussels and Washington struck the fresh concord after weeks of negotiations to replace a controversial pact from 2004 through which the US receives up to 34 pieces of data on air travellers. That deal was invalidated by the EU's highest court on a legal technicality and expired last Saturday, prompting fears of transatlantic travel chaos."

The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A3, Echikson, Jolis, 2.03M) reports, "Negotiations collapsed about a week ago when EU negotiators rejected Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's demand to lift restrictions on sharing the passenger data with other U.S. law-enforcement agencies. 'This is positive for the EU -- this will guarantee legal continuity on a very sensitive matter,' said EU Security Commissioner Franco Frattini. Mr. Frattini said Friday's new deal is applicable until the end of July 2007, by which time the two sides will 'agree on a more permanent arrangement.' Mr. Frattini said the EU agreed to allow Homeland Security to share the data with other U.S. agencies with a 'comparable standard of data protection.' This includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation and agencies within the Department of Justice. This will allow the U.S. to 'make full use of passenger data,' Mr. Chertoff said in a statement Friday."

The Washington Post (10/7, A12, Moore, Nakashima, 748K) reports, "Under the new system, 'if we have particular interest in a number of flights, or a specific destination, then we can therefore use that information and share it with other counterterrorism agencies,' said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, which includes the customs and border agency. The data request must have some 'specificity,' he said, such as the recent alleged plot to bomb airliners flying from London."

The Washington Times (10/7, Hudson, 88K) reports Graham Watson, leader of the Alliance of Liberals and Democrats in the European Parliament, "called the agreement the 'least-worst option' and said the Bush administration 'is determined to extract ever more personal data and share it with the wider intelligence community.'"

Watch List Is Rife With Errors. The New York Times/AP (10/7) reports, "Thousands of people have been mistakenly linked to names on terrorist watch lists when they crossed the border, boarded commercial airliners or were stopped for traffic violations, a government report said Friday. ... When '60 Minutes' spoke with 12 people named Robert Johnson, it reported, all said that they are detained almost every time they fly."

Anthrax Suspects Still Burdened Despite Being Cleared. The Washington Post (10/7, A3, Powell, 748K) reports, "On Nov. 15, 2001, Irshad and Masood Shaikh found themselves standing under the darkest cloud imaginable: The brothers had become suspects in the worst bioterrorism attack in American history. An FBI SWAT team battered down their front door, pointed semiautomatic rifles at Irshad's wife and carried out the first raid on a private home in the federal investigation of the anthrax attacks. … But the FBI had acted on a bad tip. By every account available, agents found no evidence implicating the brothers, who are widely respected public health experts. Since then, the Shaikhs have suffered consequences great and small. Irshad Shaikh, 44, who is Chester's health commissioner and has worked on humanitarian missions in Iraq and Afghanistan with U.S. officials, has been blocked by the FBI from obtaining a federal contract with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Immigration officials canceled his scheduled interview for U.S. citizenship. And whenever Irshad returns to the United States from abroad, federal agents escort him off the airplane and interrogate him for hours."

Security Barriers Removed From Manhattan Sites. The New York Times (10/7, Buckley, 1.21M) reports, "They started appearing on Manhattan streets immediately after September 11: concrete and metal barriers in front of skyscrapers, offices and museums. … But now, five years later, their numbers have begun to dwindle. After evaluations by the New York Police Department, the city's Department of Transportation has demanded that many of the planters and concrete traffic medians known as jersey barriers be taken away. So far, barriers have been removed at 30 buildings out of an estimated 50 to 70 in the city."

Bush Signing Statement Objects To FEMA Director Criteria. The Washington Post (10/7, A2, Hsu, 748K) reports President Bush "reserved the right to ignore key changes in Congress's overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency -- including a requirement to appoint someone with experience handling disasters as the agency's head -- in setting aside dozens of provisions contained in a major homeland security spending bill this week." According to the Post, "The standards for the FEMA director were inspired by criticism of former FEMA chief Michael D. Brown's performance after Hurricane Katrina last year. Brown, a lawyer and judge of Arabian horses, had no experience in disaster response before joining FEMA." White House spokesman Tony Fratto "said the actions, first reported by the Associated Press, upheld the president's right to choose his advisers and control executive branch activities." However, a spokesman for Rep. Tom Davis "said the White House is slighting Congress and ignoring the political toll of Brown's incompetence and ties to GOP cronies." Bush "also claimed the right to edit or withhold reports to Congress by a watchdog agency within the Department of Homeland Security that is responsible for protecting Americans' personal privacy."

New Orleans Experiences Extreme Population Decrease. The New York Times (10/7, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports that The City of New Orleans "population has dropped by nearly 60 percent since Hurricane Katrina, far more sharply than recent optimistic estimates had suggested, according to an authoritative post-storm survey released this week." According to the survey "The population of New Orleans is now only 187,525, well under half the pre-storm population of 454,863." In addition, "Mayor C. Ray Nagin has suggested that about half of New Orleans's former residents had returned, basing his projections partly on utility users. But the new numbers indicate that repopulation will take awhile to reach that level." However, "officials expect these population figures to go up, eventually. More than 11,000 people from New Orleans have applied for federal rebuilding aid through the state's Road Home program. Some 80,000 housing units were destroyed in Orleans Parish alone, and their reconstruction has hardly begun."

WAR NEWS:

Warner Warning On Iraq Seen As Signal US Considering Policy Shift. All three network news programs highlighted Sen. John Warner's warning that increased violence in Iraq may signal the need for a change in US policy. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 2, 3:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Nobody's calling it an exit strategy, but there's a growing consensus that US war plans in Iraq have got to change." After returning from Iraq Sen. John Warner "said the US is close to losing the battle in Baghdad." He "warned however, if the violence is not brought under control in the next 90 days, the US has to rethink its strategy." Sen. Warner: "I think it's a responsibility of our government internally to determine, is there a change of course that we should take and I wouldn't take off the table any option at this time." Miklaszewski: "Warner's statement came the same day Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in Baghdad, warning Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he must accelerate efforts to disarm militias and end the sectarian violence. Leading Democrats claim it's all part of a grand strategy by the Bush administration to begin to change the US course in Iraq. The administration has rejected calls for a timetable for withdrawal of American troops, but Democratic senator Carl Levin tells NBC news both President Bush and the U.S. Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told him lawmakers should publicly pressure the Iraqis, with the warning if they don't reduce the violence, the US would start pulling out its troops." Sen. Carl Levin: "It's not enough for them to hear it from me and hopefully Senator Warner. It's the administration that's got to deliver the message."

ABC World News (10/6, story 3, 2:25, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "It's not just Senator Warner. There are urgent discussions among prominent allies of the Bush administration, about the need to consider changing course in Iraq. One prominent Republican who advises the Pentagon told me today, 'if we don't make real significant changes, this will all collapse.' Among the options on the table -- a more aggressive approach, to defeat the insurgency and protect civilians, putting more American troops on the streets and more money into improving the quality of life in Iraq." Another option would be "a totally different approach -- phased withdrawal. The thinking, if US troops move out, the Iraqis will be forced to find their own solution to the ethnic hatred tearing their country apart. Don't look for the White House to embrace this option." President Bush: "We're not leaving, so long as I'm the President. That would be a huge mistake."

In a shorter story CBS Evening News (10/6, story 3, 1:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) quoted Sen. Warner saying, "It seems to me that the situation is simply drifting sidewise." Axelrod: "I ran the 'drifting sidewise' comment by a White House official and he says considering the way things are going lately, he hardly considers than to be deep criticism."

The New York Times (10/7, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports, "The White House, caught off guard by a leading Republican senator who said the situation in Iraq was 'drifting sideways,' responded cautiously on Friday, with a spokeswoman for President Bush stopping short of saying outright that Mr. Bush disagreed with the assessment. ... Ms. Perino's carefully worded response underscores the delicate situation that Mr. Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has created for the White House just one month before an election." The senator's "comments are...forcing Republicans to confront the issue before some are ready." GOP Senator Susan Collins "said the current approach, which she attributed to Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, had not led to an overall reduction in violence or any prospect that American troop levels would come down soon." The Washington Times/UPI (10/6) reports Warner's "grim outlook" in a 4-sentence article.

In Arbil, Rice Sought To Solidify Kurdish Ties To Baghdad. In continuing reporting of Secretary Rice's visit to Iraq, AFP (10/7, Lanteaume) notes Rice "met the leaders of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, urging them to cooperate with Iraqi Arabs in building a peaceful and unified country." She "dropped in on Kurdish regional president Massud Barzani in Arbil, his northern capital, after an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital Baghdad, which is in the grip of a brutal sectarian conflict." AFP says Kurds remain "grateful for US support in throwing off the yoke of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein," and have therefore "put their long-cherished dreams of independence on hold while the Baghdad government struggles to rebuild the war torn country." Rice "tried to calm the oil row during her visit" by asking for renewed cooperation and sharing of oil profits.

The AP (10/7, Gearan) says Rice is "convinced oil revenue is the long-term key to economic independence for a unified Iraq," and notes she "appealed Friday for cooperation from the autonomous and oil rich Kurdish north." Appearing before US and Kurdish flags, Rice "thanked Barzani for the Kurds' long cooperation with the United States, adding, 'and I appreciate also your important participation in the process of national reconciliation. Thank you.'"

Separate AP (10/7, Barzanji) reporting focuses directly on Kurdish separatist politics. "With violence bloodying Iraq, Kurds in the peaceful north have been showing signs of going their own way, raising their own flag and even hinting they could secede in a dispute over oil wealth -- moves that have alarmed Shiites and Sunnis." Secretary Rice's "visit to Kurdistan on Friday underlined American worries that Kurds may be pushing too hard too soon for autonomy powers at a time of increasing sectarian tensions." The AP says, in all regions of Iraq, "even mere talk of federalism -- amid a wave of Shiite-Sunni violence that has killed thousands this year -- has raised fears of the country falling apart."

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Richter, Daragahi, 918K) adds Rice "urged restless Iraqi Kurds to seek their future in a closer alliance with other Iraqis, as she visited the country's relatively peaceful Kurdistan region Friday for talks with" Barzani. She "declared that Iraq's minority Kurds, who suffered greatly under the rule of Saddam Hussein, can find their best security guarantee not from their powerful ally, the Americans, but from the Iraqi Constitution." Barzani "spoke publicly in terms likely to please Rice, saying Kurds are committed to working within the federal system and will share oil revenue from wells discovered in their region." The Times notes, "Despite the apparent harmony, U.S. officials are concerned by issues now swirling in Kurdistan, the least violent and most pro-American part of Iraq."

Rumsfeld Sees Progress In Afghanistan. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/7, A23, 748K), Defense Secretary Rumsfeld acknowledges, "There is, for example, the legitimate worry that increased poppy production could be a destabilizing factor. And rising violence in southern Afghanistan is real." However, he points to progress in security, the economy, education, health care, and infrastructure. He concludes, "In Afghanistan, the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one."

The AP (10/7) summarizes the commentary, observing critically, "Rumsfeld touched on only a few of the setbacks, including a surge in the drug production that the Taliban had almost wiped out five years earlier. But the defense secretary glossed over other dangers: The Taliban has taken control large parts of the countryside, more than 3,000 people have been killed in rising violence this year ..."

Taliban Is Resurgent In Southern Afghanistan. The Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (10/7, Krane) reports, "The kind of anonymous insurgent violence that is convulsing Iraq has migrated 1,500 miles east to plague Afghanistan five years after the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban regime.

The prospect of a second downward spiral -- though so far Afghanistan isn't nearly as violent as Iraq -- has experts worried that Western militaries don't have an effective strategy for these irregular wars." The AP quotes concerned soldiers, Bruce Hoffman of Georgetown University, and alleged Taliban spokesman Qari Mohammed Yusuf Ahmadi.

Iraqi Police Have Lost 4,000 Men In Two Years. The New York Times (10/7, O'Neil, 1.21M) reports, "About 4,000 Iraqi policemen have been killed and more than 8,000 have been wounded in the last two years, the American general in charge of training the country's police forces said yesterday." Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson "said the figures covered casualties from September 2004 to the present." The numbers "appear to show a rising casualty rate among the Iraqi police, who have replaced American troops as the prime focus of insurgent attacks for much of this year." Peterson "emphasized the 'tremendous progress' made since American forces designated 2006 as the 'year of the police.' He cited Anbar Province, the restive western region long dominated by Sunni insurgents, as one example. 'We've cleared out the Euphrates River valley and are starting to see police forces grow and take hold and perform their responsibilities admirably,' he said."

The AP (10/7, Keath) reports that Peterson "said the force's performance was improving and officials are working to weed out militiamen." The AP adds, "Beefing up Iraq's security forces is a cornerstone of efforts to stop the violence that has torn the country since the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003. Police have been a prime target for attacks by Sunni insurgents. Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led police of helping fuel sectarian violence that has killed thousands this year."

The Washington Post (10/7, Tyson, 748K) reports that Peterson "said continued efforts will be needed in 2007 to improve the quality of the force, provide training in leadership and basic policing skills, and weed out militia members -- some of whom are known to have carried out sectarian executions." The Post adds, "This week, Iraq's Interior Ministry had to remove a brigade of hundreds of Iraqi police from duty in Baghdad after it participated in sectarian violence, including one battalion that raided a meat-processing factory and kidnapped more than 20 Sunni workers, seven of whom were later found executed. That brigade, as well as other Iraqi police units now being inspected, will undergo three weeks of 'police transformational training' to improve policing skills."

NBC Nightly News reported on the suspicion of militia infiltration of police. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 3, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There have been these suspicions that Shi'ite death squads and at least some of the Iraqi police force may be one and the same. Today Richard Engel went out on a patrol with the top flight US Army Stryker Brigade in Baghdad and found that many of those Americans putting their lives on the line there each day often don't know who to trust or even why they are still there." NBC (Engel) added, "The US Calvary's Crazy Horse, 3rd platoon, ventures out into southern Baghdad, where the enemy is invisible, Iraqi allies untrustworthy and where American troops increasingly ask themselves -- is this their fight anymore? And who is the enemy?" Sergeant Mike Schmieder: "It's not clear now who we're always fighting. If they're terrorists, if they're criminals or they're religious radicals." Engel: "After the mission, the soldiers tell us their morale remains high, but insist Iraqis need to do more." Unidentified male soldier: "It's time for them to take the reins and take responsibility for their country." Engel: "Until then, it's US troops in the middle of the war, mediating, fighting and dying."

US Troops Are Caught "In the Middle" Of Many Small Iraqi Wars. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Moore, Roug, 918K) reports in a pessimistic front page article, "In all, at least 57 people died and 17 were injured in the violence that day, Sept. 18. They were all killed in the same country, but not in the same war. The fighting in Iraq is not a single conflict, but an overlapping set of conflicts, fought on multiple battlegrounds, with different combatants. Increasingly, American troops are caught between the competing forces." Many American officials fear "the original U.S. counterinsurgency mission has become something else -- an operation aimed at quelling civil war, which is a much more ambiguous and politically fraught objective. American troops find themselves in the crossfire, caught among foreign militants, Sunni Muslim nationalist rebels, Shiite Muslim militiamen and other armed groups -- all fighting each other."

Multiple Deployments Seen As Stretching Resources. The Atlanta Journal Constitution (10/7, Martz) reports on the 3rd ID's 1st Brigade Combat Team, which is "preparing for a third tour in Iraq, this time facing nearly out-of-control sectarian violence." The Journal Constitution adds, "Dozens of soldiers in the brigade -- unit officials say they don't have an official count…will be making their third combat tour in Iraq in less than four years. The multiple deployments and rapid turnaround are evidence that the service is stretched so thin it may have to request broader access to National Guard units to meet demands being made on it ... The short turnaround time for the brigade has resulted in a training pace so accelerated that the two weeks it would have normally spent at one of the Army's major training facilities at Fort Irwin, Calif., or Fort Polk, La., before going to Iraq were instead spent here."

Medic Testifies That Marines Shot Iraqi Civilian. ABC and CBS covered the trial of corpsman Melson J. Bacos in brief stories. ABC World News (10/6, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, " Seven Marines charged with kidnapping and murdering an innocent Iraqi civilian. In California, a Navy medic by the name of Melson Bacos told a military judge that the Marines he was on Patrol with, dragged the man from his home and shoot him ten times in the chest and head. He testified on a guilty plea agreement."

CBS Evening News (10/6, story 6, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A court-martial at Camp Pendleton, California, a Navy medic admits he had a role in the kidnap and murder of an Iraqi civilian. He avoided murder charges by testifying he saw two Marines carry out the execution-style killing last April in Hamdania. A total of seven Marines still face charges in the case."

The major dailies and wire services also reported the trial. MSNBC (10/6) reports, "A Navy corpsman was sentenced Friday after testifying that Marines in his patrol seized an Iraqi civilian from his home, threw him into a hole and put at least 10 bullets in his head and chest after growing frustrated in their search for an insurgent. Petty Officer Melson Bacos, 21, was sentenced to 10 years in prison, but he will end up serving only a year under a plea deal. Bacos was also dishonorably discharged." The killing "was one in a series in which the conduct of American troops in Iraq have damaged America's image worldwide."

The Washington Post (10/7, Geis, 748K) reports, "Eight members of a Marine squad planned to kill a suspected Iraqi insurgent and developed a cover story before their April raid, but when they could not find their target, they pulled a neighbor from his bed and shot him to death instead, a Navy medic who was part of the group testified Friday."

The New York Times (10/7, Marshall, 1.21M), the AP (10/7, Deutsch), the Washington Times/UPI (10/7), and the Los Angeles Times (10/7, Perry, 918K) also report the story. The Los Angeles Times observes that the Hamdaniya incident "is the first of two high-profile cases of alleged brutality against Iraqis by Marines from Camp Pendleton to come to court-martial. Two dozen Marines are being investigated in a November incident in which 24 Iraqis, including women and children, were killed in the town of Haditha."

Army National Guard Recruiter Has Hard Task. The New York Times (10/7, Elliott, 1.21M) reports on Sgt. Cameron Murad, who works in California and "must persuade native Arabic speakers to enlist and serve with front-line troops." The Times describes the insults he experienced as a soldier and his difficulties in recruiting linguists: "Before his first week was up, he felt like an outcast. Stacks of fliers and business cards that he had left in grocery stores had vanished. Cashiers who welcomed him on his first visits were suddenly too busy to talk. ... From late 2002 to May 2006, 172 civilian contract linguists were killed in Afghanistan and Iraq, representing 2.6 percent of the roughly 6,500 linguists who worked for United States coalition forces, a Department of Defense official said. None of the 152 interpreters who have served in Iraq for the 09-Lima program have been killed. But that fact carries little weight in El Cajon, where memories of violence linger."

Nicholson Touts Polytrauma Centers, Says Funding Is Sufficient. In an interview VA Secretary James Nicholson said on FNC's Dayside (10/6, 1:06 p.m.) that "600,000 veterans now have returned from the combat zone and I write a letter to each one of them, telling them what they are entitled to for veterans benefits and health care and how to access it." He added, "We have set up 21, we call polytrauma centers distributed around the United States. We aggregated medical disciplines there so they do not have long distances to travel. These are the number one priority of the VA at this time. I just had a meeting yesterday in the Oval Office with the President and commander of the American Legion, talking about how well we are taking care of these people that are now coming home."

When asked about the VA's budget, the Secretary replied, "We are generously funded. In fact, we discussed this yesterday with the President. Spending under President Bush for the VA has gone up 70% since he has become president. We have the resources because it is a priority. There was an incident in '05 that related to the fiscal '05 budget that was drawn based on the '02 real data, before the war started. There was a gap there, but as soon as we went to the Congress and the president, they took care of us. This president is extremely supportive of these troops. It is a number one thing on his mind, and the Congress is supportive as well."

Bikers Honor Fallen Troops. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 9, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Please remember more than 2,700 American soldiers have now died in the war in Iraq but some have only had a handful of people come to say their final farewells. A group of very patriotic Americans who happen to be motorcyclists think that is wrong. They're doing their part now to make sure every fallen soldier gets a proper goodbye." NBC (Taibbi) added, "The funeral of Marine Nick Whyte of Brooklyn -- his family in agony. More than 40 other mourners shared the family's grief. And provided a motorcycle escort for the funeral process. Mourners like veteran Bill Connelly who didn't know Nick Whyte in life, but who, with the family's permission, asked to be here." Bill Connely: "I didn't know the soldier but I'm a Marine and it's my brother who died there today." Taibbi adds, "They are the Patriot Guard Riders, perhaps 40,000 nationwide organized originally to shield grieving families from a fringe church group that was picketing soldiers' funerals to promote the group's extremist views."

Depot Returns Dead Troops' Belongings. In an emotional 1,269-word front page article, the Washington Post (10/7, White, 748K) reports on the Joint Personal Effects Depot in Aberdeen, which processes the belongings of troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan: "Within days of troops' deaths in action, their clothes, pictures and books and everything else that defined their lives on the battlefield wind up here. It is then the job of 138 people to inventory, photograph, clean and pack all of the items so they can be sent home to grieving families, the last remnants of the ones they loved. There are ghosts here, whispers of these people who sacrificed their lives to serve their country." Several workers are quoted describing the emotional impact of the work.

DOJ:

Potter Sworn In As New Northern WV US Attorney. The Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer (10/7) reports, "Sharon Potter was sworn in Friday as the new U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia, but a formal ceremony will be held at a later date, according to information provided by Potter's office." The Intelligencer continues, "Potter succeeds Thomas Johnston, who was sworn in as U.S. District Judge for the Southern District of West Virginia in April." The Intelligencer adds, "Potter was sworn in by U.S District Judge Irene M. Keeley in Clarksburg. … Potter has served as assistant U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia since September 1992, according to information provided by Potter's office. … Assigned to the U.S. Attorney's office in Wheeling, Potter has handled a variety of criminal prosecutions ranging from fraud and tax evasion to drug trafficking and computer-related crime. … Potter has also been involved in criminal and civil property forfeiture cases, generating resources for state and local law enforcement agencies. She has also obtained funds for victims of fraud through restitution in a variety of cases."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Farmer Mac Attempts To Restate Company Results Form Past Three Years. The Washington Post/Bloom (10/7, D1) reports that "Farmer Mac, the government-chartered buyer of US farm loans, said it would restate its financial results for 2003, 2004 and 2005 to correct how it accounted for some derivatives transactions." The Washington Post reports that the changes will not change the profits of the company significantly. Farmer Mac "reported combined profit of $87.3 million for 2003, 2004 and 2005."

Judge Dismisses Suit Over MySpace Sale. Bloomberg (10/7) reports, "News Corp., Rupert Murdoch's media company, said a judge dismissed a lawsuit challenging its purchase of MySpace.com, rejecting claims by Brad Greenspan, former chief executive officer of the Web site's parent, that the deal cheated shareholders." Bloomberg continues, "Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Carolyn Kuhl ruled Friday that the acquisition of Intermix Media Inc., MySpace's parent company, last year was lawful and shareholders were fully informed when they voted on the transaction, New York-based News Corp. said Monday. … The decision lifts a cloud over the popular networking site, which Greenspan says he started in August 2003." Bloomberg adds, "He sued MySpace in February, saying the $580 million paid by News Corp.'s Fox unit didn't reflect the growth prospects. … Thursday, he demanded a federal investigation into the sale, claiming the deal defrauded shareholders of more than $20 billion. … News Corp. and Fox Interactive 'feel vindicated' by the ruling, Mike Angus, general counsel of News Corp.'s Fox Interactive Media, said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ralston Resigns Over Disclosure Of Abramoff Gifts. The Washington Post (10/7, A1, Baker, Grimaldi, 748K), in a front-page story titled, "Rove Aide Linked To Abramoff Resigns: Scandal Claims Its First West Wing Job," reports Susan Ralston, a "top aide to White House strategist Karl Rove resigned yesterday after disclosures that she accepted gifts from and passed information to now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, becoming the first official in the West Wing to lose a job in the influence-peddling scandal." The Post notes, "A congressional report showed last week that Ralston accepted sometimes-pricey tickets to nine sports and entertainment events from Abramoff while she provided him with inside White House information. The bipartisan report said there is no evidence that Rove knew of or approved of Ralston's actions, and sources said yesterday that the White House was surprised by the report's revelations. The White House counsel's office conducted a review of the report, but with Ralston's departure it closed its inquiry yesterday." The Post quotes a "senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity" who said "the counsel's office reached no conclusion about whether Ralston violated gift limits because her resignation made the point moot. But the official said there were 'mitigating circumstances' in her case because she had a preexisting relationship with Abramoff." The Post goes on to report, "As right hand to the president's most important adviser, Ralston was closer to the center of the Bush operation. She was a key organizer of presidential events, coordinating with White House political, scheduling, advance and public liaison offices."

The New York Times (10/7, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Administration officials "acknowledged…that she quit as a result of" the Congressional report. White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino is quoted as saying, "A protracted discussion of the report was not in anyone's best interest, and when she chose to step down, we supported her decision." The Times adds that, "For more than a year, Ms. Ralston was entangled in two Washington scandals at once. A nexus between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Rove, she was also pivotal in the C.I.A. leak case." Bloomberg (10/7) reports that in her resignation letter, Ralston said "the time has come for me to pursue other opportunities."

Waxman Claims Ralston Is Being Used As "Scapegoat." The AP (10/7, Reichmann) reports Rep. Henry Waxman, the senior Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, "said he suspects the White House is trying to make Ralston a scapegoat. 'There is a lot that we don't yet know about the assistance that Ms. Ralston provided Mr. Abramoff from inside the White House, but there are also many unanswered questions about the assistance that higher-ranking White House officials appeared to provide Mr. Abramoff,' Waxman said. 'The vast majority of lobbying contacts and meals with White House officials documented in the report were with White House officials other than Ms. Ralston,' Waxman said."

Waxman Notes Mehlman's Contacts With Abramoff. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Wallsten, 918K) reports Waxman said "the actions of senior aides such as former political director Ken Mehlman deserved more scrutiny. Last week's report included e-mails suggesting that Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, was offered tickets to a rock concert and helped an Indian tribe represented by Abramoff secure $16 million for a jail despite resistance from Justice Department officials. … In an interview Friday, Mehlman said he did not recall any specifics from his dealings with the Abramoff team. 'I can tell you that as political director I was always very careful to make sure everything I did was above board and consistent with the rules,' he said."

Libby Hopes To Avoid Trial By Introducing Classified Information. The Washington Post/AP (10/7, A8) reports Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, "intends to load up his criminal trial with information about nine national security matters, the names of foreign leaders and details about various terrorist groups, according to court filings in the Valerie Plame leak case. The papers filed this week hint at what has been taking place behind closed doors as Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald tries to limit the amount of classified data that…Libby is permitted to use at his trial, scheduled for January." U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton "is asking whether classified evidence would overlap with what Libby is likely to say in his testimony. … In court documents, prosecutors argued that it would be 'unnecessarily wasteful of time' to allow Libby to present 'names of foreign leaders or government officials of other countries, or the names and histories of various terrorist groups.' The danger for prosecutors is that the sheer volume and sensitivity of the classified information Libby wants to introduce could scuttle the trial."

Harman Angered Over Pace Of Cunningham Investigation. According to the New York Times (10/7, Johnston, 1.21M) a report on former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham "has remained under wraps for nearly four months, largely because of a battle between the committee's leaders over issuing a subpoena in the matter, members of Congress say." The Intelligence Committee's ranking Democrat Rep. Jane Harman "complained about the delay in a letter sent Thursday to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra. … Harman protested what she said had been Mr. Hoekstra's refusal to subpoena" Cunningham. The committee "hired an outside counsel, Michael Stern, to carry out the Cunningham inquiry. Mr. Stern's specific findings are not known, although some Congressional officials have suggested that his report, which was completed in June, is critical of Mr. Cunningham for using the committee's secrecy to conceal his efforts on behalf of friends to insert spending items into classified bills." Harman "said Mr. Hoekstra wrote her last month saying that he had been in direct contact with Mr. Cunningham — apparently to seek informally his appearance before the committee. 'I am deeply disappointed that you contacted him unilaterally without notifying me,' Ms. Harman wrote.'"

Cunningham's Wife Agrees To Pay Back Taxes. The Washington Post/AP (10/7, A6) reports Cunningham's wife "will pay $1.6 million in back taxes and penalties for her role in the bribery scandal that landed him in prison, according to a settlement filed Friday." The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "In exchange for her acceptance of responsibility in the case and continuing cooperation with an ongoing federal investigation, authorities say they have not filed criminal charges against Nancy Cunningham."

Former Shelby Aide Used Tech Firm To Garner Government Contracts. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A1, Mullins, 2.03M) profiles lobbyist Stewart Hall, who previously worked for Sen. Richard Shelby, "a fellow Alabaman. … After working for nearly five years on Capitol Hill, he left government and became a lobbyist. Then, a few years ago, Mr. Hall went one better than the other former aides who prowl the halls of Congress on behalf of government-contracting clients. Mr. Hall, 40 years old, set out to become the client himself. All he needed was a company." Hall "decided to create a government contractor nearly from scratch. He assembled a group of investors, many of them fellow lobbyists. Together they bought a 25% stake in Huntsville, Ala.-based Digital Fusion Inc., a small technology-consulting company on the verge of bankruptcy. It did little business with the government, so Mr. Hall set out to beef up its defense-contracting business. Today, it mainly helps government agencies use computer technology for tasks ranging from budget analysis to missile engineering." Digital Fusion "became the No. 2 financial supporter of the political action committee of Sen. Shelby."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Cites New Jersey Park For ADA Violations. The Asbury Park (NJ) Press (10/7, Cullinane) reports, "By locking the front door of the Visitor Center in Thompson Park on weekends but leaving the back door open for restroom access, the Monmouth County Park System is likely violating federal law, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said Tuesday. … That's because the back door of the Middletown park building is at the top of an eight-step stairway, making the restrooms inaccessible to some people with disabilities, especially those in wheelchairs." The Press continues, "The park system cannot open the facility on weekends — the busiest visiting days in summer — 'yet close the only accessible entrance to it' without violating standards of the federal Americans with Disabilities Act, said Eric Holland of the U.S. Department of Justice. His is the agency that enforces the regulations of the disability act. … Holland said that in order to comply with the law, the Park System must provide an entrance accessible to all visitors if it opens the building at all." The Press adds, "Laura Kirkpatrick, the parks' public information officer, said there are no plans to open the front entrance on weekends. … 'There are restroom facilities at the Craft Center (in the park) that are handicapped-accessible,' Kirkpatrick said of another park building at the park's western end. … However, there is no sign at the Visitor Center advising people about the other location. And there are no paved public roads connecting the two buildings. Visitors would need to drive outside the park and re-enter at a different entrance on Newman Springs Road."

DOJ Eyes Bias Probe Of Florida Sheriff's Office. The Daytona Beach (FL) News-Journal (10/7, Woodard) reports, "The Flagler County (FL) Sheriff's Office could face an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice after a federal commission found 'reasonable cause to believe' the office discriminated against an employee who was fired in May." The News-Journal continues, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said it found "reasonable cause to believe" the Sheriff's Office discriminated against former victim's advocate Vicky Peppin because of her Cuban background, according to a letter dated Aug. 31 from Federico Costales, director of the commission's Miami District. … In addition, the commission determined 'that there was reasonable cause to believe' the Sheriff's Office retaliated against Peppin after she filed her complaint with the EEOC in November 2005, Costales said in a separate letter dated Aug. 31. … In a telephone interview Wednesday, Peppin said she felt compelled to file the complaint to fend off allegations of a poor work performance and to combat the harassment and discrimination she faced." The News-Journal notes, "The EEOC's ruling is the latest controversy involving the Sheriff's Office. The agency is still under a shroud of scandal following the May indictments of six deputies and the former jail director following investigations of inmate abuse. One of those investigations involved State Attorney John Tanner's daughter Lisa being strapped into a restraint chair at the jail. Two deputies were charged with abuse in that incident."

DOJ Clears St Landry Parish Elections. The Baton Rouge Advocate (10/7, Burgess) reports, "Federal observers found no irregularities in recent elections in St. Landry Parish, federal and state officials said Friday. … But a losing candidate in the town of Washington's mayoral race said he plans to file a legal challenge alleging widespread voter registration fraud." The Advocate continues, "A team of observers with the U.S. Department of Justice kept watch on last Saturday's elections in St. Landry Parish after complaints of possible racial intimidation of voters, particularly in the sheriff's race. … 'They gave us a clean bill of health,' said St. Landry Parish Clerk of Court Charles Jagneaux." The Advocate adds, "Justice Department observers are expected to return to the parish for the Nov. 7 election, which includes a runoff in the sheriff's race between Laura Balthazar and Bobby Guidroz and the general election for U.S. Representative in the 7th Congressional District. … U.S. Atorney Donald Washington said the concern over voter intimidation arose during a routine pre-election meeting between state election officials and Justice Department. … Though federal observers noted no complaints on election day, Washington mayoral candidate Anthony James Soileau said he plans to file a lawsuit Monday to challenge the qualifications of at least 40 voters."

Brownback Puts Hold On Federal Judge Nomination Over Same Sex Ceremony. The AP (10/7, Hananel, Thomas) reports that "a judge's elevation to the federal bench could be derailed because she helped preside over a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple four years ago." Sen. Sam Brownback "has placed a hold on the nomination of Michigan Court of Appeals Judge Janet T. Neff, saying her presence at the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony raises questions about her judicial philosophy." According to Senator Borwnback, "It seems to speak about her view of judicial activism."

ANTITRUST:

Wall Street Likes AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/7, Leith) reports, "Federal regulators are still weighing their approval of AT&T's deal to acquire BellSouth. But the buyout, as it draws close, has earned the blessing of Wall Street." The AJC continues, "Slowly but surely, shares of AT&T and BellSouth have climbed since the companies announced their deal March 5. As a result, the value of the transaction has spiked by about $10 billion, to a total of about $99 billion at the moment. AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is easily the most expensive acquisition involving a Georgia company — ever." The AJC adds, "The jump is particularly noteworthy in Georgia, home to a high concentration of BellSouth shareholders — about 50,000 of them. After the deal closes, those shareholders will get AT&T stock, which has traded upward in tandem with BellSouth. … The spike in share prices means the value of the deal has jumped, given that AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is an all-stock transaction. At current prices, the deal is valued at about $77 billion in stock and $22 billion in BellSouth debt." The AJC notes, "Before the deal can close, AT&T needs approval from the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission. … The DOJ could announce a decision at any time; the FCC is scheduled to vote on the issue Thursday, although meeting times have been known to change."

DOJ_NMG_0078355

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Administrator Criticized For Failing To Tighten Soot Regulation. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Wilson, 918K) reports, "As many as 24,000 lives — a large number of them Californians' — could have been saved each year if the head of the Environmental Protection Agency had tightened soot standards by one microgram per cubic meter annually, according to an analysis released Friday. The cost-benefit analysis also shows that although the tab for power plants, refineries, auto manufacturers and other industry for such a change would be about $1.9 billion a year — or about $15 per household — the savings in healthcare costs, work and school attendance and other benefits would be between $4.3 billion and $51 billion." EPA administrator Stephen Johnson "has been harshly criticized by medical groups, environmentalists and his own science advisors for his Sept. 21 decision to retain a standard allowing annual exposure of 15 micrograms per cubic meter, rather than tightening it to 14 micrograms or fewer." An analysis "released Friday shows that every member of a 12-member panel of scientists convened at the request of the White House Office of Management and Budget and National Academy of Sciences found that thousands of additional lives could be saved if the tougher annual standard were adopted."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

56 Indicted For Drug, Money-Laundering Charges. The Washington Times (10/7, Seper, 88K) reports that "Federal authorities yesterday announced the indictment of 56 persons on drug-smuggling and money-laundering charges, 27 of whom were arrested for their purported links to international drug cartels." According to ICE spokesman Dean Boyd "simultaneous arrests took place in several countries. Numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts were seized, along with $3.1 million cash, about 4,000 pounds of cocaine and six boats." He also said "Federal agents were able to infiltrate money-laundering and drug-trafficking organizations, identifying the source of the drugs, the foreign and domestic drug transporters, a distributor and money launderers. As a result of the simultaneous arrests, he said, federal agents dismantled several drug-trafficking and money-laundering organizations."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass Guest Worker Program. The AP (10/7, Riechmann) reports President Bush "shoehorned a plug for his guest worker program between making a joke about an award winner and listening to love songs Friday at a White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month. Bush said that as lawmakers debate immigration policy, they need to remember that while enforcing U.S. borders is important, it is only one step in the struggle to stop illegal immigration. He pressed Congress to pass his guest worker program to legally bring in new foreign workers and give some of the country's illegal immigrants a shot at U.S. citizenship. 'We must understand that you can't kick 12 million people out of your country — that we must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship,' Bush said.

Bush's Use Of "Earn Citizenship" Phrasing Noted. The Washington Times (10/7, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "said immigration reform requires granting citizenship to current illegal aliens." Bush "praised U.S. troops who are Hispanic, noting that more than 200,000 are in uniform now. He also urged that the immigration debate not turn nasty. 'We are a land of immigrants, and as we debate immigration policy, we must always keep that important fact in mind,' Mr. Bush said." The Times notes that yesterday was "the first time the president has used the phrase 'earn citizenship,' a description popular among groups that lobby for granting rights to illegal aliens. But many critics, including Republican leaders, equate that concept with amnesty."

Hunter Says Border Fence Must Be Built. The Washington Times (10/7, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "will soon sign a bill authorizing 700 miles of fence to be built along the U.S.-Mexico border. … The fence is already stirring the political pot, even before construction begins. Mexican officials sent a diplomatic protest to the Bush administration this week and have said they doubt the fence will ever be built. A report in The Washington Post yesterday seemed to concur, stating that the wording of the fence and spending measures gives the Bush administration so much leeway that it is unlikely the 700 miles will be completed. But Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, who wrote the fence provisions that passed last year as part of the House's enforcement-only bill, said yesterday that building the fence is not optional. He held a press conference yesterday on the U.S.-Mexico border to address the report and said the language in the bill means the administration 'shall' build it."

Columbia Students Disrupt Appearance By Minuteman Official. The New York Times (10/7, Arenson, Cave, 1.21M) reports that "protesters stormed a Columbia University stage on Wednesday evening, shutting down a speech by the head of a fiercely anti-immigration group," the Minuteman Project's Jim Gilchrist. The Times notes, "Yesterday Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg chastised Columbia for the disruption."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tax Revenues Fuel Drop In Budget Deficit To $250 Billion. The AP (10/7, Taylor) reports, "The federal budget deficit estimate for the fiscal year just completed has dropped to $250 billion…as the economy continued to fuel impressive tax revenues." The CBO's "latest estimate is $10 billion below CBO predictions issued in August and well below a July White House prediction of $296 billion." It would be the lowest deficit "since the $158 billion figure in 2002" and "when measured against the size of the economy, which is the comparison economists think is most important, the deficit picture looks even better." The AP notes, "At 1.9 percent of gross domestic product, the 2006 deficit registers far below those seen in the 1980s and early 1990s. The modern record of 6 percent of GDP came in 1983 and deficits greater than 4 percent in 1991 and 1992 drove Congress to embark on a 1993 deficit-cutting drive." Yet, "the long-term deficit picture remains bleak due to the looming retirement of the Baby Boom generation, which threatens to swamp Social Security and the Medicare health care program for the elderly."

The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A2, Wessel, 2.03M) in an article titled "Budget Deficit Progress Will Be Tough To Sustain" reports the decreasing deficit "will allow President Bush to boast that he has met his goal of halving the deficit, measured as a share of the gross domestic product, ahead of schedule. 'The president's goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009, which drew the scoffs of many, is now likely to be reached before that date,' Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, told the Senate Budget Committee the other day, a preview of what's to come next week. There's even talk that the president will set a new headline-grabbing goal: balancing the federal budget by the end of the decade." But "the smart money says the deficit is very likely to get deeper from here."

FDA Reportedly Hampered By Budget Concerns. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Alonso-Zaldivar, 918K) reported, "When scientific advisors urged" the FDA "to put a strong warning about suspected cardiovascular risks on attention-deficit drugs…agency officials said more clinical evidence was needed. Now, the FDA-funded study meant to authoritatively answer questions about the drugs…may be halted in midstream. The reason: The agency doesn't have the money to finish it. … It is one symptom of a federal agency increasingly constrained by a budget that has failed to keep up with costs. This crunch is even more dire in the food division, which tries to keep tainted foodstuffs from supermarket shelves." The Times notes, "Recently, three former secretaries of Health and Human Services sounded a public alarm about what they saw as a dangerous squeeze on the overall FDA budget." Tommy G. Thompson, Donna Shalala and Louis W. Sullivan "joined consumer and industry groups in calling on the administration to substantially boost — perhaps double — the agency's $1.5-billion annual budget, which has increased only modestly in recent years."

President Bush Will Speak At Father's Namesake Carrier's Christening. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/7, Glass) reports, "Today's christening of the aircraft carrier George H.W. Bush may be wet and windy, but workers building the $6 billion warship say they'll be shining. ... President Bush will give the keynote address in honor of his father, the carrier's namesake and the nation's 41st president, who will be present."

Baker Refrains From Criticizing Bush In New Book. In the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) author Jacob Heilbrunn reviews, "Work Hard, Study…And Keep Out Of Politics!" by James A. Baker III with Steve Fiffer. Heilbrunn writes, "One of George W. Bush's most remarkable accomplishments has been to burnish the reputations of his Republican predecessors. The longer Bush is in office, the better they look by comparison. … It would hardly be surprising if James A. Baker III felt a certain measure of vindication about this unexpected turn of events. Though the ruthlessly efficient Baker preserved -- or, if you prefer, secured -- Bush's victory in Florida during the contentious 2000 presidential election, he has always been condemned by the right as a moderate. Like many officials from the first Bush administration, including the former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft, Baker was exiled to the sidelines as the younger Bush embraced the right. Unlike Scowcroft, however, Baker has maintained a studied silence about the current Bush administration."

NYT Accuses Bush Of Pursuing "Vendetta" Against Unions. The New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) editorializes that "the National Labor Relations Board recently expanded the pool of workers exempted from union membership. Specifically, the labor board found that registered nurses who assigned others to some shifts or tasks were supervisors, and thus not eligible to join unions. It was a bad decision." According to the Times, "this is one more step curbing the power of organized labor since President Bush came to office. The administration's philosophical vendetta against unions has come at a time when their power is already on the wane. Membership has fallen to 7.8 percent of the private work force in this country, from over a third in the 1950's. Far from balancing the scales, the anti-union drive comes when workers are already at a historic low in bargaining strength. Despite a growing economy and rising productivity, hourly wages adjusted for inflation have declined 2 percent since 2003. Corporate profits, meanwhile, are at their highest share of gross domestic product since the 1960's."

WSJ Urges Kennedy To Rule On Merits. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A6, 2.03M) writes in an editorial that "the Roberts Court started its second term this week, but to read the coverage you might think that the nine-member Supreme Court has been reduced to Justice Anthony Kennedy's single vote." And "it's unlikely we've seen the last one-man majority from Justice Kennedy. This possibility is not lost on the political left, which explains the current publicity given to Justice Kennedy's role. The hope seems to be that Justice Kennedy can be conditioned with carrots and sticks to make him the next Blackmun or Souter -- earning praise for his 'moderation' if he votes with the liberal wing, but earning obloquy if he tacks right." But "what is clear is that Justice Kennedy enjoys being in the position of he who decides. It seems this term will offer him ample scope to play Solomon. The problem with this 'swing-vote' theory is that it trivializes the Court into a results-based political body when there are real judicial disputes to settle. The Court would be best helped if Justice Kennedy pointed it toward clarity rather than judicial confusion."

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Touts Jobs Figures As Sign Of Administration Progress On Economy. Providing the most detailed coverage of President Bush's remarks on the economy Friday, the Washington Post (10/7, A1, Henderson, Baker, 748K) in a generally positive front page article titled "U.S. Job Numbers Remain Strong" reports, "Unemployment went down and paychecks went up last month, the government said yesterday, and it added that job growth for the year ending in March may have been far stronger than previously thought." The news was "greeted warmly by the White House -- and less so by the financial markets." At a FedEx facility Bush touted "the job numbers and the rest of the Republican economic record a month before congressional elections." Bush and "other White House representatives used multiple briefings and statements to highlight yesterday's news." OMB director Rob Portman said, "This economy is strong and growing. … The president's pro-growth policies, including the tax relief, are working."

Focusing on the revised March job figures the Financial Times (10/7, Guha, Pimlott, Mackenzie, Beales) calls the revision "dramatic" and "the biggest in a quarter of a century" which "casts the expansion in a new light, leaving it less 'jobless' than before, though the rate of job creation since the 2001 recession remains low by historic standards." OMB director Portman said, "We now find we created not 5.7m new jobs but 6.6m new jobs since August 2003. … That happens to be about the time when the president's tax relief was fully implemented."

Taking a negative tone, the New York Times (10/7, Porter, 1.21M) in an article titled "Job Growth Was Slack Last Month" reports, "For American workers, the job market is starting to look a lot less inviting. The Labor Department reported yesterday that employment grew by just 51,000 jobs in September, adding slack job growth to the emerging tableau of an economy gradually slowed by higher interest rates, expensive energy and a sputtering housing sector." Toward the end of its article the Times notes, "President Bush pointed to the decline in unemployment as evidence that his economic policies are working, urging Congress to extend his tax cuts beyond their planned expiration at the end of the decade." But "most economists see a slowing economy taking its toll on hiring, with many now predicting that the Fed's next interest rate movement will be down, as it moves next year to try to revive growth."

And the Los Angeles Times (10/7, Hennessy-Fiske, 918K) in an article titled "Sluggish Job Growth Could Affect Elections" reports, "The U.S. economy added a disappointing 51,000 jobs last month, the government said Friday, and although hiring in July and August was revised sharply higher, lackluster employment growth is still expected to dog Republicans in upcoming midterm elections." The economy "has proven to be resilient," yet "President Bush and his party have struggled to capitalize on such gains, analysts and polls say. Even with the Federal Reserve pausing its campaign to raise interest rates, Republicans face voters worried about jobs and the possibility of a recession."

Describing the economic signals as mixed, NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 6, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) said they presented "a bit of a mixed picture. While the US job market grew by only 51,000 jobs across the whole country last month, the previous two months were revised upward and the unemployment rate did tick down a notch to 4.6%."

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (10/7, A3, Conkey, 2.03M) reports, "Job creation sputtered in September, in a sign that the economy is cooling, but other data suggested that the labor market is still producing enough jobs to boost wages." Economists said the "mixed data "made any interest-rate changes by the Federal Reserve unlikely before year's end. Speaking ahead of congressional elections next month, Bush administration officials said the figures pointed to a healthy economy." The Journal continues, "The decline in the politically prominent unemployment rate, the upward revisions to last year's payrolls and the modest acceleration in wage growth could help the Bush administration's efforts to play up the strengths of the economy heading into next month's congressional elections. 'The labor market to my mind is still very tight,' Edward Lazear, chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, told reporters Friday." He "also highlighted that construction employment has held up despite the continuing decline in home building."

The Washington Times (10/7, Hill, 88K) offers a contrasting view from Peter Morici, a former chief economist at the International Trade Commission, who believes "the picture is decidedly mixed. … Those with more education and skills in professions like health care, finance and information technology have little trouble finding jobs, while those with only a high school education face higher unemployment rates around 6 percent." Morici said, "Had the current economic expansion followed the pattern of past recoveries, 2 million manufacturing jobs would have been regained. … Much of the stress in the jobs market falls in contested congressional districts in western Pennsylvania, New York and the lower Midwest. … This combination of economics and geography explains why Republicans are in danger of losing control of the House of Representatives."

Stocks Down Slightly After Strong Week. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today here in New York the Dow dropped 16 points [to close at 11,850.21]. NASDAQ was down more than 6 points [to close at 2,299.99].

The New York Times/AP (10/7) reports, "Wall Street ended a record-breaking week quietly yesterday, edging lower after the Labor Department said employers added far fewer jobs than expected last month. The major indexes all scored big gains for the week." Although "the jobs report gave investors further confirmation that the economy was slowing -- employers created just 51,000 new jobs last month, well off the 120,000 Wall Street expected -- the market is now concerned that the economy might be moderating too much. Even the prospect of a rate cut by the Federal Reserve came as little comfort yesterday." Wachovia Securities market analyst Bryan Piskorowski said, "We've had a market that wants to see bad news as good news with respect to the Fed." But "the economy is slowing, the housing market is slowing, and consumer spending is starting to slow."

The Financial Times (10/7John O'Doherty) quotes Aim Investments senior investment officer Fritz Meyer saying, "I think a soft-landing is absolutely what's going to happen. … Sentiment has been increasing that there is more momentum in the economy than we thought, and the inflation statistics continue to look good."

Experts To Monitor GE For Clues On Economy. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A2, Kranhold, 2.03M) reports, "Investors will be watching anxiously Friday when General Electric Co. reports third-quarter financial results. The industrial and financial giant disappointed investors with both its first- and second-quarter results. And the U.S. economy, for which GE has long been considered a bellwether, appears to have cooled in recent months." It's "far-flung operations touch much of the economy, from power turbines and media to aircraft engines, consumer credit and corporate financing. GE's plastics unit sells to the auto industry, and its appliance business is a barometer of housing." The Journal notes, "One critical unit to watch: the energy unit that makes power-plant turbines, which is recovering from a long slump that followed the collapse of Enron Corp. GE told investors this summer that operating profit at the unit would rise 25% to 30% in the second half of the year after falling 6% in the first half of the year."

NYT Columnists Offer Cautionary Prognoses After Dow Record. Floyd Norris in his column in the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) downplays Dow Jones new record last week, writing "The Dow never had the technology representation of some other indexes, which held it back in the old days and holds it up now. Moreover, it is calculated on a price-weighted basis, so that high-priced stocks have larger influences than lower-priced ones." Norris concludes, "Can this continue? The tech stocks kept rising long after some warned they were ridiculously overvalued. But when they fell, they fell far and fast as owners found that no one wanted to buy them. That could happen to some of today's favorites as well."

And Mark Stein in an analysis titled "To Muted Cheers, The Dow Climbs Past A Record" in the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) writes, "Stocks shattered records. Corporate profits soared. Economists waxed about a so-called Goldilocks economy -- not too hot, not too cold. Sound familiar? That was the siren song of the 1990's economic boom, and there was an eerie echo on Wall Street this week." Dow's rally "was driven not by expectations of rapid economic growth, as it was seven years ago, but by a rapid fall in energy prices caused in part by expectations that global economic growth is slowing."

OPEC To Hold Oil Prices Steady Around $60, But Competition May Drive Price Lower. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, B14, Hutchinson, Cox, Silva, 2.03M) in its EU notebook column reports, "OPEC announced Thursday that it intends to steady the oil price at something like the current level of about $60 a barrel. It may be able to defend this level in the months to come, but over the long haul this effort is doomed." That's because the "cost of producing oil is much less than $60. Even Canadian oil sands, which require expensive and energy-intensive processing, are profitable at something like $50. Eventually, the lure of profits will bring on new supply, damping the price."

Foley Scandal Affects Key GOP House Races. The political turmoil over the investigation of how the GOP handled allegations of Rep. Mark Foley's misbehavior continued to receive significant coverage in major US media outlets, including front page stories in the Washington Post and New York Times. CBS and NBC led their broadcasts with the Foley scandal and its impact on the GOP and altogether the TV news programs devoted four stories totaling 10 minutes to the issue.

CBS Evening News (10/6, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) examined whether the Foley scandal was "reverberating outside the Beltway?" CBS' Borger noted while it was negatively impacting NRCC chairman Tom Reynolds and Rep. Clay Shaw's re-election campaigns, "most Republicans from the very top down are simply trying to get back to their issues." President Bush: "Today we got more good news: National unemployment rate is down to 4.6%." Borger: "Democrats for a change are all speaking the same language, from their House campaign chairman... " DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel: "You cannot change Washington unless you change the people you send to Washington." Borger: "To ads they're running against Republican incumbents." Ad attacking GOP Rep. Mike Sodrel: "You want change in Washington? Then change the people you send." Borger: "This has been a long week for Republicans and in 30 days they're about to discover whether they're in for a long couple of years. It will depend on just how much the Foley mess really matters to the voters."

NBC Nightly News (10/6, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported the Foley scandal may "end up doing heavy damage to the national Republican party. There are dire predictions concerning how this will all play a month from now on election day and how much we've yet to learn." NBC's Reid notes that "the House Republican leadership is rallying around Speaker Dennis Hastert now that he's made clear he has no intention of stepping down. Majority Leader John Boehner whose loyalty was questioned when he said the page issue was Hastert's responsibility now says in a statement, 'he has my full support and I strongly believe he should remain our Speaker.' But while some Republicans show a united front, others, especially in tough races in Democratic states, are running away from Hastert." Tom Kean Jr.: "Speaker Hastert should step down as Speaker. He, after all, is the head of the institution where this happened." Reid adds, "Some Democrats are already running campaign ads." Unidentified male voice: "Did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley."

Focusing on Rep. Deborah Pryce's re-election campaign in Ohio, CBS Evening News (10/6, story 2, 1:40, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "At Waldo's hair salon along one of Columbus's main drags, the sentiment is enough already. Are you sick of people talking about it, though?" Salon owner Pati Young: "Yeah, I am. I'm just sick of it. Forget about it." Cowan: "And that's coming from a Democrat. The war and the economy were the issues being talked about by both sides and it seems these issues are still what Midwest voters want to hear. But since last week this is what they've been getting." Democratic candidate Mary Jo Kilroy: "Deborah Pryce is going to come here and tell you even though she's the fourth-ranking Republican, she never knew Mark Foley. She's got no questions for Mr. Hastert, either."

Examining the impact on the open seat race for Minnesota's 6th district, ABC World News (10/6, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) said "this scandal could be pivotal, when the Democrats need 6 seats to gain the senate and 15 to gain the house." ABC's Reynolds reported Democratic candidate Patty Wetterling "is taking the Capitol Hill page scandal personally. She's been a public advocate for children since her son, Jacob, was abducted 17 years ago and never seen again." Tom Hauser, KSTP-TV political reporter: "No doubt, it's energized the Patty Wetterling campaign." Reynolds: "This is a suburban district nearby Minnesota's twin cities. It's a conservative place and a reliable Republican stronghold. President Bush won 57% of the vote here two years ago. Will the Foley affair shake things up?" Prof. Kathryn Pearson, University of Minnesotta political scientist: "It is something that voters can easily understand as being horrible. And so, voters are talking about this."

Most news stories on the Foley scandal note that Wetterling will make it the subject of the weekly Democratic radio address. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/7, Von Sternberg, 398K) provides the most detail reporting that in her remarks audio taped Friday "that if a 'full and complete investigation' finds that any congressmen covered up the Mark Foley scandal, they should be expelled."

The New York Times (10/7, A1, Nagourney, 1.21M) in a front page article titled "In House Races, More G.O.P. Seats Are Seen At Risk" reports, "At least five more Republican Congressional seats are now in serious contention, analysts said Friday, an unwelcome development for Republicans as they begin to confront a political environment further darkened for them by the Congressional page scandal." The Foley scandal "is undercutting Republican support among elderly voters, suburbanites and women, analysts from both parties said." And "more alarmingly for Republican strategists who have looked to the party's powerful voter turnout operation to save the party this year -- there are signs that the furor is sapping the enthusiasm of a group essential to Republican victories in 2002 and 2004: religious conservatives." White House aides "have watched with frustration as campaign appearances by Mr. Bush, in which he hammers Democrats on national security, receive little coverage, subsumed by the Foley case."

And McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Talev, Black) in an article titled "Polls Show Little National Fallout From Page Scandal" reports the Foley scandal "could have a decisive effect on several key political campaigns across the country and prove crucial to Democratic hopes of gaining control of the House of Representatives in November." Surveys show it "hasn't created a voter backlash against Republicans nationally," yet "in four House districts currently held by Republicans the issue could prove decisive, political analysts said, because of the candidates' connections to Foley or to child protection issues."

Among GOP candidates cited by the New York Times and McClatchy as particularly effected by the Foley scandal are Rep. Tom Reynolds, Rep. John Shimkus in Illinois, Rep. Deborah Pryce in Ohio, Rep. Heather Wilson in New Mexico, Rep. Mike Sodrel in Indiana, Rep. Clay Shaw in Florida, Rep. Don Sherwood in Pennsylvania, Rep. Jon Doolittle and Rep. Michael Pombo in California and Michele Bachmann in Minnesota's open 6th CD.

Democrats Increase Pressure On GOP Over Foley Scandal. The AP (10/7, Taylor) reports, "More Democrats went on the attack Friday with campaign ads linking Republican candidates to the Mark Foley House page scandal while GOP candidates moved to distance themselves from embattled Speaker Dennis Hastert." In addition to Kean's call for Hastert to step down, "additional campaign appearances by Hastert for House GOP candidates got canceled. Hastert has come under heavy attack within his party's rank and file." The AP notes, "The nonstop news cycles for over a week have been filled with details of" the Foley scandal yet "with no significant developments Friday, GOP strategists hoped the party could catch its breath and gain traction on issues like lower gas prices, the peaking stock market and the economy. Great skittishness remained about unforeseen developments in the Foley saga, nevertheless."

The AP (10/7, Hammer) notes Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy launched a radio ad on Christian radio stations attacking Rep. Deborah Pryce for her ties to Foley.

Kean Calls For Hastert To Resign Speakership. New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean's call for Speaker Hastert to resign was noted in virtually all media reports. The New York Times (10/7, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "Breaking ranks with President Bush and his party once again," Kean "called Friday for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to resign in the aftermath of the Mark Foley scandal." He "has made ethics the central plank in his campaign to unseat the Democratic incumbent, Senator Robert Menendez. And although he has staked out reliably Republican positions on most issues, like Mr. Bush's tax cuts and the war in Iraq, Mr. Kean has also bucked party orthodoxy on occasion."

GOP Seeks To Bolster Support For Hastert. Republicans leaders and candidates were described as wary of supporting Speaker Hastert after he addressed the Foley scandal Friday. The Washington Times (10/7, Hurt, 88K) in an article titled "GOP Leaders Rally To House Speaker's Defense" reports, "Several top Republicans, including President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, have rallied behind Mr. Hastert" recently yet "in a clear indication of the damage the scandal could cause the Republican Party in November, some candidates continue to distance themselves." The Times cites New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean and Kentucky GOP Rep. Ron Lewis and notes that in addition some "candidates who aren't explicitly chiding Mr. Hastert are at least denouncing the Republican Congress for the scandal and casting doubt that an independent investigation can be conducted by the House ethics committee." For example, Michigan GOP Senate candidate Michael Bouchard said, "The investigation must be taken out of the hands of politicians and put into the hands of trained investigators."

Similarly focusing on GOP support for Hastert, the Financial Times (10/7, Luce) reports, "For the time being, top Republicans are rallying behind Dennis Hastert," but "for many social conservatives…the Foley scandal could prove to be the final straw." Two key GOP groups "feel betrayed. Many traditional Republicans have been alienated by the growth in 'K Street' lobby groups over the past decade and the accompanying rise in federal spending." And "social conservatives have grown disillusioned with their party's relative lack of success in pushing forward a moral agenda to restrict abortion, oppose gay marriage and rein back the culture of permissiveness." But GOP "leaders believe there is plenty of time for the scandal to blow over. They also believe that their party's larger campaign war chest and the fact that voters remain concerned about national security could still prove decisive in the build-up to voting."

Assessing the GOP response to Hastert's remarks Friday, the New York Times (10/7, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "House Republicans held their breath on Friday and hoped that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's expression of remorse about the page scandal combined with the start of a House ethics investigation would stabilize his grip on power." One "senior Republican official who would speak about internal party matters only without being named said Mr. Hastert in his remarks had accomplished two goals sought by his colleagues: He had accepted some responsibility and had acknowledged that the response to complaints about the initial e-mail sent to a former teenage page in Louisiana had been inadequate." And "other members of the leadership issued statements backing him, putting aside, at least for now, some of the divisions exposed over the scandal and who was responsible."

Speaker's Top Aide Reportedly Met With Foley About Behavior "Prior To November 2005." The Washington Post (10/7, A1, Weisman, 748K) in a front page story reports that Speaker Dennis Hastert's chief of staff Scott Palmer "confronted then-Rep. Mark Foley about his inappropriate social contact with male pages well before the speaker said aides in his office took any action, a current congressional staff member with personal knowledge of Foley and his behavior with pages said yesterday." The unidentified congressional aide's account supports claims made by former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham. But, "Hastert's office contends that the first confrontation with Foley occurred in November 2005, when Shimkus, the head of the House Page Board, and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl took Foley aside to discuss what they termed 'over-friendly' e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana boy. Fordham's account not only pushed the matter back at least two years but also indicated that alarms over Foley's behavior had gone well beyond bland e-mails."

Potential Federal Prosecution Of Foley Examined. The National Journal (10/6, Friel) reports, "In March of this year, a federal judge sentenced Dwight Whorley of Richmond, Va., to 20 years in prison after he was found guilty of a variety of child-pornography charges, including receiving 20 obscene Japanese anime cartoons. The case drew attention in child-protection circles because Whorley was the first person convicted under a 2003 federal statute that makes viewing such nonphotographic material a crime." The Journal continues, "Whorley was also convicted of sending and receiving 20 obscene e-mails that described sex involving children. He had broken the federal law that prohibits online viewing of 'any obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, motion-picture film, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of indecent character.' … That federal statute is one of several that could come into play as the FBI's Washington Field Office and the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section run an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., and his online sexual activities with underage boys. The federal investigators, as well as state and local agents who may be brought into the case, will try to determine what Foley actually did, the jurisdiction in which he did it, the age of the boys involved, and what state or federal laws he might have violated." The Journal adds, "The federal laws potentially in play include an obscenity statute that prohibits the 'transfer of obscene material to minors' and defines a minor as a child age 15 or younger. The youngest alleged recipient of sexually suggestive or sexually explicit messages from Foley was 16. … The statutes that Whorley was convicted of violating are based on the material itself, not on the age of the sender or receiver. Under such laws, juries determine whether community standards were violated and whether the material in question appeals to 'prurient' interests. … Also in play are federal and state 'coercion and enticement' statutes. Federal law prohibits adults from persuading -- or attempting to persuade -- children younger than 18 to engage in illegal sexual activity. Brian Doyle, a former public-affairs officer in the Homeland Security Department, pleaded no contest in Florida last month after being arrested for engaging in online discussions about a sexual rendezvous with a law enforcement agent posing as a 14-year-old girl. … Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales 'takes any allegations of child exploitation extremely seriously. And he has directed those in charge of the inquiry to take all appropriate steps to get to the bottom of this unfortunate situation as soon as possible.'"

Shimkus Could Face Long-Term Ramifications From Foley Scandal. McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Bjerga) reports, "With more than a million dollars to spend and 69 percent of the votes in his last election, Rep. John Shimkus may well survive the Mark Foley scandal at the ballot box." But his "congressional influence could be diminished permanently by the scandal."

Lawyer Defends Page As Victim While Conservative Blogs Allege IMs Were Prank. NBC Nightly News (10/6, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported. "We do know tonight the former page at the center of this story is now cooperating with the FBI." Stephen Jones, Congressional page's attorney: "I think he is a victim. This is an older man that made inappropriate comments, suggestions to him."

The Washington Post (10/7, A7, Williamson, 748K) reports that Jordan Edmund, "a key figure in the Foley page scandal" as a page who exchanged IMs with Foley, "has been targeted by conservative blogs" who "have published reports that the exchanges were a prank and that the teen in the messages…was actually trying to solicit sexually suggestive messages from Foley." But Edmund's lawyer Stephen Jones said, "It was not a prank, not a practical joke, that pages played on a congressman." Jones added ,"I don't think Jordan intended for any of this to become public."

House Republicans Accuse Democrats Of Political Setup. CNN (10/7) on its web site reports, "House Republicans took the offensive Friday, asking Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and other Democrats to testify about whether they engaged in partisan trickery by releasing Foley's messages weeks before the midterm elections." In a letter signed by 10 other Republican congressmen Rep. Jack Kingston "asked them to disclose whether Democrats played a role in publicizing Foley's correspondences." Kingston wrote, "Just as it must be determined whether any Republican members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal Mr. Foley's activities, it must also be determined whether any Democrat members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal these same activities."

Failure To Pass Ethics Reform May Hurt GOP In Election. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A4, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "As House Republicans struggle to contain the fallout from the Mark Foley page scandal, two coming court dates will push long-lingering lobbying misdeeds back into the headlines just before Election Day." Next week Rep. Bob Ney is expected enter guilty pleas in the Abramoff probe and former Abramoff associate David Safavian faces sentencing Oct. 27. In addition to the Foley scandal it provides "'a clothesline' that Democrats can use to drive the scandal issue through the final days of the campaign," according to political observer David Gergen. Congress failed to pass tougher ethics reforms last spring and in private "House leaders said they didn't feel pressed to pass a tougher measure because the issue didn't show up on public polls as a concern to voters, several lawmakers and aides said." Yet, "in the wake of the Foley scandal, that could be changing. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll conducted in the past week found that about half of likely voters said scandal will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote. And by nearly 2-1, the respondents said they trust Democrats more than Republicans to clean up Congress."

Critics Scrutinize House Ethics Panel. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Simon, 918K) reports, "The House Ethics Committee has had little to say as one scandal after another has rocked Capitol Hill since early 2005." Critics of the committee "abound" yet Rep. Howard Berman, "the committee's top Democrat, said in an interview Friday that since he rejoined the panel in the spring, 'there is a lot more going on' within the committee than people realize, but that he couldn't publicly discuss it. And despite the committee's paralysis for much of 2005, Berman said, 'As slow and as torturous as the process appears to be, the fact is if you look at the last 20 years, a number of careers have been ended by virtue of committee actions.'"

Foley Pressed To Release Name Of Abuser By Victims Advocates. The Washington Post (10/7, A6, Cooperman, 748K) reports, "The Roman Catholic diocese of Palm Beach, Fla., and national advocacy groups for victims of sexual abuse called yesterday for former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to give police the name of the clergyman who allegedly abused him as a teenager." Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests director David Clohessy said, "Every day that a molester walks free is a day when he can hurt other kids."

Former Pages Want To See Program Continued. McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Diaz, Montgomery) reports that "for generations of other pages, the experience was a once-in-a-lifetime chance to get a sneak peek at the backstage of history, sometimes before it was made." Many "regard their service as a life-shaping experience. And they're eager to defend the program in a growing scandal evolving around" the Foley scandal.

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Gaouette, Mendoza, 918K) reports, "When Republican representatives hooked up for a conference call this week to discuss the political crisis over former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to former pages, the most heated discussion was not over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the matter, but over the future of the congressional page program." But "the venerable program is likely to persevere. For senators and representatives, it's a much-cherished perk that they can bestow on the children of constituents. For former pages, who ardently defend the program, it's an inspirational opportunity to see politicians at work in the cloakrooms of power."

WSJ Faults Media For Focusing On Foley At The Expense Of More Serious Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A6, 2.03M) in an editorial writes, "Speaker Hastert should not resign before the election. It would be a disservice to send voters to the polls in five weeks amid tumult over Mark Foley. Those for whom this is a deciding issue should certainly vote on it. Our view is that the country would be better served with a clearer sense of the electorate's sentiment on dealing with the global threat and domestic well-being. Those are fit subjects of a serious national election."

Dorothy Bush Koch Discusses New Book On Bush 41. In an interview with Newsweek's Jessica Bennett (10/7) President Bush's sister Dorothy Bush Koch answers questions about her new book, "My Father, My President," which "takes an inside look at the personal stories, family memories and intimate challenges that remained largely out of the public eye during" Bush 41's "presidential years." Asked what the book will "tell us about your father than we may not have known," Koch replies, "My dad reached the highest pinnacle of his career when he became president, but he also had some low points, such as the death of a daughter. We have a firsthand account of when my dad was shot down on Sept. 2, 1944, which I think is very fascinating. But I hope people will learn how he coped not only with the good times but with the bad times with sort of dignity and grace."

Clinton To Distribute Several Million Dollars To Democratic Party Entities. The New York Times (10/7, Hernandez, 1.21M) reports Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton "is mounting a major push for Democratic Congressional candidates across the nation during the final weeks of the fiercely contested midterm elections, her aides said on Friday." Clinton, "who has been occasionally criticized by liberal bloggers for not using enough of her bulging campaign coffers to help her party, is shipping $1.5 million to two Democratic Congressional campaign committees based in Washington, as well as to the financially strained New York State Democratic Party, her advisers said. Mrs. Clinton is giving $1.1 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which comes on top of the $1 million that she gave the committee last month. In addition, the senator is donating $250,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and $150,000 to the New York State Democratic Party. At the same time, Mrs. Clinton also plans to campaign for nearly 20 candidates in about a dozen states." According to the Times, Clinton will appear in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, New Jersey, Florida, Nevada, Rhode Island and Minnesota.

Wesley Clark Endorses Lamont. The New York Times (10/7, Medina, 1.21M) reports Gen. Wesley Clark "criticized" Sen. Joseph Lieberman "accusing him of having 'rubber-stamped' the Bush administration's Iraq policies, and he questioned Mr. Lieberman's understanding of military issues, during campaign appearances with Ned Lamont, the Democratic nominee for United States Senate." Clark "offered a strong endorsement of Mr. Lamont, saying that he would be 'the key to changing the course in this country.'"

Steele's Attacks On Cardin Over Drug Industry Ties Considered Hypocritical. The Washington Post (10/7, B1, Mosk, 748K) reports, "In a recent commercial advertising his bid for U.S. Senate, Maryland Republican Michael S. Steele tells voters that his opponent, Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, has been tainted by contributions from pharmaceutical companies and special interests. … The ad does not mention that less than a week before the commercial began airing, a top drug company executive and an industry lobbyist hosted a $1,000-a-person fundraiser for Steele at a K Street steakhouse in Washington. The invitation to the fundraiser, obtained by The Washington Post, says the Sept. 20 lunch reception was to be hosted by Sally Walsh, a director of federal government relations at GlaxoSmithKline, and Michael Carozza, a lobbyist for Bristol-Myers Squibb. It advises donors to send contributions to lobbyist Frederick T. Dombo III, who identifies himself on his Web site as a Steele campaign volunteer. Federal records show that Dombo represents AmerisourceBergen Specialty Group, one of the largest pharmaceutical services companies in the country." The Post adds that the Steele commercial, "which aired Sept. 26, marked the first negative turn in his advertising campaign, coming in response to a spot by national Democrats that painted the Republican candidate as being in President Bush's hip pocket."

Dean Wishes Democrats Had Black Statewide Candidate In Maryland. The Washington Times (10/7, Ward, 88K) reports Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean "said that Maryland's Democratic ticket should have had a black or other minority at the top, but added that the national party isn't to blame for the lack of diversity. 'I do think there should be more diversity on this ticket,' Mr. Dean said. … However, Mr. Dean said that the national party bears no responsibility for Maryland's Democratic ticket, which offers four white men for the state's top offices -- the U.S. Senate, governor, attorney general and comptroller. 'We don't interfere in primaries,' he said of the DNC."

Webb Uses Warner's Assessment Of Iraq To Criticize Allen. The Washington Post (10/7, B2, Craig, Shear, 748K) reports Democratic Virginia Senate candidate James Webb "said yesterday that it is time for the United States to seek an end to the fighting in Iraq through diplomacy, citing a new and dire assessment of the war effort by Virginia's senior senator, John W. Warner (R). Webb sought to capitalize on Warner's appraisal of the war to highlight what Webb called the failure of his GOP opponent, Sen. George Allen, to face reality about the worsening situation in Iraq. … 'They have a victory quite frankly in military terms,' Webb said of soldiers in Iraq. 'What we have to do is to move this into the political, diplomatic environment. All I've heard from Senator Allen is that we need a victory in Iraq, whatever that is.'" The Allen campaign "quickly organized a conference call for reporters with Warner as a show of Republican unity. 'The bottom-line goal that Senator Warner and I share is that we cannot leave Iraq as a central haven for terrorists,' Allen said."

Allen's Sister's Memoir Noted. The Washington Times (10/7, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Allen's "political opponents have cited his sister's memoir to portray him as a bully, but an attentive read of her recollections of growing up with football-minded men provides deep insight into the Virginia Republican's past now at issue in his re-election campaign. 'Fifth Quarter: The Scrimmage of a Football Coach's Daughter' by Jennifer Allen includes some eyebrow-raising passages such as a young George Allen dragging his sister by her hair or hitting her boyfriend with a pool cue, incidents that are often noted by Mr. Allen's Democratic foes. But his critics don't use excerpts noting that the senator was a star student or how he set out a chair in honor of his late father…at his 1994 gubernatorial inauguration."

Underdog House Candidate Claims Democratic Backers Have Abandoned Him. The New York Times (10/7, Leibovich, 1.21M) reports, "Implausible pursuits can be humbling. Jim Marcinkowski, a Democrat, discovers this every day in his bid to dislodge Representative Mike Rogers, a three-term Republican, from the United States Congress." Rogers "clearly holds a big advantage in name recognition. And money, organization, experience, knowledge of the district, and everything else that make incumbency such a near-invincible force in Congressional elections. It is easy to overlook this in an environment that many predict will be hostile to sitting members of Congress, especially Republicans." Marcinkowski "personifies the thankless underdog. He is a probable loser (some say surefire) who is unknown to most voters in this district northwest of Detroit and irrelevant to the national party officials who recruited him — and, in his telling, then abandoned him — as they focused on 50 or so 'battleground' contests." Marcinkowski "says many of the Democrats who enticed him to run abandoned him after his fund-raising lagged and they deemed other races to be more winnable."

This Year Could See Substantial Rise In Female Members Of Congress. The Washington Post (10/7, A9, Asthana, 748K) reports on "a drive by U-Va.'s Center for Politics to inspire young women to get involved in politics." The Center's Director Larry Sabato "is predicting that 2006 could be the best year for women in 14 years. In a conservative scenario, according to the Crystal Ball, female candidates would gain nine seats in the House -- the largest rise since the Year of the Woman in 1992, when the number of women in Congress jumped from 32 to 54."

Nagin Endorses Jefferson. The New York Times/AP (10/7, Press) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin "says he is enthusiastically supporting the re-election of Representative William J. Jefferson, an eight-term Democrat who is the target of a federal bribery investigation. 'I've told the congressman that since he supported me during the mayor's race, that I would reciprocate,' Mr. Nagin said Thursday."

Schwarzenegger's Resurgence Attributed To His Bipartisanship. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 11, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A red-state Governor in a blue state, Arnold Schwarzenegger is running for re-election as you May know. Even after some mistakes that really hurt him, including one just this week, he is way ahead in the polls. … Schwarzenegger has been able to shake off past controversies that hurt his popularity. … After he backed a series of losing partisan initiatives, his approval rating slumped to 35%. But one thing about Schwarzenegger -- he knows how to reinvent himself and he's doing it again. The new Arnold is bipartisan. Signing legislation Democrats favor such as measures to fight global warming and hike the minimum wage."

Schwarzenegger's Stance On Immigration Said To Have Evolved. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Marosi, 918K) reports, "The national immigration debate is reverberating in California's gubernatorial campaign, with the two major-party candidates trading verbal jabs but treading carefully on the volatile issue." Schwarzenegger, "who has talked tough in the past on border-related issues — praising Minuteman-style private border patrols and supporting the anti-illegal immigrant Proposition 187 — now plays up his immigrant roots, calling for a comprehensive and compassionate border policy that bolsters security without mistreating illegal immigrants. The softened public stance hasn't stopped Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides from portraying Schwarzenegger as an anti-immigrant extremist who has harmed relations with Mexico." The Times notes, "The dispute continued this week, when Angelides supporters criticized Schwarzenegger for saying Mexican immigrants should 'immerse yourself and assimilate into the American culture.'"

Elizabeth Edwards Busy Promoting Memoir. McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Krentz) report, "In the days since her book was published, Elizabeth Edwards has gone from one interview to the next, from Oprah Winfrey to Diane Rehm to Charlie Rose, talking about the pain of losing her son and her battle with breast cancer. … John Edwards seems to be a probable 2008 presidential candidate. And the family has moved into a new home in Orange County, N.C."

Murdoch's Sky TV To Carry Gore Channel In UK. The Financial Times (10/7, Terazono, Correspondent) reports former Vice President Al Gore "is bringing his user-generated content television channel to the UK, courtesy of James Murdoch's British Sky Broadcasting. Mr Gore launched Current TV, the US channel made of clips created by viewers and producers, in August last year, and said that the channel was 'democratising television.' Mr Murdoch, who has claimed that BSkyB was the first media company in the world to go carbon neutral, and Mr Gore share their passion for the environment."

Rice, Colleagues Move Toward Sanctioning Iran But Continue Diplomacy. The Washington Post (10/7, A18, Wright, 748K) reports Washington "and five other major powers agreed Friday to take the next step toward imposing sanctions on Iran for failing to comply with [an UNSCR] to prevent it from subverting its nuclear energy program to develop a nuclear weapon." However, the grouping, "in response to Russian and Chinese wariness about the impact and effectiveness of sanctions," decided "to keep the door open to diplomacy." EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "will remain available for talks if Iran chooses to come to the table and suspend its uranium enrichment program," a move that would end consideration of sanctions. Undersecretary Burns said the existing incentives package "will still be on offer if the Islamic republic changes its position." The Post says that, "after a dramatic buildup all week to a possible turning point following the collapse of European negotiations with Iran, the tone and scope of the agreement appeared significantly milder than anticipated." The deal "does not close the deep gap between the United States and Russia over strategy toward Iran. [Secretary] Rice acknowledged the split. 'It's long been the view of particularly Russia that sanctions may not have the intended effect,' she said, adding that Moscow had an obligation to act since it had voted for Resolution 1696 in July."

The New York Times (10/7, Shenon, 1.21M) adds Washington "said it had won agreement on Friday from" its six partners "to seek sanctions against Iran." However, US "diplomats conceded that there could still be long and difficult negotiations over what penalties to impose and their timing." Burns "said after the meeting that whatever the other nations' diplomatic language, 'What we've got is an agreement to go to the Security Council' to punish'" Tehran. The Times says "none of the other nations [involved] issued such an explicit statement after the meeting." An anonymous "senior State Department official" said "senior diplomats from the six countries would talk next week by video conference to begin debating the list of sanctions."

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Richter, 918K) adds the six powers "said after a meeting of foreign ministers that they continued to hold out hope that the Iranian government would relent, suspend nuclear enrichment and accept a package of economic incentives they offered June 1." The Times notes, " A senior U.S. official described the decision to discuss sanctions as 'a little bit of progress' but acknowledged that agreeing on penalties against Iran would be difficult. Yet the Americans, who have pressed for sanctions, insisted that it was significant that the six nations have held together."

The Wall Street Journal (10/7, King, 2.03M) notes Washington "and its major partners sought to deliver strong messages to both North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs, but divisions persist over how hard to push either country within the United Nations." London meeting participants "said they plan next week to begin talks within the [UNSC] over a package of sanctions," but Moscow and Beijing "reiterated Friday that they won't support threats or coercion." In somewhat more negative tones, the Financial Times (10/7, Khalaf, Smyth) says "after two hours of talks in London, no agreement was reached on the details of potential measures and it was far from clear that differences between the US and Europe on one hand, and Russia and China on the other, had been overcome." The AP (10/7, Gardiner) adds the six powers "left crucial questions about the scope and timing of any measures unresolved. … Apparently divided about how quickly to move, the envoys stopped short of explicitly declaring European negotiations with Iran a failure, as some had expected them to do. Their statement also shied away from demanding Tehran be punished by the [UNSC], but said" the discussion would continue at the UN.

UNSC Statement Says Any North Korean Nuclear Test Would "Jeopardize Peace." The New York Times (10/7, Hoge, 1.21M) reports the UNSC "urged North Korea Friday not to carry out a planned test of a nuclear weapon, saying it would endanger regional stability and provoke worldwide denunciation." The unanimously approved statement "said such action would 'jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond.'" The text also "urged Pyongyang to return to six-party talks," and Ambassador Bolton is quoted saying, "At an absolute minimum, North Korea must come back to the six-party talks which it has boycotted for 13 consecutive months and shows no inclination to come back to." However, the statement "made no mention of possible…sanctions or punishment other than to note that the Council would act 'consistent with' its obligations if Pyongyang followed through with its threat."

As the only network TV news program to cover North Korea Friday evening, ABC World News (10/6, story 5, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) in a brief story noted, "And in North Korea, the dictator, Kim Jong-Il, made his first appearance since the country announced plans to conduct a nuclear test. Today, the UN Security Council threatened unspecified action against North Korea if it moves ahead with the test."

The Washington Post (10/7, A17, Lynch, 748K) notes the UNSC "issued a veiled threat to weigh tougher action, including the possibility of sanctions, against Pyongyang it if proceeds with the test. The nonbinding statement capped three days of intensive negotiation after North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it plans to test a nuclear device to strengthen its defenses against the United States." The Administration "expressed frustration that the council was not prepared to adopt an even tougher response spelling out the punitive actions to be imposed on North Korea if it conducts a test." Nevertheless, Bolton and Japanese PermRep and UNSC President Kenzo Oshima "said the statement will be helpful to Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who is expected to advocate a tougher response to North Korea's nuclear program in visits to Beijing on Sunday and Seoul on Monday." The Washington Times (10/7, Pisik, 88K) runs a similar story.

AFP (10/7) keys on continuing White House reaction, noting Deputy Spokeswoman Dana Perino "warned that a North Korean nuclear test would be an 'incendiary' event threatening Pyongyang's neighbors." She is quoted saying, "The international community has joined us in sending a clear signal to the North Koreans that any such test of a nuclear device would be unacceptable. … It would be destabilizing to the region and could lead to further escalation of tensions. And a test, by its very nature, could advance the North Koreans' capabilities."

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Farley, 918K) adds Moscow and Beijing "had objected to earlier drafts of the statement that threatened an arms embargo, economic penalties or military force for failing to comply. The two nations rejected wording to 'demand' that North Korea halt its plans, settling instead for a statement that would 'urge' it to do so. But Russian diplomats said they were 'very concerned' about the possibility of a test." Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe "said [yesterday] that the test could come as early as this weekend. U.S. spy satellites have detected sustained activity at a suspected underground test site in North Korea."

The AP (10/7, Lederer) notes, "A unanimous [UNSC] statement urged the secretive, communist nation Friday to abandon all atomic weapons as it promised last year and cancel plans to detonate a device. Japan hinted the North could face sanctions or possible military action." Tokyo "issued a statement later saying if North Korea defies international concerns about a test, 'the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures.'" In Pyongyang, Kim Jong-Il "met hundreds of his top military commanders and urged them to bolster the nation's defenses, as officers cheered, 'Fight at the cost of our lives!'" One Chinese analyst "said only the removal of American economic sanctions against Pyongyang could dissuade the country from carrying out a nuclear test."

The Financial Times (10/7, Turner, Dinmore) adds the UNSC "has agreed a unanimous statement, warning North Korea to refrain from testing a nuclear weapon, or face unspecified action." The Times says Washington "is reportedly looking at possible sanctions against" Pyongyang. Assistant Secretary Chris Hill refused to say precisely what the US would do in the event of a nuclear test, but indicated the response could be some kind of blockade, saying the top US priority was to prevent proliferation of" WMDs.

Lebanon's "Accidental" Premier Works To Rebuild Nation. In a 1,896-word profile piece, the Wall Street Journal (10/7, Young, 2.03M) reports, "There was a time, not so long ago, when Fuad al-Siniora was the most vilified man in Lebanon." Despite being "a proper technocrat, seemingly misplaced amid the promenading politicians," the Lebanese Prime Minster "remains firmly in place" in spite of

"efforts by an array of forces to bring his government down." The Journal says Siniora "is velvety and unflappable," avoiding "hard angles in favor of nods, winks and baroque compromises -- qualities essential for herding the fat cats that make up Lebanese government." After discussing Siniora's "difficult" political position following the Israel-Hezbollah war, the Journal notes, "Politics are not the only thing the prime minister has to worry about. With a $40 billion debt, a GDP estimated at only $18 to $20 billion, and losses from the July-August conflict estimated by some U.N. agencies at over $10 billion, Lebanon is in dire financial straits." In conclusion, the Journal adds, "Many of Mr. Siniora's enemies will readily admit, of course, to a fear of God. What he must worry about is that they will increasingly fear Fuad al-Siniora, the accidental prime minister who may have turned out to be more than they bargained for."

Cluster Bombs Continue To Threaten Lebanese Civilians. ABC World News (10/6, story 8, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The US is investigating whether Israel used" cluster bombs during its retaliation against Hezbollah in Lebanon "improperly. But no one disputes that the bombs are injuring and killing civilians right now." ABC (Dinnick) added, "The Lebanese army accuses Israel of violating International law by dropping to many bombs in populated areas. Israeli officials organize they argue they had no choice." Mark Regev, Israel government spokesman: "One of the problems of the conflict in Hezbollah, was that Hezbollah used the population as a human shield." Dinnick: "He says his team is finding and safely destroying a handful of cluster bombs every day. But the UN estimates there may be as many as 1 million still out there."

Haniya Says Hamas Will Not Recognize Israel. The New York Times (10/7, Myre, 1.21M) reports remarks by Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, made "in a defiant speech delivered to a teeming crowd of Hamas supporters," that "insisted" that Hamas "would not recognize Israel despite the cutoff in Western aid that has strangled his government." The Times says the speech "appeared to be aimed at the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Abbas recently told Rice that "there is a need for a new Palestinian government that will recognize Israel and deal with it. He also indicated that he was prepared to invoke his presidential powers and dismiss the current government." Haniya and Abbas' "blunt public remarks" this week "reflected what seems to be an increasingly bitter power struggle that could dim the prospects for a compromise."

The AP (10/7, El Deeb) notes Haniya said "Hamas will not recognize Israel or give in to international pressure that has crippled the Palestinian government." His "fiery speech was interrupted when he fainted onstage, apparently overcome by the heat and two weeks of dawn-to-dusk fasting during the holy month of Ramadan." He "ruled out a proposal by members of his own Hamas movement to form a new government of technocrats as a way of winning international support and ending a seven-month aid freeze." Haniya did say that "Hamas remains willing to invite other parties into a coalition, but that it would not soften its positions."

Writer Says Israel Perpetuates Family Separations. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (10/7, 1.21M), Palestinian writer Sam Bahour describes how he "left a comfortable life in the United States for an uncertain future in the West Bank" in 1993. He "helped create a $100 million telecommunications company" and build "a $10 million shopping center." However, "Israeli authorities have decided that my life here has come to an end." Bahour concludes, "Israelis and Palestinians are destined to be neighbors. … Many people like me…whom Israel is denying entry came to build bridges, not walls. We came to invest in a better life to follow this occupation — a bright, joint future for Palestinian and Israeli children alike."

Czech Authorities Heighten Alert Amid Anti-Jew Terror Plot Rumors. The New York Times (10/7, Smith, 1.21M) carries Czech media reports that "a report that there was a plot to attack Jews in Prague has set off a terrorism alert there." The "Czech news media have been feverishly speculating on the nature of the threat since the government announced heightened security measures on Sept. 23, the first day of the Jewish New Year. The Czech interior minister, Ivan Langer, called the threat 'unprecedented in the history of the Czech Republic.'" The Times notes, "The news of possible terrorism threats in both Oslo and Prague raise the possibility that Islamist terrorist plots, having been foiled by vigilant antiterrorism efforts in capitals like Paris and London, are turning to 'softer' targets elsewhere in Europe where security is more lax."

China's Current Account Surplus Continues To Grow. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A4, Wu, 2.03M) reports an announcement by the Chinese State

Administration of Foreign Exchange that Beijing's "current-account surplus in the first half of this year totaled $91.58 billion, widening from $67.26 billion in the same period a year earlier." The surplus "in the January-June period was bolstered by a growing surplus in China's trade in goods." The Journal says this data suggests that "China's current-account surplus is on track to exceed the $160.82 billion posted for full-year 2005." The government "reiterated it will encourage outflows and control the use of foreign debt" in an effort to reach "equilibrium in the balance of payments, including moving toward yuan convertibility on the capital account."

China's Hu Will Stress Unity, Highlight His Policies At Party Conference. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Magnier, 918K) details Chinese President Hu Jintao's political preparations for the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) conference that begins tomorrow. He "has worked overtime to burnish the image of harmony in the party, even if it's taken some bloodletting to drive the point home." Recent purges and arrests in Shanghai "sent shock waves through China's political establishment" and "served as a warning to those in lower party ranks that Hu means business, further consolidating his power and stressing his underdogoriented policies as he heads into the fourth year of an expected 10-year administration. " The Times says Hu has repeatedly "stressed the importance of harmony as a salve for growing tensions over China's rich-poor gap and endemic corruption — even as the party and the nation's wide-ranging security apparatus have backed up words with force, intimidation and censorship when appeals for calm are ignored by rioting farmers, the media or social activists."

Putin Steps Up Deportations Of Georgians, Seizures Of Businesses. The New York Times (10/7, Myers, 1.21M) notes Moscow "deported 153 citizens of Georgia on Friday as a wave of punitive measures against Georgian migrants and businesses grew, prompting criticism that the government is carrying out an ethnically motivated campaign of harassment." The Times says the past week has been marked by "political and diplomatic conflict between Russia and Georgia that began with the arrests of four Russian military officers for espionage, and has shown little sign of easing despite the officers' release." An ethnic Georgian who runs a Moscow-based NGO "described the authorities' actions as an unjustified overreaction to political disputes with Georgia's president, Mikheil Saakashvili." These measures "have coincided with two new campaigns announced this week by" President Vladimir Putin – "sweeping new restrictions on gambling," and "new regulations of migrant workers, especially those in wholesale and retail markets." The Times adds, "Using some of the most strikingly nationalistic language of his presidency, Mr. Putin said that markets should be regulated 'with a view to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population.'"

WSJ Says Georgian Independence Has Fueled Kremlin Retaliation. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, 2.03M) editorializes, "The world needs to watch Russia's current pressure on Georgia." Moscow's moves this week are "a fresh reminder of just how paranoid and bullying the Kremlin's foreign policy has become in the hands of President Vladimir Putin." Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "alleges that the arrest of the [Russian] officers is part of a Western plot apparently hatched in Washington." While "Comrade Lavrov" may believe that "the Bush Administration wastes its time hatching two-bit schemes in the Caucasus to humiliate Mother Russia," the Journal says "what we are likelier witnessing is another fit of Russian pique at [Georgian President] Saakashvili's courageous decision to yank Georgia out of Moscow's orbit…and into the orbit of the West." Tblisi's efforts over the past three years "can serve as a model for other former Soviet republics such as Kyrgyzstan and Ukraine as they struggle to prosper. It could also serve as a model for Russia itself, which may be why Moscow has used every opportunity to bring Georgia and its leaders to heel." The Journal concludes the world should "feel grateful that President Bush, after placing too much faith in Mr. Putin in his first term, has given Mr. Saakashvili the support he deserves."

Administration Believes Unconfirmed Reports That Castro Has Cancer. Time Magazine (10/6, Burger, Donnelly) reported, "Ever since President Fidel Castro was sidelined for what was said to be abdominal surgery last July, Cuban officials have maintained that the country's leader will return to his post." However, Time says the Administration is "now convinced that Castro, 80, has terminal cancer and will never return to power." Time continues, "Of course, such intelligence reports could be wrong, and one official cautioned that definitive proof is nearly impossible for the U.S. to come by. Yet the fact that the Cuban government removed Castro from the public stage before his death could suggest that Castro and his would-be successors were aware of a terminal condition and wanted to gauge public reaction to his absence." While the Administration is preparing for "the inevitable," Times adds Castro's death wouldn't "mean that things will change much. Fidel's brother Raul…has given no indication that he will change the policies of the isolated Communist government that has tormented the U.S. since taking power in 1959."

Hungarian Premier Wins Confidence Vote. The Financial Times (10/7, Condon) reports, "Lawmakers from Hungary's two coalition parties on Friday signalled their near unanimous support for" Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany "in a confidence vote. Despite a withering attack from the opposition and the knowledge that hundreds of thousands of Hungarians were expected to mass outside parliament to demand the prime minister's resignation later in the day, MPs voted 207-165" to support the premier. "Only three coalition MPs failed to vote for the measure."

The AP (10/7, Gorondi) adds, "Even as parliament voted, however, tens of thousands of people gathered on Kossuth Square just outside the legislature and demanded Gyurcsany's dismissal. The Fidesz party called on supporters to bring alarm clocks to the rally, a symbolic wake-up call for the ruling coalition to get rid of the prime minister." Gyurcsany "had requested the vote of confidence to reinforce political support for his austerity package and the transformation of the inefficient public sector" after his "coalition suffered large setbacks in Sunday's nationwide municipal elections."

Darfur Divestment Movement Finds Success In States And Cities. The Washington Post (10/7, A12, Boustany, 748K) reports, "House members are scattering to their home states this week with inconclusive results on the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of western Sudan, but momentum is growing at the state level for governments to divest public funds from companies, mostly foreign-based, doing business with Khartoum." The Post calls the sanctions bill, HR 3127, "a victory for business lobbyists" because it omits "language that would have endorsed states' rights to pass divestment laws." However, the Post notes, "a divestment movement appears to be gaining momentum across the country, with active campaigns on university campuses and at city and state levels. Six states have already passed divestment laws: Maine, Connecticut, Oregon, Illinois, New Jersey and California."

California State Moves Progressive Agenda. The Financial Times (10/7, Garrahan, Dinmore) reports that the progressive politics driving California politics "are beginning to take on an increasingly international dimension. This has left some businesses leaders and Washington policy makers uneasy." For example Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, signed "a law that prohibits the state's pension funds from investing in companies with active business in Sudan." Schwarzenegger's "efforts were hailed by voters from across the political spectrum. But the Sudan divestment law…is troubling the Bush administration, as well as business lobby groups and some senators." And it "comes weeks after the US Senate blocked legislation that would have ratified divestment from the Sudan by US states."

Volcker Says World Bank Must Lead Worldwide Anti-Corruption Effort. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (10/7, 2.03M), former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker says the murder of Russian central banker Andrei Koslov does not mean financial crimes occur only in Russia. Koslov's murder "defines the battle lines for all of us. It's a battle that all those supporting economic development and the rule of law cannot afford to lose. And, appropriately, it is international institutions that are placed front and center in that battle." He concludes, "My impression is that the corruption problem may be getting worse. … The implications go far beyond any one institution. But I know of no institution, by its leadership, by its professional staff, by its standing in the world, that is better equipped to take on that challenge than the World Bank."

NYT Says Paisley's DUP Should Renew Northern Ireland Peace Efforts. The New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) editorializes, "The transformation of militant Irish Republicanism from terrorism to democratic politics over the past decade has been little short of remarkable — a welcome success story in troubled times." Now that the IRA "has fully renounced terrorism, dissociated itself from organized criminal activity and committed itself to following an exclusively political path, the very steps its critics have demanded for years," the Times says the Democratic Unionist Party "led by the Rev. Ian Paisley," should offer "a similarly remarkable response." The DUP should "acknowledge that the conditions it has long set out for entering into a power-sharing government with [Sinn Fein] have been achieved."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Will Investigate Alleged Guantanamo Beatings. The AP (10/7, Watkins) reports, "The Pentagon said Friday that it will investigate a Marine's sworn statement that guards at Guantanamo Bay bragged about beating detainees and described it as a common practice." Several DOD officials are quoted promising a full investigation. The AP writes about the camp, "Human-rights groups have roundly criticized the Bush administration for detaining most without criminal charges, but U.S. officials have defended the detentions as necessary in the war on terrorism and say the detainees are treated humanely."

The New York Times (10/7, Cloud, 1.21M) also reports the unnamed Marine paralegal's claims "that guards at the United States military prison at Guantanámo Bay bragged about beating prisoners and denying them privileges to anger them."

Isolation Becomes Gitmo Norm. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Williams, 918K) reports, "A May riot in which dozens of detainees attacked U.S. soldiers, the suicide of three prisoners in June, and changes in the camp population -- including the arrival of 14 'high value detainees' -- have transformed Guantanamo into a largely maximum security facility." The Times adds, "The hardening of Guantanamo detention dispirits the detainees and their lawyers, who see it as part of U.S. political posturing in an election year. ... Rank-and-file guards express little concern or curiosity about the conditions of the prisoners' confinement, noting that they are just doing their duty."

Richard Epstein Argues For Habeas Corpus. In a commentary for he Wall Street Journal (10/7, A7, 2.03M), law professor Richard Epstein argues for retaining habeas corpus for Guantanamo detainees, "The law [MCA] allows the government to hold any prisoner -- even if he is not an unlawful enemy combatant -- in custody for the rest of his life, with no due process and no recourse to the courts. No one deserves that fate. Truth must count. Innocence must matter."

US Denies Wrongdoing In Idaho Computer Terrorism Suit. The AP (10/7, Boone) reports from Boise, ID, "The United States says it did nothing wrong when federal agents arrested and detained an American citizen as a material witness in a computer terrorism case. … The government's formal response to the lawsuit brought by Abdullah al-Kidd was filed in U.S. District Court on Friday." The AP continues, "In his lawsuit, al-Kidd contended that the federal government and several of its agents - including former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft and his successor, Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert Mueller, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and others - violated his civil rights by improperly using material witness laws. … The individuals named in the case have until Nov. 27 to respond; the United States' response deadline was Friday." The AP adds, "In its response, filed by Justice Department lawyer J. Marcus Meeks, the United States denied al-Kidd's allegations and said that al-Kidd was not entitled to any damages. … The lawsuit arose after al-Kidd - a former student at the University of Idaho who played football for the Vandals under the name Lavoni Kidd - was arrested in 2003 as a material witness in the government's case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen. Al-Kidd and Al-Hussayen both worked on behalf of the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators alleged funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States. .. .A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia."

Harper Raises Arar Rendition Case With Bush, Will Seek Investigation. AFP (10/7) reports Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper "has protested to" President Bush "about the deportation to Syria of a Canadian, who was tortured and held for a year. Harper spoke about Maher Arar, a Canadian of Syrian origin, in a 15-minute telephone call with Bush following a Canadian inquiry's report that cleared Arar of any terror links." He later told reporters that he "indicated to" Bush that Foreign Minister Peter MacKay "would be sending a letter today to" Secretary Rice "to launch a formal protest on the treatment of Maher Arar." Harper is further quoted saying Bush "said that he would look at the complaint seriously, and we are expecting a response, an official response, to our complaint as well as assurances that we will not be facing that kind of conduct on the part of US authorities in the future."

Detainees May Have Been Questioned In Germany Before Guantanamo. The Washington Post (10/7, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "The chief plotter of the Sept. 11 hijackings and another al-Qaeda leader who spent time in secret CIA prisons might have been interrogated in Germany before their transfer last month to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to lawyers for other terrorism suspects in U.S. custody." The statements "challenge repeated denials by the German government that it played any part in the U.S. government's secret network to detain and transport terrorism suspects after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. The statements also open the possibility that the CIA held prisoners on a U.S. military base in Germany without the knowledge of the host government in the early days after the attacks." The German and US governments respectively dismissed and denied the report.

Francis Fukuyama Sees Historical Pattern Of Excessive Secrecy. In the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M), scholar Francis Fukuyama reviews US government secrecy during the Cold War and argues, "Then, as now, there was a pronounced tendency to assume the worst, and for the government to claim enormous discretion in protecting the American public. The Bush administration has consistently argued that it needs to be protected from Congressional oversight and media scrutiny. ... But the American government does have a track record in dealing with similar problems in the past, one suggesting that all American institutions — Congress, the courts, the news media — need to do their jobs in scrutinizing official behavior, and not take the easy way out of deferring to the executive."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US And EU Agree To Deal On Airline Passenger Data. The Financial Times (10/7, Laitner) reports, "The FBI and other American anti-terror agencies will have easier access to sensitive personal information on passengers flying from the European Union to the US, under a deal agreed on Friday. Brussels and Washington struck the fresh concord after weeks of negotiations to replace a controversial pact from 2004 through which the US receives up to 34 pieces of data on air travellers. That deal was invalidated by the EU's highest court on a legal technicality and expired last Saturday, prompting fears of transatlantic travel chaos."

The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A3, Echikson, Jolis, 2.03M) reports, "Negotiations collapsed about a week ago when EU negotiators rejected Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's demand to lift restrictions on sharing the passenger data with other U.S. law-enforcement agencies. 'This is positive for the EU -- this will guarantee legal continuity on a very sensitive matter,' said EU Security Commissioner Franco Frattini. Mr. Frattini said Friday's new deal is applicable until the end of July 2007, by which time the two sides will 'agree on a more permanent arrangement.' Mr. Frattini said the EU agreed to allow Homeland Security to share the data with other U.S. agencies with a 'comparable standard of data protection.' This includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation and agencies within the Department of Justice. This will allow the U.S. to 'make full use of passenger data,' Mr. Chertoff said in a statement Friday."

The Washington Post (10/7, A12, Moore, Nakashima, 748K) reports, "Under the new system, 'if we have particular interest in a number of flights, or a specific destination, then we can therefore use that information and share it with other counterterrorism agencies,' said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, which includes the customs and border agency. The data request must have some 'specificity,' he said, such as the recent alleged plot to bomb airliners flying from London."

The Washington Times (10/7, Hudson, 88K) reports Graham Watson, leader of the Alliance of Liberals and Democrats in the European Parliament, "called the agreement the 'least-worst option' and said the Bush administration 'is determined to extract ever more personal data and share it with the wider intelligence community.'"

Watch List Is Rife With Errors. The New York Times/AP (10/7) reports, "Thousands of people have been mistakenly linked to names on terrorist watch lists when they crossed the border, boarded commercial airliners or were stopped for traffic violations, a government report said Friday. ... When '60 Minutes' spoke with 12 people named Robert Johnson, it reported, all said that they are detained almost every time they fly."

Anthrax Suspects Still Burdened Despite Being Cleared. The Washington Post (10/7, A3, Powell, 748K) reports, "On Nov. 15, 2001, Irshad and Masood Shaikh found themselves standing under the darkest cloud imaginable: The brothers had become suspects in the worst bioterrorism attack in American history. An FBI SWAT team battered down their front door, pointed semiautomatic rifles at Irshad's wife and carried out the first raid on a private home in the federal investigation of the anthrax attacks. … But the FBI had acted on a bad tip. By every account available, agents found no evidence implicating the brothers, who are widely respected public health experts. Since then, the Shaikhs have suffered consequences great and small. Irshad Shaikh, 44, who is Chester's health commissioner and has worked on humanitarian missions in Iraq and Afghanistan with U.S. officials, has been blocked by the FBI from obtaining a federal contract with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Immigration officials canceled his scheduled interview for U.S. citizenship. And whenever Irshad returns to the United States from abroad, federal agents escort him off the airplane and interrogate him for hours."

Security Barriers Removed From Manhattan Sites. The New York Times (10/7, Buckley, 1.21M) reports, "They started appearing on Manhattan streets immediately after September 11: concrete and metal barriers in front of skyscrapers, offices and museums. … But now, five years later, their numbers have begun to dwindle. After evaluations by the New York Police Department, the city's Department of Transportation has demanded that many of the planters and concrete traffic medians known as jersey barriers be taken away. So far, barriers have been removed at 30 buildings out of an estimated 50 to 70 in the city."

Bush Signing Statement Objects To FEMA Director Criteria. The Washington Post (10/7, A2, Hsu, 748K) reports President Bush "reserved the right to ignore key changes in Congress's overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency -- including a requirement to appoint someone with experience handling disasters as the agency's head -- in setting aside dozens of provisions contained in a major homeland security spending bill this week." According to the Post, "The standards for the FEMA director were inspired by criticism of former FEMA chief Michael D. Brown's performance after Hurricane Katrina last year. Brown, a lawyer and judge of Arabian horses, had no experience in disaster response before joining FEMA." White House spokesman Tony Fratto "said the actions, first reported by the Associated Press, upheld the president's right to choose his advisers and control executive branch activities." However, a spokesman for Rep. Tom Davis "said the White House is slighting Congress and ignoring the political toll of Brown's incompetence and ties to GOP cronies." Bush "also claimed the right to edit or withhold reports to Congress by a watchdog agency within the Department of Homeland Security that is responsible for protecting Americans' personal privacy."

New Orleans Experiences Extreme Population Decrease. The New York Times (10/7, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports that The City of New Orleans "population has dropped by nearly 60 percent since Hurricane Katrina, far more sharply than recent optimistic estimates had suggested, according to an authoritative post-storm survey released this week." According to the survey "The population of New Orleans is now only 187,525, well under half the pre-storm population of 454,863." In addition, "Mayor C. Ray Nagin has suggested that about half of New Orleans's former residents had returned, basing his projections partly on utility users. But the new numbers indicate that repopulation will take awhile to reach that level." However, "officials expect these population figures to go up, eventually. More than 11,000 people from New Orleans have applied for federal rebuilding aid through the state's Road Home program. Some 80,000 housing units were destroyed in Orleans Parish alone, and their reconstruction has hardly begun."

WAR NEWS:

Warner Warning On Iraq Seen As Signal US Considering Policy Shift. All three network news programs highlighted Sen. John Warner's warning that increased violence in Iraq may signal the need for a change in US policy. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 2, 3:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Nobody's calling it an exit strategy, but there's a growing consensus that US war plans in Iraq have got to change." After returning from Iraq Sen. John Warner "said the US is close to losing the battle in Baghdad." He "warned however, if the violence is not brought under control in the next 90 days, the US has to rethink its strategy." Sen. Warner: "I think it's a responsibility of our government internally to determine, is there a change of course that we should take and I wouldn't take off the table any option at this time." Miklaszewski: "Warner's statement came the same day Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in Baghdad, warning Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he must accelerate efforts to disarm militias and end the sectarian violence. Leading Democrats claim it's all part of a grand strategy by the Bush administration to begin to change the US course in Iraq. The administration has rejected calls for a timetable for withdrawal of American troops, but Democratic senator Carl Levin tells NBC news both President Bush and the U.S. Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told him lawmakers should publicly pressure the Iraqis, with the warning if they don't reduce the violence, the US would start pulling out its troops." Sen. Carl Levin: "It's not enough for them to hear it from me and hopefully Senator Warner. It's the administration that's got to deliver the message."

ABC World News (10/6, story 3, 2:25, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "It's not just Senator Warner. There are urgent discussions among prominent allies of the Bush administration, about the need to consider changing course in Iraq. One prominent Republican who advises the Pentagon told me today, 'if we don't make real significant changes, this will all collapse.' Among the options on the table -- a more aggressive approach, to defeat the insurgency and protect civilians, putting more American troops on the streets and more money into improving the quality of life in Iraq." Another option would be "a totally different approach -- phased withdrawal. The thinking, if US troops move out, the Iraqis will be forced to find their own solution to the ethnic hatred tearing their country apart. Don't look for the White House to embrace this option." President Bush: "We're not leaving, so long as I'm the President. That would be a huge mistake."

In a shorter story CBS Evening News (10/6, story 3, 1:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) quoted Sen. Warner saying, "It seems to me that the situation is simply drifting sidewise." Axelrod: "I ran the 'drifting sidewise' comment by a White House official and he says considering the way things are going lately, he hardly considers than to be deep criticism."

The New York Times (10/7, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports, "The White House, caught off guard by a leading Republican senator who said the situation in Iraq was 'drifting sideways,' responded cautiously on Friday, with a spokeswoman for President Bush stopping short of saying outright that Mr. Bush disagreed with the assessment. ... Ms. Perino's carefully worded response underscores the delicate situation that Mr. Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has created for the White House just one month before an election." The senator's "comments are...forcing Republicans to confront the issue before some are ready." GOP Senator Susan Collins "said the current approach, which she attributed to Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, had not led to an overall reduction in violence or any prospect that American troop levels would come down soon." The Washington Times/UPI (10/6) reports Warner's "grim outlook" in a 4-sentence article.

In Arbil, Rice Sought To Solidify Kurdish Ties To Baghdad. In continuing reporting of Secretary Rice's visit to Iraq, AFP (10/7, Lanteaume) notes Rice "met the leaders of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, urging them to cooperate with Iraqi Arabs in building a peaceful and unified country." She "dropped in on Kurdish regional president Massud Barzani in Arbil, his northern capital, after an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital Baghdad, which is in the grip of a brutal sectarian conflict." AFP says Kurds remain "grateful for US support in throwing off the yoke of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein," and have therefore "put their long-cherished dreams of independence on hold while the Baghdad government struggles to rebuild the war torn country." Rice "tried to calm the oil row during her visit" by asking for renewed cooperation and sharing of oil profits.

The AP (10/7, Gearan) says Rice is "convinced oil revenue is the long-term key to economic independence for a unified Iraq," and notes she "appealed Friday for cooperation from the autonomous and oil rich Kurdish north." Appearing before US and Kurdish flags, Rice "thanked Barzani for the Kurds' long cooperation with the United States, adding, 'and I appreciate also your important participation in the process of national reconciliation. Thank you.'"

Separate AP (10/7, Barzanji) reporting focuses directly on Kurdish separatist politics. "With violence bloodying Iraq, Kurds in the peaceful north have been showing signs of going their own way, raising their own flag and even hinting they could secede in a dispute over oil wealth -- moves that have alarmed Shiites and Sunnis." Secretary Rice's "visit to Kurdistan on Friday underlined American worries that Kurds may be pushing too hard too soon for autonomy powers at a time of increasing sectarian tensions." The AP says, in all regions of Iraq, "even mere talk of federalism -- amid a wave of Shiite-Sunni violence that has killed thousands this year -- has raised fears of the country falling apart."

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Richter, Daragahi, 918K) adds Rice "urged restless Iraqi Kurds to seek their future in a closer alliance with other Iraqis, as she visited the country's relatively peaceful Kurdistan region Friday for talks with" Barzani. She "declared that Iraq's minority Kurds, who suffered greatly under the rule of Saddam Hussein, can find their best security guarantee not from their powerful ally, the Americans, but from the Iraqi Constitution." Barzani "spoke publicly in terms likely to please Rice, saying Kurds are committed to working within the federal system and will share oil revenue from wells discovered in their region." The Times notes, "Despite the apparent harmony, U.S. officials are concerned by issues now swirling in Kurdistan, the least violent and most pro-American part of Iraq."

Rumsfeld Sees Progress In Afghanistan. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/7, A23, 748K), Defense

DOJ_NMG_0078378

Secretary Rumsfeld acknowledges, "There is, for example, the legitimate worry that increased poppy production could be a destabilizing factor. And rising violence in southern Afghanistan is real." However, he points to progress in security, the economy, education, health care, and infrastructure. He concludes, "In Afghanistan, the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one."

The AP (10/7) summarizes the commentary, observing critically, "Rumsfeld touched on only a few of the setbacks, including a surge in the drug production that the Taliban had almost wiped out five years earlier. But the defense secretary glossed over other dangers: The Taliban has taken control large parts of the countryside, more than 3,000 people have been killed in rising violence this year ..."

Taliban Is Resurgent In Southern Afghanistan. The Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (10/7, Krane) reports, "The kind of anonymous insurgent violence that is convulsing Iraq has migrated 1,500 miles east to plague Afghanistan five years after the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban regime. The prospect of a second downward spiral -- though so far Afghanistan isn't nearly as violent as Iraq -- has experts worried that Western militaries don't have an effective strategy for these irregular wars." The AP quotes concerned soldiers, Bruce Hoffman of Georgetown University, and alleged Taliban spokesman Qari Mohammed Yusuf Ahmadi.

Iraqi Police Have Lost 4,000 Men In Two Years.

The New York Times (10/7, O'Neil, 1.21M) reports, "About 4,000 Iraqi policemen have been killed and more than 8,000 have been wounded in the last two years, the American general in charge of training the country's police forces said yesterday." Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson "said the figures covered casualties from September 2004 to the present." The numbers "appear to show a rising casualty rate among the Iraqi police, who have replaced American troops as the prime focus of insurgent attacks for much of this year." Peterson "emphasized the 'tremendous progress' made since American forces designated 2006 as the 'year of the police.' He cited Anbar Province, the restive western region long dominated by Sunni insurgents, as one example. 'We've cleared out the Euphrates River valley and are starting to see police forces grow and take hold and perform their responsibilities admirably,' he said."

The AP (10/7, Keath) reports that Peterson "said the force's performance was improving and officials are working to weed out militiamen." The AP adds, "Beefing up Iraq's security forces is a cornerstone of efforts to stop the violence that has torn the country since the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003. Police have been a prime target for attacks by Sunni insurgents. Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led police of helping fuel sectarian violence that has killed thousands this year."

The Washington Post (10/7, Tyson, 748K) reports that Peterson "said continued efforts will be needed in 2007 to improve the quality of the force, provide training in leadership and basic policing skills, and weed out militia members -- some of whom are known to have carried out sectarian executions." The Post adds, "This week, Iraq's Interior Ministry had to remove a brigade of hundreds of Iraqi police from duty in Baghdad after it participated in sectarian violence, including one battalion that raided a meat-processing factory and kidnapped more than 20 Sunni workers, seven of whom were later found executed. That brigade, as well as other Iraqi police units now being inspected, will undergo three weeks of 'police transformational training' to improve policing skills."

NBC Nightly News reported on the suspicion of militia infiltration of police. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 3, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There have been these suspicions that Shi'ite death squads and at least some of the Iraqi police force may be one and the same. Today Richard Engel went out on a patrol with the top flight US Army Stryker Brigade in Baghdad and found that many of those Americans putting their lives on the line there each day often don't know who to trust or even why they are still there." NBC (Engel) added, "The US Calvary's Crazy Horse, 3rd platoon, ventures out into southern Baghdad, where the enemy is invisible, Iraqi allies untrustworthy and where American troops increasingly ask themselves -- is this their fight anymore? And who is the enemy?" Sergeant Mike Schmieder: "It's not clear now who we're always fighting. If they're terrorists, if they're criminals or they're religious radicals." Engel: "After the mission, the soldiers tell us their morale remains high, but insist Iraqis need to do more." Unidentified male soldier: "It's time for them to take the reins and take responsibility for their country." Engel: "Until then, it's US troops in the middle of the war, mediating, fighting and dying."

US Troops Are Caught "In the Middle" Of Many Small Iraqi Wars.

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Moore, Roug, 918K) reports in a pessimistic front page article, "In all, at least 57 people died and 17 were injured in the violence that day, Sept. 18. They were all killed in the same country, but not in the same war. The fighting in Iraq is not a single conflict, but an overlapping set of conflicts, fought on multiple battlegrounds, with different combatants. Increasingly, American troops are caught between the competing forces." Many American officials fear "the original U.S. counterinsurgency mission has become something else -- an operation aimed at quelling civil war, which is a much more ambiguous and politically fraught objective. American troops find themselves in the crossfire, caught among foreign militants, Sunni Muslim nationalist rebels, Shiite Muslim militiamen and other armed groups -- all fighting each other."

Multiple Deployments Seen As Stretching Resources. The Atlanta Journal Constitution (10/7, Martz) reports on the 3rd ID's 1st Brigade Combat Team, which is "preparing for a third tour in Iraq, this time facing nearly out-of-control sectarian violence." The Journal Constitution adds, "Dozens of soldiers in the brigade -- unit officials say they don't have an official count…will be making their third combat tour in Iraq in less than four years. The multiple deployments and rapid turnaround are evidence that the service is stretched so thin it may have to request broader access to National Guard units to meet demands being made on it ... The short turnaround time for the brigade has resulted in a training pace so accelerated that the two weeks it would have normally spent at one of the Army's major training facilities at Fort Irwin, Calif., or Fort Polk, La., before going to Iraq were instead spent here."

Medic Testifies That Marines Shot Iraqi Civilian. ABC and CBS covered the trial of corpsman Melson J. Bacos in brief stories. ABC World News (10/6, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, " Seven Marines charged with kidnapping and murdering an innocent Iraqi civilian. In California, a Navy medic by the name of Melson Bacos told a military judge that the Marines he was on Patrol with, dragged the man from his home and shoot him ten times in the chest and head. He testified on a guilty plea agreement."

CBS Evening News (10/6, story 6, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A court-martial at Camp Pendleton, California, a Navy medic admits he had a role in the kidnap and murder of an Iraqi civilian. He avoided murder charges by testifying he saw two Marines carry out the execution-style killing last April in Hamdania. A total of seven Marines still face charges in the case."

The major dailies and wire services also reported the trial. MSNBC (10/6) reports, "A Navy corpsman was sentenced Friday after testifying that Marines in his patrol seized an Iraqi civilian from his home, threw him into a hole and put at least 10 bullets in his head and chest after growing frustrated in their search for an insurgent. Petty Officer Melson Bacos, 21, was sentenced to 10 years in prison, but he will end up serving only a year under a plea deal. Bacos was also dishonorably discharged." The killing "was one in a series in which the conduct of American troops in Iraq have damaged America's image worldwide."

The Washington Post (10/7, Geis, 748K) reports, "Eight members of a Marine squad planned to kill a suspected Iraqi insurgent and developed a cover story before their April raid, but when they could not find their target, they pulled a neighbor from his bed and shot him to death instead, a Navy medic who was part of the group testified Friday."

The New York Times (10/7, Marshall, 1.21M), the AP (10/7, Deutsch), the Washington Times/UPI (10/7), and the Los Angeles Times (10/7, Perry, 918K) also report the story. The Los Angeles Times observes that the Hamdaniya incident "is the first of two high-profile cases of alleged brutality against Iraqis by Marines from Camp Pendleton to come to court-martial. Two dozen Marines are being investigated in a November incident in which 24 Iraqis, including women and children, were killed in the town of Haditha."

Army National Guard Recruiter Has Hard Task. The New York Times (10/7, Elliott, 1.21M) reports on Sgt. Cameron Murad, who works in California and "must persuade native Arabic speakers to enlist and serve with front-line troops." The Times describes the insults he experienced as a soldier and his difficulties in recruiting linguists: "Before his first week was up, he felt like an outcast. Stacks of fliers and business cards that he had left in grocery stores had vanished. Cashiers who welcomed him on his first visits were suddenly too busy to talk. ... From late 2002 to May 2006, 172 civilian contract linguists were killed in Afghanistan and Iraq, representing 2.6 percent of the roughly 6,500 linguists who worked for United States coalition forces, a Department of Defense official said. None of the 152 interpreters who have served in Iraq for the 09-Lima program have been killed. But that fact carries little weight in El Cajon, where memories of violence linger."

Nicholson Touts Polytrauma Centers, Says Funding Is Sufficient. In an interview VA Secretary James Nicholson said on FNC's Dayside (10/6, 1:06 p.m.) that "600,000 veterans now have returned from the combat zone and I write a letter to each one of them, telling them what they are entitled to for veterans benefits and health care and how to access it." He added, "We have set up 21, we call polytrauma centers distributed around the United States. We aggregated medical disciplines there so they do not have long distances to travel. These are the number one priority of the VA at this time. I just had a meeting yesterday in the Oval Office with the President and commander of the American Legion, talking about how well we are taking care of these people that are now coming home."

When asked about the VA's budget, the Secretary replied, "We are generously funded. In fact, we discussed this yesterday with the President. Spending under President Bush for the VA has gone up 70% since he has become president. We have the resources because it is a priority. There was an incident in '05 that related to the fiscal '05 budget that was drawn based on the '02 real data, before the war started. There was a gap there, but as soon as we went to the Congress and the president, they took care of us. This president is extremely supportive of these troops. It is a number one thing on his mind, and the Congress is supportive as well."

Bikers Honor Fallen Troops. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 9, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Please remember more than 2,700 American soldiers have now died in the war in Iraq but some have only had a handful of people come to say their final farewells. A group of very patriotic Americans who happen to be motorcyclists think that is wrong. They're doing their part now to make sure every fallen soldier gets a proper goodbye." NBC (Taibbi) added, "The funeral of Marine Nick Whyte of Brooklyn -- his family in agony. More than 40 other mourners shared the family's grief. And provided a motorcycle escort for the funeral process. Mourners like veteran Bill Connelly who didn't know Nick Whyte in life, but who, with the family's permission, asked to be here." Bill Connely: "I didn't know the soldier but I'm a Marine and it's my brother who died there today." Taibbi adds, "They are the Patriot Guard Riders, perhaps 40,000 nationwide organized originally to shield grieving families from a fringe church group that was picketing soldiers' funerals to promote the group's extremist views."

Depot Returns Dead Troops' Belongings. In an emotional 1,269-word front page article, the Washington Post (10/7, White, 748K) reports on the Joint Personal Effects Depot in Aberdeen, which processes the belongings of troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan: "Within days of troops' deaths in action, their clothes, pictures and books and everything else that defined their lives on the battlefield wind up here. It is then the job of 138 people to inventory, photograph, clean and pack all of the items so they can be sent home to grieving families, the last remnants of the ones they loved. There are ghosts here, whispers of these people who sacrificed their lives to serve their country." Several workers are quoted describing the emotional impact of the work.

Potter Sworn In As New Northern WV US Attorney. The Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer (10/7) reports, "Sharon Potter was sworn in Friday as the new U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia, but a formal ceremony will be held at a later date, according to information provided by Potter's office." The Intelligencer continues, "Potter succeeds Thomas Johnston, who was sworn in as U.S. District Judge for the Southern District of West Virginia in April." The Intelligencer adds, "Potter was sworn in by U.S District Judge Irene M. Keeley in Clarksburg. … Potter has served as assistant U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia since September 1992, according to information provided by Potter's office. … Assigned to the U.S. Attorney's office in Wheeling, Potter has handled a variety of criminal prosecutions ranging from fraud and tax evasion to drug trafficking and computer-related crime. … Potter has also been involved in criminal and civil property forfeiture cases, generating resources for state and local law enforcement agencies. She has also obtained funds for victims of fraud through restitution in a variety of cases."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Farmer Mac Attempts To Restate Company Results Form Past Three Years. The Washington Post/Bloom (10/7, D1) reports that "Farmer Mac, the government-chartered buyer of US farm loans, said it would restate its financial results for 2003, 2004 and 2005 to correct how it accounted for some derivatives transactions." The Washington Post reports that the changes will not change the profits of the company significantly. Farmer Mac "reported combined profit of $87.3 million for 2003, 2004 and 2005."

Judge Dismisses Suit Over MySpace Sale. Bloomberg (10/7) reports, "News Corp., Rupert Murdoch's media company, said a judge dismissed a lawsuit challenging its purchase of MySpace.com, rejecting claims by Brad Greenspan, former chief executive officer of the Web site's parent, that the deal cheated shareholders." Bloomberg continues, "Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Carolyn Kuhl ruled Friday that the acquisition of Intermix Media Inc., MySpace's parent company, last year was lawful and shareholders were fully informed when they voted on the transaction, New York-based News Corp. said Monday. … The decision lifts a cloud over the popular networking site, which Greenspan says he started in August 2003." Bloomberg adds, "He sued MySpace in February, saying the $580 million paid by News Corp.'s Fox unit didn't reflect the growth prospects. … Thursday, he demanded a federal investigation into the sale, claiming the deal defrauded shareholders of more than $20 billion. … News Corp. and Fox Interactive 'feel vindicated' by the ruling, Mike Angus, general counsel of News Corp.'s Fox Interactive Media, said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ralston Resigns Over Disclosure Of Abramoff Gifts. The Washington Post (10/7, A1, Baker, Grimaldi, 748K), in a front-page story titled, "Rove Aide Linked To Abramoff Resigns: Scandal Claims Its First West Wing Job," reports Susan Ralston, a "top aide to White House strategist Karl Rove resigned yesterday after disclosures that she accepted gifts from and passed information to now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, becoming the first official in the West Wing to lose a job in the influence-peddling scandal." The Post notes, "A congressional report showed last week that Ralston accepted sometimes-pricey tickets to nine sports and entertainment events from Abramoff while she provided him with inside White House information. The bipartisan report said there is no evidence that Rove knew of or approved of Ralston's actions, and sources said yesterday that the White House was surprised by the report's revelations. The White House counsel's office conducted a review of the report, but with Ralston's departure it closed its inquiry yesterday." The Post quotes a "senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity" who said "the counsel's office reached no conclusion about whether Ralston violated gift limits because her resignation made the point moot. But the official said there were 'mitigating circumstances' in her case because she had a preexisting relationship with Abramoff." The Post goes on to report, "As right hand to the president's most important adviser, Ralston was closer to the center of the Bush operation. She was a key organizer of presidential events, coordinating with White House political, scheduling, advance and public liaison offices."

The New York Times (10/7, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Administration officials "acknowledged…that she quit as a result of" the Congressional report. White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino is quoted as saying, "A protracted discussion of the report was not in anyone's best interest, and when she chose to step down, we supported her decision." The Times adds that, "For more than a year, Ms. Ralston was entangled in two Washington scandals at once. A nexus between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Rove, she was also pivotal in the C.I.A. leak case." Bloomberg (10/7) reports that in her resignation letter, Ralston said "the time has come for me to pursue other opportunities."

Waxman Claims Ralston Is Being Used As "Scapegoat." The AP (10/7, Reichmann) reports Rep. Henry Waxman, the senior Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, "said he suspects the White House is trying to make Ralston a scapegoat. 'There is a lot that we don't yet know about the assistance that Ms. Ralston provided Mr. Abramoff from inside the White House, but there are also many unanswered questions about the assistance that higher-ranking White House officials appeared to provide Mr. Abramoff,' Waxman said. 'The vast majority of lobbying contacts and meals with White House officials documented in the report were with White House officials other than Ms. Ralston,' Waxman said."

Waxman Notes Mehlman's Contacts With Abramoff. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Wallsten, 918K) reports Waxman said "the actions of senior aides such as former political director Ken Mehlman deserved more scrutiny. Last week's report included e-mails suggesting that Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, was offered tickets to a rock concert and helped an Indian tribe represented by Abramoff secure $16 million for a jail despite resistance from Justice Department officials. … In an interview Friday, Mehlman said he did not recall any specifics from his dealings with the Abramoff team. 'I can tell you that as political director I was always very careful to make sure everything I did was above board and consistent with the rules,' he said."

Libby Hopes To Avoid Trial By Introducing Classified Information. The Washington Post/AP (10/7, A8) reports Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, "intends to load up his criminal trial with information about nine national security matters, the names of foreign leaders and details about various terrorist groups, according to court filings in the Valerie Plame leak case. The papers filed this week hint at what has been taking place behind closed doors as Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald tries to limit the amount of classified data that…Libby is permitted to use at his trial, scheduled for January." U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton "is asking whether classified evidence would overlap with what Libby is likely to say in his testimony. … In court documents, prosecutors argued that it would be 'unnecessarily wasteful of time' to allow Libby to present 'names of foreign leaders or government officials of other countries, or the names and histories of various terrorist groups.' The danger for prosecutors is that the sheer volume and sensitivity of the classified information Libby wants to introduce could scuttle the trial."

Harman Angered Over Pace Of Cunningham Investigation. According to the New York Times (10/7, Johnston, 1.21M) a report on former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham "has remained under wraps for nearly four months, largely because of a battle between the committee's leaders over issuing a subpoena in the matter, members of Congress say." The Intelligence Committee's ranking Democrat Rep. Jane Harman "complained about the delay in a letter sent Thursday to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra. … Harman protested what she said had been Mr. Hoekstra's refusal to subpoena" Cunningham. The committee "hired an outside counsel, Michael Stern, to carry out the Cunningham inquiry. Mr. Stern's specific findings are not known, although some Congressional officials have suggested that his report, which was completed in June, is critical of Mr. Cunningham for using the committee's secrecy to conceal his efforts on behalf of friends to insert spending items into classified bills." Harman "said Mr. Hoekstra wrote her last month saying that he had been in direct contact with Mr. Cunningham — apparently to seek informally his appearance before the committee. 'I am deeply disappointed that you contacted him unilaterally without notifying me,' Ms. Harman wrote.'"

Cunningham's Wife Agrees To Pay Back Taxes. The Washington Post/AP (10/7, A6) reports Cunningham's wife "will pay $1.6 million in back taxes and penalties for her role in the bribery scandal that landed him in prison, according to a settlement filed Friday." The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "In exchange for her acceptance of responsibility in the case and continuing cooperation with an ongoing federal investigation, authorities say they have not filed criminal charges against Nancy Cunningham."

Former Shelby Aide Used Tech Firm To Garner Government Contracts. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A1, Mullins, 2.03M) profiles lobbyist Stewart Hall, who previously worked for Sen. Richard Shelby, "a fellow Alabaman. … After working for nearly five years on Capitol Hill, he left government and became a lobbyist. Then, a few years ago, Mr. Hall went one better than the other former aides who prowl the halls of Congress on behalf of government-contracting clients. Mr. Hall, 40 years old, set out to become the client himself. All he needed was a company." Hall "decided to create a government contractor nearly from scratch. He assembled a group of investors, many of them fellow lobbyists. Together they bought a 25% stake in Huntsville, Ala.-based Digital Fusion Inc., a small technology-consulting company on the verge of bankruptcy. It did little business with the government, so Mr. Hall set out to beef up its defense-contracting business. Today, it mainly helps government agencies use computer technology for tasks ranging from budget analysis to missile engineering." Digital Fusion "became the No. 2 financial supporter of the political action committee of Sen. Shelby."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Cites New Jersey Park For ADA Violations. The Asbury Park (NJ) Press (10/7, Cullinane) reports, "By locking the front door of the Visitor Center in Thompson Park on weekends but leaving the back door open for restroom access, the Monmouth County Park System is likely violating federal law, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said Tuesday. … That's because the back door of the Middletown park building is at the top of an eight-step stairway, making the restrooms inaccessible to some people with disabilities, especially those in wheelchairs." The Press continues, "The park system cannot open the facility on weekends — the busiest visiting days in summer — 'yet close the only accessible entrance to it' without violating standards of the federal Americans with Disabilities Act, said Eric Holland of the U.S. Department of Justice. His is the agency that enforces the regulations of the disability act. … Holland said that in order to comply with the law, the Park System must provide an entrance accessible to all visitors if it opens the building at all." The Press adds, "Laura Kirkpatrick, the parks' public information officer, said there are no plans to open the front entrance on weekends. … 'There are restroom facilities at the Craft Center (in the park) that are handicapped-accessible,' Kirkpatrick said of another park building at the park's western end. … However, there is no sign at the Visitor Center advising people about the other location. And there are no paved public roads connecting the two buildings. Visitors would need to drive outside the park and re-enter at a different entrance on Newman Springs Road."

DOJ Eyes Bias Probe Of Florida Sheriff's Office. The Daytona Beach (FL) News-Journal (10/7, Woodard) reports, "The Flagler County (FL) Sheriff's Office could face an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice after a federal commission found 'reasonable cause to believe' the office discriminated against an employee who was fired in May." The News-Journal continues, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said it found "reasonable cause to believe" the Sheriff's Office discriminated against former victim's advocate Vicky Peppin because of her Cuban background, according to a letter dated Aug. 31 from Federico Costales, director of the commission's Miami District. … In addition, the commission determined 'that there was reasonable cause to believe' the Sheriff's Office retaliated against Peppin after she filed her complaint with the EEOC in November 2005, Costales said in a separate letter dated Aug. 31. … In a telephone interview Wednesday, Peppin said she felt compelled to file the complaint to fend off allegations of a poor work performance and to combat the harassment and discrimination she faced." The News-Journal notes, "The EEOC's ruling is the latest controversy involving the Sheriff's Office. The agency is still under a shroud of scandal following the May indictments of six deputies and the former jail director following investigations of inmate abuse. One of those investigations involved State Attorney John Tanner's daughter Lisa being strapped into a restraint chair at the jail. Two deputies were charged with abuse in that incident."

DOJ Clears St Landry Parish Elections. The Baton Rouge Advocate (10/7, Burgess) reports, "Federal observers found no irregularities in recent elections in St. Landry Parish, federal and state officials said Friday. … But a losing candidate in the town of Washington's mayoral race said he plans to file a legal challenge alleging widespread voter registration fraud." The Advocate continues, "A team of observers with the U.S. Department of Justice kept watch on last Saturday's elections in St. Landry Parish after complaints of possible racial intimidation of voters, particularly in the sheriff's race. … 'They gave us a clean bill of health,' said St. Landry Parish Clerk of Court Charles Jagneaux." The Advocate adds, "Justice Department observers are expected to return to the parish for the Nov. 7 election, which includes a runoff in the sheriff's race between Laura Balthazar and Bobby Guidroz and the general election for U.S. Representative in the 7th Congressional District. … U.S. Atorney Donald Washington said the concern over voter intimidation arose during a routine pre-election meeting between state election officials and Justice Department. … Though federal observers noted no complaints on election day, Washington mayoral candidate Anthony James Soileau said he plans to file a lawsuit Monday to challenge the qualifications of at least 40 voters."

Brownback Puts Hold On Federal Judge Nomination Over Same Sex Ceremony. The AP (10/7, Hananel, Thomas) reports that "a judge's elevation to the federal bench could be derailed because she helped preside over a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple four years ago." Sen. Sam Brownback "has placed a hold on the nomination of Michigan Court of Appeals Judge Janet T. Neff, saying her presence at the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony raises questions about her judicial philosophy." According to Senator Borwnback, "It seems to speak about her view of judicial activism."

ANTITRUST:

Wall Street Likes AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/7, Leith) reports, "Federal regulators are still weighing their approval of AT&T's deal to acquire BellSouth. But the buyout, as it draws close, has earned the blessing of Wall Street." The AJC continues, "Slowly but surely, shares of AT&T and BellSouth have climbed since the companies announced their deal March 5. As a result, the value of the transaction has spiked by about $10 billion, to a total of about $99 billion at the moment. AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is easily the most expensive acquisition involving a Georgia company — ever." The AJC adds, "The jump is particularly noteworthy in Georgia, home to a high concentration of BellSouth shareholders — about 50,000 of them. After the deal closes, those shareholders will get AT&T stock, which has traded upward in tandem with BellSouth. … The spike in share prices means the value of the deal has jumped, given that AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is an all-stock transaction. At current prices, the deal is valued at about $77 billion in stock and $22 billion in BellSouth debt." The AJC notes, "Before the deal can close, AT&T needs approval from the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission. … The DOJ could announce a decision at any time; the FCC is scheduled to vote on the issue Thursday, although meeting times have been known to change."

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Administrator Criticized For Failing To Tighten Soot Regulation. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Wilson, 918K) reports, "As many as 24,000 lives — a large number of them Californians' — could have been saved each year if the head of the Environmental Protection Agency had tightened soot standards by one microgram per cubic meter annually, according to an analysis released Friday. The cost-benefit analysis also shows that although the tab for power plants, refineries, auto manufacturers and other industry for such a change would be about $1.9 billion a year — or about $15 per household — the savings in healthcare costs, work and school attendance and other benefits would be between $4.3 billion and $51 billion." EPA administrator Stephen Johnson "has been harshly criticized by medical groups, environmentalists and his own science advisors for his Sept. 21 decision to retain a standard allowing annual exposure of 15 micrograms per cubic meter, rather than tightening it to 14 micrograms or fewer." An analysis "released Friday shows that every member of a 12-member panel of scientists convened at the request of the White House Office of Management and Budget and National Academy of Sciences found that thousands of additional lives could be saved if the tougher annual standard were adopted."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

56 Indicted For Drug, Money-Laundering Charges. The Washington Times (10/7, Seper, 88K) reports that "Federal authorities yesterday announced the indictment of 56 persons on drug-smuggling and money-laundering charges, 27 of whom were arrested for their purported links to international drug cartels." According to ICE spokesman Dean Boyd "simultaneous arrests took place in several countries. Numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts were seized, along with $3.1 million cash, about 4,000 pounds of cocaine and six boats." He also said "Federal agents were able to infiltrate money-laundering and drug-trafficking organizations, identifying the source of the drugs, the foreign and domestic drug transporters, a distributor and money launderers. As a result of the simultaneous arrests, he said, federal agents dismantled several drug-trafficking and money-laundering organizations."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass Guest Worker Program. The AP (10/7, Riechmann) reports President

DOJ_NMG_0078384

Bush "shoehorned a plug for his guest worker program between making a joke about an award winner and listening to love songs Friday at a White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month. Bush said that as lawmakers debate immigration policy, they need to remember that while enforcing U.S. borders is important, it is only one step in the struggle to stop illegal immigration. He pressed Congress to pass his guest worker program to legally bring in new foreign workers and give some of the country's illegal immigrants a shot at U.S. citizenship. 'We must understand that you can't kick 12 million people out of your country — that we must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship,' Bush said.

Bush's Use Of "Earn Citizenship" Phrasing Noted. The Washington Times (10/7, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "said immigration reform requires granting citizenship to current illegal aliens." Bush "praised U.S. troops who are Hispanic, noting that more than 200,000 are in uniform now. He also urged that the immigration debate not turn nasty. 'We are a land of immigrants, and as we debate immigration policy, we must always keep that important fact in mind,' Mr. Bush said." The Times notes that yesterday was "the first time the president has used the phrase 'earn citizenship,' a description popular among groups that lobby for granting rights to illegal aliens. But many critics, including Republican leaders, equate that concept with amnesty."

Hunter Says Border Fence Must Be Built. The Washington Times (10/7, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "will soon sign a bill authorizing 700 miles of fence to be built along the U.S.-Mexico border. … The fence is already stirring the political pot, even before construction begins. Mexican officials sent a diplomatic protest to the Bush administration this week and have said they doubt the fence will ever be built. A report in The Washington Post yesterday seemed to concur, stating that the wording of the fence and spending measures gives the Bush administration so much leeway that it is unlikely the 700 miles will be completed. But Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, who wrote the fence provisions that passed last year as part of the House's enforcement-only bill, said yesterday that building the fence is not optional. He held a press conference yesterday on the U.S.-Mexico border to address the report and said the language in the bill means the administration 'shall' build it."

Columbia Students Disrupt Appearance By Minuteman Official. The New York Times (10/7, Arenson, Cave, 1.21M) reports that "protesters stormed a Columbia University stage on Wednesday evening, shutting down a speech by the head of a fiercely anti-immigration group," the Minuteman Project's Jim Gilchrist. The Times notes, "Yesterday Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg chastised Columbia for the disruption."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tax Revenues Fuel Drop In Budget Deficit To $250 Billion. The AP (10/7, Taylor) reports, "The federal budget deficit estimate for the fiscal year just completed has dropped to $250 billion…as the economy continued to fuel impressive tax revenues." The CBO's "latest estimate is $10 billion below CBO predictions issued in August and well below a July White House prediction of $296 billion." It would be the lowest deficit "since the $158 billion figure in 2002" and "when measured against the size of the economy, which is the comparison economists think is most important, the deficit picture looks even better." The AP notes, "At 1.9 percent of gross domestic product, the 2006 deficit registers far below those seen in the 1980s and early 1990s. The modern record of 6 percent of GDP came in 1983 and deficits greater than 4 percent in 1991 and 1992 drove Congress to embark on a 1993 deficit-cutting drive." Yet, "the long-term deficit picture remains bleak due to the looming retirement of the Baby Boom generation, which threatens to swamp Social Security and the Medicare health care program for the elderly."

The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A2, Wessel, 2.03M) in an article titled "Budget Deficit Progress Will Be Tough To Sustain" reports the decreasing deficit "will allow President Bush to boast that he has met his goal of halving the deficit, measured as a share of the gross domestic product, ahead of schedule. 'The president's goal of cutting the deficit in half by 2009, which drew the scoffs of many, is now likely to be reached before that date,' Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, told the Senate Budget Committee the other day, a preview of what's to come next week. There's even talk that the president will set a new headline-grabbing goal: balancing the federal budget by the end of the decade." But "the smart money says the deficit is very likely to get deeper from here."

FDA Reportedly Hampered By Budget Concerns. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Alonso-Zaldivar, 918K) reported, "When scientific advisors urged" the FDA "to put a strong warning about suspected cardiovascular risks on attention-deficit drugs…agency officials said more clinical evidence was needed. Now, the FDA-funded study meant to authoritatively answer questions about the drugs…may be halted in midstream. The reason: The agency doesn't have the money to finish it. … It is one symptom of a federal agency increasingly constrained by a budget that has failed to keep up with costs. This crunch is even more dire in the food division, which tries to keep tainted foodstuffs from supermarket shelves." The Times notes, "Recently, three former secretaries of Health and Human Services sounded a public alarm about what they saw as a dangerous squeeze on the overall FDA budget." Tommy G. Thompson, Donna Shalala and Louis W. Sullivan "joined consumer and industry groups in calling on the administration to substantially boost — perhaps double — the agency's $1.5-billion annual budget, which has increased only modestly in recent years."

President Bush Will Speak At Father's Namesake Carrier's Christening. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/7, Glass) reports, "Today's christening of the aircraft carrier George H.W. Bush may be wet and windy, but workers building the $6 billion warship say they'll be shining. ... President Bush will give the keynote address in honor of his father, the carrier's namesake and the nation's 41st president, who will be present."

Baker Refrains From Criticizing Bush In New Book. In the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) author Jacob Heilbrunn reviews, "Work Hard, Study…And Keep Out Of Politics!" by James A. Baker III with Steve Fiffer. Heilbrunn writes, "One of George W. Bush's most remarkable accomplishments has been to burnish the reputations of his Republican predecessors. The longer Bush is in office, the better they look by comparison. … It would hardly be surprising if James A. Baker III felt a certain measure of vindication about this unexpected turn of events. Though the ruthlessly efficient Baker preserved -- or, if you prefer, secured -- Bush's victory in Florida during the contentious 2000 presidential election, he has always been condemned by the right as a moderate. Like many officials from the first Bush administration, including the former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft, Baker was exiled to the sidelines as the younger Bush embraced the right. Unlike Scowcroft, however, Baker has maintained a studied silence about the current Bush administration."

NYT Accuses Bush Of Pursuing "Vendetta" Against Unions. The New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) editorializes that "the National Labor Relations Board recently expanded the pool of workers exempted from union membership. Specifically, the labor board found that registered nurses who assigned others to some shifts or tasks were supervisors, and thus not eligible to join unions. It was a bad decision." According to the Times, "this is one more step curbing the power of organized labor since President Bush came to office. The administration's philosophical vendetta against unions has come at a time when their power is already on the wane. Membership has fallen to 7.8 percent of the private work force in this country, from over a third in the 1950's. Far from balancing the scales, the anti-union drive comes when workers are already at a historic low in bargaining strength. Despite a growing economy and rising productivity, hourly wages adjusted for inflation have declined 2 percent since 2003. Corporate profits, meanwhile, are at their highest share of gross domestic product since the 1960's."

WSJ Urges Kennedy To Rule On Merits. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A6, 2.03M) writes in an editorial that "the Roberts Court started its second term this week, but to read the coverage you might think that the nine-member Supreme Court has been reduced to Justice Anthony Kennedy's single vote." And "it's unlikely we've seen the last one-man majority from Justice Kennedy. This possibility is not lost on the political left, which explains the current publicity given to Justice Kennedy's role. The hope seems to be that Justice Kennedy can be conditioned with carrots and sticks to make him the next Blackmun or Souter -- earning praise for his 'moderation' if he votes with the liberal wing, but earning obloquy if he tacks right." But "what is clear is that Justice Kennedy enjoys being in the position of he who decides. It seems this term will offer him ample scope to play Solomon. The problem with this 'swing-vote' theory is that it trivializes the Court into a results-based political body when there are real judicial disputes to settle. The Court would be best helped if Justice Kennedy pointed it toward clarity rather than judicial confusion."

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Touts Jobs Figures As Sign Of Administration Progress On Economy. Providing the most detailed coverage of President Bush's remarks on the economy Friday, the Washington Post (10/7, A1, Henderson, Baker, 748K) in a generally positive front page article titled "U.S. Job Numbers Remain Strong" reports, "Unemployment went down and paychecks went up last month, the government said yesterday, and it added that job growth for the year ending in March may have been far stronger than previously thought." The news was "greeted warmly by the White House -- and less so by the financial markets." At a FedEx facility Bush touted "the job numbers and the rest of the Republican economic record a month before congressional elections." Bush and "other White House representatives used multiple briefings and statements to highlight yesterday's news." OMB director Rob Portman said, "This economy is strong and growing. … The president's pro-growth policies, including the tax relief, are working."

Focusing on the revised March job figures the Financial Times (10/7, Guha, Pimlott, Mackenzie, Beales) calls the revision "dramatic" and "the biggest in a quarter of a century" which "casts the expansion in a new light, leaving it less 'jobless' than before, though the rate of job creation since the 2001 recession remains low by historic standards." OMB director Portman said, "We now find we created not 5.7m new jobs but 6.6m new jobs since August 2003. … That happens to be about the time when the president's tax relief was fully implemented."

Taking a negative tone, the New York Times (10/7, Porter, 1.21M) in an article titled "Job Growth Was Slack Last Month" reports, "For American workers, the job market is starting to look a lot less inviting. The Labor Department reported yesterday that employment grew by just 51,000 jobs in September, adding slack job growth to the emerging tableau of an economy gradually slowed by higher interest rates, expensive energy and a sputtering housing sector." Toward the end of its article the Times notes, "President Bush pointed to the decline in unemployment as evidence that his economic policies are working, urging Congress to extend his tax cuts beyond their planned expiration at the end of the decade." But "most economists see a slowing economy taking its toll on hiring, with many now predicting that the Fed's next interest rate movement will be down, as it moves next year to try to revive growth."

And the Los Angeles Times (10/7, Hennessy-Fiske, 918K) in an article titled "Sluggish Job Growth Could Affect Elections" reports, "The U.S. economy added a disappointing 51,000 jobs last month, the government said Friday, and although hiring in July and August was revised sharply higher, lackluster employment growth is still expected to dog Republicans in upcoming midterm elections." The economy "has proven to be resilient," yet "President Bush and his party have struggled to capitalize on such gains, analysts and polls say. Even with the Federal Reserve pausing its campaign to raise interest rates, Republicans face voters worried about jobs and the possibility of a recession."

Describing the economic signals as mixed, NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 6, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) said they presented "a bit of a mixed picture. While the US job market grew by only 51,000 jobs across the whole country last month, the previous two months were revised upward and the unemployment rate did tick down a notch to 4.6%."

Similarly, the Wall Street Journal (10/7, A3, Conkey, 2.03M) reports, "Job creation sputtered in September, in a sign that the economy is cooling, but other data suggested that the labor market is still producing enough jobs to boost wages." Economists said the "mixed data "made any interest-rate changes by the Federal Reserve unlikely before year's end. Speaking ahead of congressional elections next month, Bush administration officials said the figures pointed to a healthy economy." The Journal continues, "The decline in the politically prominent unemployment rate, the upward revisions to last year's payrolls and the modest acceleration in wage growth could help the Bush administration's efforts to play up the strengths of the economy heading into next month's congressional elections. 'The labor market to my mind is still very tight,' Edward Lazear, chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, told reporters Friday." He "also highlighted that construction employment has held up despite the continuing decline in home building."

The Washington Times (10/7, Hill, 88K) offers a contrasting view from Peter Morici, a former chief economist at the International Trade Commission, who believes "the picture is decidedly mixed. … Those with more education and skills in professions like health care, finance and information technology have little trouble finding jobs, while those with only a high school education face higher unemployment rates around 6 percent." Morici said, "Had the current economic expansion followed the pattern of past recoveries, 2 million manufacturing jobs would have been regained. … Much of the stress in the jobs market falls in contested congressional districts in western Pennsylvania, New York and the lower Midwest. … This combination of economics and geography explains why Republicans are in danger of losing control of the House of Representatives."

Stocks Down Slightly After Strong Week. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 7, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today here in New York the Dow dropped 16 points [to close at 11,850.21]. NASDAQ was down more than 6 points [to close at 2,299.99].

The New York Times/AP (10/7) reports, "Wall Street ended a record-breaking week quietly yesterday, edging lower after the Labor Department said employers added far fewer jobs than expected last month. The major indexes all scored big gains for the week." Although "the jobs report gave investors further confirmation that the economy was slowing -- employers created just 51,000 new jobs last month, well off the 120,000 Wall Street expected -- the market is now concerned that the economy might be moderating too much. Even the prospect of a rate cut by the Federal Reserve came as little comfort yesterday." Wachovia Securities market analyst Bryan Piskorowski said, "We've had a market that wants to see bad news as good news with respect to the Fed." But "the economy is slowing, the housing market is slowing, and consumer spending is starting to slow."

The Financial Times (10/7John O'Doherty) quotes Aim Investments senior investment officer Fritz Meyer saying, "I think a soft-landing is absolutely what's going to happen. … Sentiment has been increasing that there is more momentum in the economy than we thought, and the inflation statistics continue to look good."

Experts To Monitor GE For Clues On Economy. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A2, Kranhold, 2.03M) reports, "Investors will be watching anxiously Friday when General Electric Co. reports third-quarter financial results. The industrial and financial giant disappointed investors with both its first- and second-quarter results. And the U.S. economy, for which GE has long been considered a bellwether, appears to have cooled in recent months." It's "far-flung operations touch much of the economy, from power turbines and media to aircraft engines, consumer credit and corporate financing. GE's plastics unit sells to the auto industry, and its appliance business is a barometer of housing." The Journal notes, "One critical unit to watch: the energy unit that makes power-plant turbines, which is recovering from a long slump that followed the collapse of Enron Corp. GE told investors this summer that operating profit at the unit would rise 25% to 30% in the second half of the year after falling 6% in the first half of the year."

NYT Columnists Offer Cautionary Prognoses After Dow Record. Floyd Norris in his column in the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) downplays Dow Jones new record last week, writing "The Dow never had the technology representation of some other indexes, which held it back in the old days and holds it up now. Moreover, it is calculated on a price-weighted basis, so that high-priced stocks have larger influences than lower-priced ones." Norris concludes, "Can this continue? The tech stocks kept rising long after some warned they were ridiculously overvalued. But when they fell, they fell far and fast as owners found that no one wanted to buy them. That could happen to some of today's favorites as well."

And Mark Stein in an analysis titled "To Muted Cheers, The Dow Climbs Past A Record" in the New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) writes, "Stocks shattered records. Corporate profits soared. Economists waxed about a so-called Goldilocks economy -- not too hot, not too cold. Sound familiar? That was the siren song of the 1990's economic boom, and there was an eerie echo on Wall Street this week." Dow's rally "was driven not by expectations of rapid economic growth, as it was seven years ago, but by a rapid fall in energy prices caused in part by expectations that global economic growth is slowing."

OPEC To Hold Oil Prices Steady Around $60, But Competition May Drive Price Lower. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, B14, Hutchinson, Cox, Silva, 2.03M) in its EU notebook column reports, "OPEC announced Thursday that it intends to steady the oil price at something like the current level of about $60 a barrel. It may be able to defend this level in the months to come, but over the long haul this effort is doomed." That's because the "cost of producing oil is much less than $60. Even Canadian oil sands, which require expensive and energy-intensive processing, are profitable at something like $50. Eventually, the lure of profits will bring on new supply, damping the price."

Foley Scandal Affects Key GOP House Races. The political turmoil over the investigation of how the GOP handled allegations of Rep. Mark Foley's misbehavior continued to receive significant coverage in major US media outlets, including front page stories in the Washington Post and New York Times. CBS and NBC led their broadcasts with the Foley scandal and its impact on the GOP and altogether the TV news programs devoted four stories totaling 10 minutes to the issue.

CBS Evening News (10/6, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) examined whether the Foley scandal was "reverberating outside the Beltway?" CBS' Borger noted while it was negatively impacting NRCC chairman Tom Reynolds and Rep. Clay Shaw's re-election campaigns, "most Republicans from the very top down are simply trying to get back to their issues." President Bush: "Today we got more good news: National unemployment rate is down to 4.6%." Borger: "Democrats for a change are all speaking the same language, from their House campaign chairman... " DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel: "You cannot change Washington unless you change the people you send to Washington." Borger: "To ads they're running against Republican incumbents." Ad attacking GOP Rep. Mike Sodrel: "You want change in Washington? Then change the people you send." Borger: "This has been a long week for Republicans and in 30 days they're about to discover whether they're in for a long couple of years. It will depend on just how much the Foley mess really matters to the voters."

NBC Nightly News (10/6, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported the Foley scandal may "end up doing heavy damage to the national Republican party. There are dire predictions concerning how this will all play a month from now on election day and how much we've yet to learn." NBC's Reid notes that "the House Republican leadership is rallying around Speaker Dennis Hastert now that he's made clear he has no intention of stepping down. Majority Leader John Boehner whose loyalty was questioned when he said the page issue was Hastert's responsibility now says in a statement, 'he has my full support and I strongly believe he should remain our Speaker.' But while some Republicans show a united front, others, especially in tough races in Democratic states, are running away from Hastert." Tom Kean Jr.: "Speaker Hastert should step down as Speaker. He, after all, is the head of the institution where this happened." Reid adds, "Some Democrats are already running campaign ads." Unidentified male voice: "Did nothing to stop sexual predator Congressman Foley."

Focusing on Rep. Deborah Pryce's re-election campaign in Ohio, CBS Evening News (10/6, story 2, 1:40, Cowan, 7.66M) reported, "At Waldo's hair salon along one of Columbus's main drags, the sentiment is enough already. Are you sick of people talking about it, though?" Salon owner Pati Young: "Yeah, I am. I'm just sick of it. Forget about it." Cowan: "And that's coming from a Democrat. The war and the economy were the issues being talked about by both sides and it seems these issues are still what Midwest voters want to hear. But since last week this is what they've been getting." Democratic candidate Mary Jo Kilroy: "Deborah Pryce is going to come here and tell you even though she's the fourth-ranking Republican, she never knew Mark Foley. She's got no questions for Mr. Hastert, either."

Examining the impact on the open seat race for Minnesota's 6th district, ABC World News (10/6, story 6, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) said "this scandal could be pivotal, when the Democrats need 6 seats to gain the senate and 15 to gain the house." ABC's Reynolds reported Democratic candidate Patty Wetterling "is taking the Capitol Hill page scandal personally. She's been a public advocate for children since her son, Jacob, was abducted 17 years ago and never seen again." Tom Hauser, KSTP-TV political reporter: "No doubt, it's energized the Patty Wetterling campaign." Reynolds: "This is a suburban district nearby Minnesota's twin cities. It's a conservative place and a reliable Republican stronghold. President Bush won 57% of the vote here two years ago. Will the Foley affair shake things up?" Prof. Kathryn Pearson, University of Minnesotta political scientist: "It is something that voters can easily understand as being horrible. And so, voters are talking about this."

Most news stories on the Foley scandal note that Wetterling will make it the subject of the weekly Democratic radio address. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/7, Von Sternberg, 398K) provides the most detail reporting that in her remarks audio taped Friday "that if a 'full and complete investigation' finds that any congressmen covered up the Mark Foley scandal, they should be expelled."

The New York Times (10/7, A1, Nagourney, 1.21M) in a front page article titled "In House Races, More G.O.P. Seats Are Seen At Risk" reports, "At least five more Republican Congressional seats are now in serious contention, analysts said Friday, an unwelcome development for Republicans as they begin to confront a political environment further darkened for them by the Congressional page scandal." The Foley scandal "is undercutting Republican support among elderly voters, suburbanites and women, analysts from both parties said." And "more alarmingly for Republican strategists who have looked to the party's powerful voter turnout operation to save the party this year -- there are signs that the furor is sapping the enthusiasm of a group essential to Republican victories in 2002 and 2004: religious conservatives." White House aides "have watched with frustration as campaign appearances by Mr. Bush, in which he hammers Democrats on national security, receive little coverage, subsumed by the Foley case."

And McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Talev, Black) in an article titled "Polls Show Little National Fallout From Page Scandal" reports the Foley scandal "could have a decisive effect on several key political campaigns across the country and prove crucial to Democratic hopes of gaining control of the House of Representatives in November." Surveys show it "hasn't created a voter backlash against Republicans nationally," yet "in four House districts currently held by Republicans the issue could prove decisive, political analysts said, because of the candidates' connections to Foley or to child protection issues."

Among GOP candidates cited by the New York Times and McClatchy as particularly effected by the Foley scandal are Rep. Tom Reynolds, Rep. John Shimkus in Illinois, Rep. Deborah Pryce in Ohio, Rep. Heather Wilson in New Mexico, Rep. Mike Sodrel in Indiana, Rep. Clay Shaw in Florida, Rep. Don Sherwood in Pennsylvania, Rep. Jon Doolittle and Rep. Michael Pombo in California and Michele Bachmann in Minnesota's open 6th CD.

Democrats Increase Pressure On GOP Over Foley Scandal. The AP (10/7, Taylor) reports, "More Democrats went on the attack Friday with campaign ads linking Republican candidates to the Mark Foley House page scandal while GOP candidates moved to distance themselves from embattled Speaker Dennis Hastert." In addition to Kean's call for Hastert to step down, "additional campaign appearances by Hastert for House GOP candidates got canceled. Hastert has come under heavy attack within his party's rank and file." The AP notes, "The nonstop news cycles for over a week have been filled with details of" the Foley scandal yet "with no significant developments Friday, GOP strategists hoped the party could catch its breath and gain traction on issues like lower gas prices, the peaking stock market and the economy. Great skittishness remained about unforeseen developments in the Foley saga, nevertheless."

The AP (10/7, Hammer) notes Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy launched a radio ad on Christian radio stations attacking Rep. Deborah Pryce for her ties to Foley.

Kean Calls For Hastert To Resign Speakership. New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean's call for Speaker Hastert to resign was noted in virtually all media reports. The New York Times (10/7, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "Breaking ranks with President Bush and his party once again," Kean "called Friday for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert to resign in the aftermath of the Mark Foley scandal." He "has made ethics the central plank in his campaign to unseat the Democratic incumbent, Senator Robert Menendez. And although he has staked out reliably Republican positions on most issues, like Mr. Bush's tax cuts and the war in Iraq, Mr. Kean has also bucked party orthodoxy on occasion."

GOP Seeks To Bolster Support For Hastert. Republicans leaders and candidates were described as wary of supporting Speaker Hastert after he addressed the Foley scandal Friday. The Washington Times (10/7, Hurt, 88K) in an article titled "GOP Leaders Rally To House Speaker's Defense" reports, "Several top Republicans, including President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, have rallied behind Mr. Hastert" recently yet "in a clear indication of the damage the scandal could cause the Republican Party in November, some candidates continue to distance themselves." The Times cites New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean and Kentucky GOP Rep. Ron Lewis and notes that in addition some "candidates who aren't explicitly chiding Mr. Hastert are at least denouncing the Republican Congress for the scandal and casting doubt that an independent investigation can be conducted by the House ethics committee." For example, Michigan GOP Senate candidate Michael Bouchard said, "The investigation must be taken out of the hands of politicians and put into the hands of trained investigators."

Similarly focusing on GOP support for Hastert, the Financial Times (10/7, Luce) reports, "For the time being, top Republicans are rallying behind Dennis Hastert," but "for many social conservatives…the Foley scandal could prove to be the final straw." Two key GOP groups "feel betrayed. Many traditional Republicans have been alienated by the growth in 'K Street' lobby groups over the past decade and the accompanying rise in federal spending." And "social conservatives have grown disillusioned with their party's relative lack of success in pushing forward a moral agenda to restrict abortion, oppose gay marriage and rein back the culture of permissiveness." But GOP "leaders believe there is plenty of time for the scandal to blow over. They also believe that their party's larger campaign war chest and the fact that voters remain concerned about national security could still prove decisive in the build-up to voting."

Assessing the GOP response to Hastert's remarks Friday, the New York Times (10/7, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "House Republicans held their breath on Friday and hoped that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's expression of remorse about the page scandal combined with the start of a House ethics investigation would stabilize his grip on power." One "senior Republican official who would speak about internal party matters only without being named said Mr. Hastert in his remarks had accomplished two goals sought by his colleagues: He had accepted some responsibility and had acknowledged that the response to complaints about the initial e-mail sent to a former teenage page in Louisiana had been inadequate." And "other members of the leadership issued statements backing him, putting aside, at least for now, some of the divisions exposed over the scandal and who was responsible."

Speaker's Top Aide Reportedly Met With Foley About Behavior "Prior To November 2005." The Washington Post (10/7, A1, Weisman, 748K) in a front page story reports that Speaker Dennis Hastert's chief of staff Scott Palmer "confronted then-Rep. Mark Foley about his inappropriate social contact with male pages well before the speaker said aides in his office took any action, a current congressional staff member with personal knowledge of Foley and his behavior with pages said yesterday." The unidentified congressional aide's account supports claims made by former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham. But, "Hastert's office contends that the first confrontation with Foley occurred in November 2005, when Shimkus, the head of the House Page Board, and then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl took Foley aside to discuss what they termed 'over-friendly' e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana boy. Fordham's account not only pushed the matter back at least two years but also indicated that alarms over Foley's behavior had gone well beyond bland e-mails."

Potential Federal Prosecution Of Foley Examined. The National Journal (10/6, Friel) reports, "In March of this year, a federal judge sentenced Dwight Whorley of Richmond, Va., to 20 years in prison after he was found guilty of a variety of child-pornography charges, including receiving 20 obscene Japanese anime cartoons. The case drew attention in child-protection circles because Whorley was the first person convicted under a 2003 federal statute that makes viewing such nonphotographic material a crime." The Journal continues, "Whorley was also convicted of sending and receiving 20 obscene e-mails that described sex involving children. He had broken the federal law that prohibits online viewing of 'any obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, motion-picture film, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of indecent character.' … That federal statute is one of several that could come into play as the FBI's Washington Field Office and the Justice Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section run an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., and his online sexual activities with underage boys. The federal investigators, as well as state and local agents who may be brought into the case, will try to determine what Foley actually did, the jurisdiction in which he did it, the age of the boys involved, and what state or federal laws he might have violated." The Journal adds, "The federal laws potentially in play include an obscenity statute that prohibits the 'transfer of obscene material to minors' and defines a minor as a child age 15 or younger. The youngest alleged recipient of sexually suggestive or sexually explicit messages from Foley was 16. … The statutes that Whorley was convicted of violating are based on the material itself, not on the age of the sender or receiver. Under such laws, juries determine whether community standards were violated and whether the material in question appeals to 'prurient' interests. … Also in play are federal and state 'coercion and enticement' statutes. Federal law prohibits adults from persuading -- or attempting to persuade -- children younger than 18 to engage in illegal sexual activity. Brian Doyle, a former public-affairs officer in the Homeland Security Department, pleaded no contest in Florida last month after being arrested for engaging in online discussions about a sexual rendezvous with a law enforcement agent posing as a 14-year-old girl. … Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales 'takes any allegations of child exploitation extremely seriously. And he has directed those in charge of the inquiry to take all appropriate steps to get to the bottom of this unfortunate situation as soon as possible.'"

Shimkus Could Face Long-Term Ramifications From Foley Scandal. McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Bjerga) reports, "With more than a million dollars to spend and 69 percent of the votes in his last election, Rep. John Shimkus may well survive the Mark Foley scandal at the ballot box." But his "congressional influence could be diminished permanently by the scandal."

Lawyer Defends Page As Victim While Conservative Blogs Allege IMs Were Prank. NBC Nightly News (10/6, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported. "We do know tonight the former page at the center of this story is now cooperating with the FBI." Stephen Jones, Congressional page's attorney: "I think he is a victim. This is an older man that made inappropriate comments, suggestions to him."

The Washington Post (10/7, A7, Williamson, 748K) reports that Jordan Edmund, "a key figure in the Foley page scandal" as a page who exchanged IMs with Foley, "has been targeted by conservative blogs" who "have published reports that the exchanges were a prank and that the teen in the messages…was actually trying to solicit sexually suggestive messages from Foley." But Edmund's lawyer Stephen Jones said, "It was not a prank, not a practical joke, that pages played on a congressman." Jones added ,"I don't think Jordan intended for any of this to become public."

House Republicans Accuse Democrats Of Political Setup. CNN (10/7) on its web site reports, "House Republicans took the offensive Friday, asking Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and other Democrats to testify about whether they engaged in partisan trickery by releasing Foley's messages weeks before the midterm elections." In a letter signed by 10 other Republican congressmen Rep. Jack Kingston "asked them to disclose whether Democrats played a role in publicizing Foley's correspondences." Kingston wrote, "Just as it must be determined whether any Republican members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal Mr. Foley's activities, it must also be determined whether any Democrat members or political operatives were aware of and attempted to conceal these same activities."

Failure To Pass Ethics Reform May Hurt GOP In Election. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A4, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "As House Republicans struggle to contain the fallout from the Mark Foley page scandal, two coming court dates will push long-lingering lobbying misdeeds back into the headlines just before Election Day." Next week Rep. Bob Ney is expected enter guilty pleas in the Abramoff probe and former Abramoff associate David Safavian faces sentencing Oct. 27. In addition to the Foley scandal it provides "'a clothesline' that Democrats can use to drive the scandal issue through the final days of the campaign," according to political observer David Gergen. Congress failed to pass tougher ethics reforms last spring and in private "House leaders said they didn't feel pressed to pass a tougher measure because the issue didn't show up on public polls as a concern to voters, several lawmakers and aides said." Yet, "in the wake of the Foley scandal, that could be changing. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll conducted in the past week found that about half of likely voters said scandal will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote. And by nearly 2-1, the respondents said they trust Democrats more than Republicans to clean up Congress."

Critics Scrutinize House Ethics Panel. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Simon, 918K) reports, "The House Ethics Committee has had little to say as one scandal after another has rocked Capitol Hill since early 2005." Critics of the committee "abound" yet Rep. Howard Berman, "the committee's top Democrat, said in an interview Friday that since he rejoined the panel in the spring, 'there is a lot more going on' within the committee than people realize, but that he couldn't publicly discuss it. And despite the committee's paralysis for much of 2005, Berman said, 'As slow and as torturous as the process appears to be, the fact is if you look at the last 20 years, a number of careers have been ended by virtue of committee actions.'"

Foley Pressed To Release Name Of Abuser By Victims Advocates. The Washington Post (10/7, A6, Cooperman, 748K) reports, "The Roman Catholic diocese of Palm Beach, Fla., and national advocacy groups for victims of sexual abuse called yesterday for former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to give police the name of the clergyman who allegedly abused him as a teenager." Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests director David Clohessy said, "Every day that a molester walks free is a day when he can hurt other kids."

Former Pages Want To See Program Continued. McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Diaz, Montgomery) reports that "for generations of other pages, the experience was a once-in-a-lifetime chance to get a sneak peek at the backstage of history, sometimes before it was made." Many "regard their service as a life-shaping experience. And they're eager to defend the program in a growing scandal evolving around" the Foley scandal.

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Gaouette, Mendoza, 918K) reports, "When Republican representatives hooked up for a conference call this week to discuss the political crisis over former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to former pages, the most heated discussion was not over House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the matter, but over the future of the congressional page program." But "the venerable program is likely to persevere. For senators and representatives, it's a much-cherished perk that they can bestow on the children of constituents. For former pages, who ardently defend the program, it's an inspirational opportunity to see politicians at work in the cloakrooms of power."

WSJ Faults Media For Focusing On Foley At The Expense Of More Serious Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A6, 2.03M) in an editorial writes, "Speaker Hastert should not resign before the election. It would be a disservice to send voters to the polls in five weeks amid tumult over Mark Foley. Those for whom this is a deciding issue should certainly vote on it. Our view is that the country would be better served with a clearer sense of the electorate's sentiment on dealing with the global threat and domestic well-being. Those are fit subjects of a serious national election."

Dorothy Bush Koch Discusses New Book On Bush 41. In an interview with Newsweek's Jessica Bennett (10/7) President Bush's sister Dorothy Bush Koch answers questions about her new book, "My Father, My President," which "takes an inside look at the personal stories, family memories and intimate challenges that remained largely out of the public eye during" Bush 41's "presidential years." Asked what the book will "tell us about your father than we may not have known," Koch replies, "My dad reached the highest pinnacle of his career when he became president, but he also had some low points, such as the death of a daughter. We have a firsthand account of when my dad was shot down on Sept. 2, 1944, which I think is very fascinating. But I hope people will learn how he coped not only with the good times but with the bad times with sort of dignity and grace."

Clinton To Distribute Several Million Dollars To Democratic Party Entities. The New York Times (10/7, Hernandez, 1.21M) reports Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton "is mounting a major push for Democratic Congressional candidates across the nation during the final weeks of the fiercely contested midterm elections, her aides said on Friday." Clinton, "who has been occasionally criticized by liberal bloggers for not using enough of her bulging campaign coffers to help her party, is shipping $1.5 million to two Democratic Congressional campaign committees based in Washington, as well as to the financially strained New York State Democratic Party, her advisers said. Mrs. Clinton is giving $1.1 million to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which comes on top of the $1 million that she gave the committee last month. In addition, the senator is donating $250,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and $150,000 to the New York State Democratic Party. At the same time, Mrs. Clinton also plans to campaign for nearly 20 candidates in about a dozen states." According to the Times, Clinton will appear in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, New Jersey, Florida, Nevada, Rhode Island and Minnesota.

Wesley Clark Endorses Lamont. The New York Times (10/7, Medina, 1.21M) reports Gen. Wesley Clark "criticized" Sen. Joseph Lieberman "accusing him of having 'rubber-stamped' the Bush administration's Iraq policies, and he questioned Mr. Lieberman's understanding of military issues, during campaign appearances with Ned Lamont, the Democratic nominee for United States Senate." Clark "offered a strong endorsement of Mr. Lamont, saying that he would be 'the key to changing the course in this country.'"

Steele's Attacks On Cardin Over Drug Industry Ties Considered Hypocritical. The Washington Post (10/7, B1, Mosk, 748K) reports, "In a recent commercial advertising his bid for U.S. Senate, Maryland Republican Michael S. Steele tells voters that his opponent, Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, has been tainted by contributions from pharmaceutical companies and special interests. … The ad does not mention that less than a week before the commercial began airing, a top drug company executive and an industry lobbyist hosted a $1,000-a-person fundraiser for Steele at a K Street steakhouse in Washington. The invitation to the fundraiser, obtained by The Washington Post, says the Sept. 20 lunch reception was to be hosted by Sally Walsh, a director of federal government relations at GlaxoSmithKline, and Michael Carozza, a lobbyist for Bristol-Myers Squibb. It advises donors to send contributions to lobbyist Frederick T. Dombo III, who identifies himself on his Web site as a Steele campaign volunteer. Federal records show that Dombo represents AmerisourceBergen Specialty Group, one of the largest pharmaceutical services companies in the country." The Post adds that the Steele commercial, "which aired Sept. 26, marked the first negative turn in his advertising campaign, coming in response to a spot by national Democrats that painted the Republican candidate as being in President Bush's hip pocket."

Dean Wishes Democrats Had Black Statewide Candidate In Maryland. The Washington Times (10/7, Ward, 88K) reports Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean "said that Maryland's Democratic ticket should have had a black or other minority at the top, but added that the national party isn't to blame for the lack of diversity. 'I do think there should be more diversity on this ticket,' Mr. Dean said. … However, Mr. Dean said that the national party bears no responsibility for Maryland's Democratic ticket, which offers four white men for the state's top offices -- the U.S. Senate, governor, attorney general and comptroller. 'We don't interfere in primaries,' he said of the DNC."

Webb Uses Warner's Assessment Of Iraq To Criticize Allen. The Washington Post (10/7, B2, Craig, Shear, 748K) reports Democratic Virginia Senate candidate James Webb "said yesterday that it is time for the United States to seek an end to the fighting in Iraq through diplomacy, citing a new and dire assessment of the war effort by Virginia's senior senator, John W. Warner (R). Webb sought to capitalize on Warner's appraisal of the war to highlight what Webb called the failure of his GOP opponent, Sen. George Allen, to face reality about the worsening situation in Iraq. … 'They have a victory quite frankly in military terms,' Webb said of soldiers in Iraq. 'What we have to do is to move this into the political, diplomatic environment. All I've heard from Senator Allen is that we need a victory in Iraq, whatever that is.'" The Allen campaign "quickly organized a conference call for reporters with Warner as a show of Republican unity. 'The bottom-line goal that Senator Warner and I share is that we cannot leave Iraq as a central haven for terrorists,' Allen said."

Allen's Sister's Memoir Noted. The Washington Times (10/7, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Allen's "political opponents have cited his sister's memoir to portray him as a bully, but an attentive read of her recollections of growing up with football-minded men provides deep insight into the Virginia Republican's past now at issue in his re-election campaign. 'Fifth Quarter: The Scrimmage of a Football Coach's Daughter' by Jennifer Allen includes some eyebrow-raising passages such as a young George Allen dragging his sister by her hair or hitting her boyfriend with a pool cue, incidents that are often noted by Mr. Allen's Democratic foes. But his critics don't use excerpts noting that the senator was a star student or how he set out a chair in honor of his late father…at his 1994 gubernatorial inauguration."

Underdog House Candidate Claims Democratic Backers Have Abandoned Him. The New York Times (10/7, Leibovich, 1.21M) reports, "Implausible pursuits can be humbling. Jim Marcinkowski, a Democrat, discovers this every day in his bid to dislodge Representative Mike Rogers, a three-term Republican, from the United States Congress." Rogers "clearly holds a big advantage in name recognition. And money, organization, experience, knowledge of the district, and everything else that make incumbency such a near-invincible force in Congressional elections. It is easy to overlook this in an environment that many predict will be hostile to sitting members of Congress, especially Republicans." Marcinkowski "personifies the thankless underdog. He is a probable loser (some say surefire) who is unknown to most voters in this district northwest of Detroit and irrelevant to the national party officials who recruited him — and, in his telling, then abandoned him — as they focused on 50 or so 'battleground' contests." Marcinkowski "says many of the Democrats who enticed him to run abandoned him after his fund-raising lagged and they deemed other races to be more winnable."

This Year Could See Substantial Rise In Female Members Of Congress. The Washington Post (10/7, A9, Asthana, 748K) reports on "a drive by U-Va.'s Center for Politics to inspire young women to get involved in politics." The Center's Director Larry Sabato "is predicting that 2006 could be the best year for women in 14 years. In a conservative scenario, according to the Crystal Ball, female candidates would gain nine seats in the House -- the largest rise since the Year of the Woman in 1992, when the number of women in Congress jumped from 32 to 54."

Nagin Endorses Jefferson. The New York Times/AP (10/7, Press) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin "says he is enthusiastically supporting the re-election of Representative William J. Jefferson, an eight-term Democrat who is the target of a federal bribery investigation. 'I've told the congressman that since he supported me during the mayor's race, that I would reciprocate,' Mr. Nagin said Thursday."

Schwarzenegger's Resurgence Attributed To His Bipartisanship. NBC Nightly News (10/6, story 11, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A red-state Governor in a blue state, Arnold Schwarzenegger is running for re-election as you May know. Even after some mistakes that really hurt him, including one just this week, he is way ahead in the polls. … Schwarzenegger has been able to shake off past controversies that hurt his popularity. … After he backed a series of losing partisan initiatives, his approval rating slumped to 35%. But one thing about Schwarzenegger -- he knows how to reinvent himself and he's doing it again. The new Arnold is bipartisan. Signing legislation Democrats favor such as measures to fight global warming and hike the minimum wage."

Schwarzenegger's Stance On Immigration Said To Have Evolved. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Marosi, 918K) reports, "The national immigration debate is reverberating in California's gubernatorial campaign, with the two major-party candidates trading verbal jabs but treading carefully on the volatile issue." Schwarzenegger, "who has talked tough in the past on border-related issues — praising Minuteman-style private border patrols and supporting the anti-illegal immigrant Proposition 187 — now plays up his immigrant roots, calling for a comprehensive and compassionate border policy that bolsters security without mistreating illegal immigrants. The softened public stance hasn't stopped Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides from portraying Schwarzenegger as an anti-immigrant extremist who has harmed relations with Mexico." The Times notes,

"The dispute continued this week, when Angelides supporters criticized Schwarzenegger for saying Mexican immigrants should 'immerse yourself and assimilate into the American culture.'"

Elizabeth Edwards Busy Promoting Memoir. McClatchy Newspapers (10/7, Krentz) report, "In the days since her book was published, Elizabeth Edwards has gone from one interview to the next, from Oprah Winfrey to Diane Rehm to Charlie Rose, talking about the pain of losing her son and her battle with breast cancer. … John Edwards seems to be a probable 2008 presidential candidate. And the family has moved into a new home in Orange County, N.C."

Murdoch's Sky TV To Carry Gore Channel In UK. The Financial Times (10/7, Terazono, Correspondent) reports former Vice President Al Gore "is bringing his user-generated content television channel to the UK, courtesy of James Murdoch's British Sky Broadcasting. Mr Gore launched Current TV, the US channel made of clips created by viewers and producers, in August last year, and said that the channel was 'democratising television.' Mr Murdoch, who has claimed that BSkyB was the first media company in the world to go carbon neutral, and Mr Gore share their passion for the environment."

Rice, Colleagues Move Toward Sanctioning Iran But Continue Diplomacy. The Washington Post (10/7, A18, Wright, 748K) reports Washington "and five other major powers agreed Friday to take the next step toward imposing sanctions on Iran for failing to comply with [an UNSCR] to prevent it from subverting its nuclear energy program to develop a nuclear weapon." However, the grouping, "in response to Russian and Chinese wariness about the impact and effectiveness of sanctions," decided "to keep the door open to diplomacy." EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "will remain available for talks if Iran chooses to come to the table and suspend its uranium enrichment program," a move that would end consideration of sanctions. Undersecretary Burns said the existing incentives package "will still be on offer if the Islamic republic changes its position." The Post says that, "after a dramatic buildup all week to a possible turning point following the collapse of European negotiations with Iran, the tone and scope of the agreement appeared significantly milder than anticipated." The deal "does not close the deep gap between the United States and Russia over strategy toward Iran. [Secretary] Rice acknowledged the split. 'It's long been the view of particularly Russia that sanctions may not have the intended effect,' she said, adding that Moscow had an obligation to act since it had voted for Resolution 1696 in July."

The New York Times (10/7, Shenon, 1.21M) adds Washington "said it had won agreement on Friday from" its six partners "to seek sanctions against Iran." However, US "diplomats conceded that there could still be long and difficult negotiations over what penalties to impose and their timing." Burns "said after the meeting that whatever the other nations' diplomatic language, 'What we've got is an agreement to go to the Security Council' to punish'" Tehran. The Times says "none of the other nations [involved] issued such an explicit statement after the meeting." An anonymous "senior State Department official" said "senior diplomats from the six countries would talk next week by video conference to begin debating the list of sanctions."

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Richter, 918K) adds the six powers "said after a meeting of foreign ministers that they continued to hold out hope that the Iranian government would relent, suspend nuclear enrichment and accept a package of economic incentives they offered June 1." The Times notes, " A senior U.S. official described the decision to discuss sanctions as 'a little bit of progress' but acknowledged that agreeing on penalties against Iran would be difficult. Yet the Americans, who have pressed for sanctions, insisted that it was significant that the six nations have held together."

The Wall Street Journal (10/7, King, 2.03M) notes Washington "and its major partners sought to deliver strong messages to both North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs, but divisions persist over how hard to push either country within the United Nations." London meeting participants "said they plan next week to begin talks within the [UNSC] over a package of sanctions," but Moscow and Beijing "reiterated Friday that they won't support threats or coercion." In somewhat more negative tones, the Financial Times (10/7, Khalaf, Smyth) says "after two hours of talks in London, no agreement was reached on the details of potential measures and it was far from clear that differences between the US and Europe on one hand, and Russia and China on the other, had been overcome." The AP (10/7, Gardiner) adds the six powers "left crucial questions about the scope and timing of any measures unresolved. … Apparently divided about how quickly to move, the envoys stopped short of explicitly declaring European negotiations with Iran a failure, as some had expected them to do. Their statement also shied away from demanding Tehran be punished by the [UNSC], but said" the discussion would continue at the UN.

UNSC Statement Says Any North Korean Nuclear Test Would "Jeopardize Peace." The New York Times (10/7, Hoge, 1.21M) reports the UNSC "urged North Korea Friday not to carry out a planned test of a nuclear weapon, saying it would endanger regional stability and provoke worldwide denunciation." The unanimously approved statement "said such action would 'jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond.'" The text also "urged Pyongyang to return to six-party talks," and Ambassador Bolton is quoted saying, "At an absolute minimum, North Korea must come back to the six-party talks which it has boycotted for 13 consecutive months and shows no inclination to come back to." However, the statement "made no mention of possible…sanctions or punishment other than to note that the Council would act 'consistent with' its obligations if Pyongyang followed through with its threat."

As the only network TV news program to cover North Korea Friday evening, ABC World News (10/6, story 5, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) in a brief story noted, "And in North Korea, the dictator, Kim Jong-Il, made his first appearance since the country announced plans to conduct a nuclear test. Today, the UN Security Council threatened unspecified action against North Korea if it moves ahead with the test."

The Washington Post (10/7, A17, Lynch, 748K) notes the UNSC "issued a veiled threat to weigh tougher action, including the possibility of sanctions, against Pyongyang it if proceeds with the test. The nonbinding statement capped three days of intensive negotiation after North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it plans to test a nuclear device to strengthen its defenses against the United States." The Administration "expressed frustration that the council was not prepared to adopt an even tougher response spelling out the punitive actions to be imposed on North Korea if it conducts a test." Nevertheless, Bolton and Japanese PermRep and UNSC President Kenzo Oshima "said the statement will be helpful to Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who is expected to advocate a tougher response to North Korea's nuclear program in visits to Beijing on Sunday and Seoul on Monday." The Washington Times (10/7, Pisik, 88K) runs a similar story.

AFP (10/7) keys on continuing White House reaction, noting Deputy Spokeswoman Dana Perino "warned that a North Korean nuclear test would be an 'incendiary' event threatening Pyongyang's neighbors." She is quoted saying, "The international community has joined us in sending a clear signal to the North Koreans that any such test of a nuclear device would be unacceptable. … It would be destabilizing to the region and could lead to further escalation of tensions. And a test, by its very nature, could advance the North Koreans' capabilities."

The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Farley, 918K) adds Moscow and Beijing "had objected to earlier drafts of the statement that threatened an arms embargo, economic penalties or military force for failing to comply. The two nations rejected wording to 'demand' that North Korea halt its plans, settling instead for a statement that would 'urge' it to do so. But Russian diplomats said they were 'very concerned' about the possibility of a test." Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe "said [yesterday] that the test could come as early as this weekend. U.S. spy satellites have detected sustained activity at a suspected underground test site in North Korea."

The AP (10/7, Lederer) notes, "A unanimous [UNSC] statement urged the secretive, communist nation Friday to abandon all atomic weapons as it promised last year and cancel plans to detonate a device. Japan hinted the North could face sanctions or possible military action." Tokyo "issued a statement later saying if North Korea defies international concerns about a test, 'the Security Council must adopt a resolution outlining severely punitive measures.'" In Pyongyang, Kim Jong-Il "met hundreds of his top military commanders and urged them to bolster the nation's defenses, as officers cheered, 'Fight at the cost of our lives!'" One Chinese analyst "said only the removal of American economic sanctions against Pyongyang could dissuade the country from carrying out a nuclear test."

The Financial Times (10/7, Turner, Dinmore) adds the UNSC "has agreed a unanimous statement, warning North Korea to refrain from testing a nuclear weapon, or face unspecified action." The Times says Washington "is reportedly looking at possible sanctions against" Pyongyang. Assistant Secretary Chris Hill refused to say precisely what the US would do in the event of a nuclear test, but indicated the response could be some kind of blockade, saying the top US priority was to prevent proliferation of" WMDs.

Lebanon's "Accidental" Premier Works To Rebuild Nation. In a 1,896-word profile piece, the Wall Street Journal (10/7, Young, 2.03M) reports, "There was a time, not so long ago, when Fuad al-Siniora was the most vilified man in Lebanon." Despite being "a proper technocrat, seemingly misplaced amid the promenading politicians," the Lebanese Prime Minster "remains firmly in place" in spite of "efforts by an array of forces to bring his government down." The Journal says Siniora "is velvety and unflappable," avoiding "hard angles in favor of nods, winks and baroque compromises -- qualities essential for herding the fat cats that make up Lebanese government." After discussing Siniora's "difficult" political position following the Israel-Hezbollah war, the Journal notes, "Politics are not the only thing the prime minister has to worry about. With a $40 billion debt, a GDP estimated at only $18 to $20 billion, and losses from the July-August conflict estimated by some U.N. agencies at over $10 billion, Lebanon is in dire financial straits." In conclusion, the Journal adds, "Many of Mr. Siniora's enemies will readily admit, of course, to a fear of God. What he must worry about is that they will increasingly fear Fuad al-Siniora, the accidental prime minister who may have turned out to be more than they bargained for."

Cluster Bombs Continue To Threaten Lebanese Civilians. ABC World News (10/6, story 8, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The US is investigating whether Israel used" cluster bombs during its retaliation against Hezbollah in Lebanon "improperly. But no one disputes that the bombs are injuring and killing civilians right now." ABC (Dinnick) added, "The Lebanese army accuses Israel of violating International law by dropping to many bombs in populated areas. Israeli officials organize they argue they had no choice." Mark Regev, Israel government spokesman: "One of the problems of the conflict in Hezbollah, was that Hezbollah used the population as a human shield." Dinnick: "He says his team is finding and safely destroying a handful of cluster bombs every day. But the UN estimates there may be as many as 1 million still out there."

Haniya Says Hamas Will Not Recognize Israel. The New York Times (10/7, Myre, 1.21M) reports remarks by Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, made "in a defiant speech delivered to a teeming crowd of Hamas supporters," that "insisted" that Hamas "would not recognize Israel despite the cutoff in Western aid that has strangled his government." The Times says the speech "appeared to be aimed at the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Abbas recently told Rice that "there is a need for a new Palestinian government that will recognize Israel and deal with it. He also indicated that he was prepared to invoke his presidential powers and dismiss the current government." Haniya and Abbas' "blunt public remarks" this week "reflected what seems to be an increasingly bitter power struggle that could dim the prospects for a compromise."

The AP (10/7, El Deeb) notes Haniya said "Hamas will not recognize Israel or give in to international pressure that has crippled the Palestinian government." His "fiery speech was interrupted when he fainted onstage, apparently overcome by the heat and two weeks of dawn-to-dusk fasting during the holy month of Ramadan." He "ruled out a proposal by members of his own Hamas movement to form a new government of technocrats as a way of winning international support and ending a seven-month aid freeze." Haniya did say that "Hamas remains willing to invite other parties into a coalition, but that it would not soften its positions."

Writer Says Israel Perpetuates Family Separations. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (10/7, 1.21M), Palestinian writer Sam Bahour describes how he "left a comfortable life in the United States for an uncertain future in the West Bank" in 1993. He "helped create a $100 million telecommunications company" and build "a $10 million shopping center." However, "Israeli authorities have decided that my life here has come to an end." Bahour concludes, "Israelis and Palestinians are destined to be neighbors. … Many people like me…whom Israel is denying entry came to build bridges, not walls. We came to invest in a better life to follow this occupation — a bright, joint future for Palestinian and Israeli children alike."

Czech Authorities Heighten Alert Amid Anti-Jew Terror Plot Rumors. The New York Times (10/7, Smith, 1.21M) carries Czech media reports that "a report that there was a plot to attack Jews in Prague has set off a terrorism alert there." The "Czech news media have been feverishly speculating on the nature of the threat since the government announced heightened security measures on Sept. 23, the first day of the Jewish New Year. The Czech interior minister, Ivan Langer, called the threat 'unprecedented in the history of the Czech Republic.'" The Times notes, "The news of possible terrorism threats in both Oslo and Prague raise the possibility that Islamist terrorist plots, having been foiled by vigilant antiterrorism efforts in capitals like Paris and London, are turning to 'softer' targets elsewhere in Europe where security is more lax."

China's Current Account Surplus Continues To Grow. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, A4, Wu, 2.03M) reports an announcement by the Chinese State Administration of Foreign Exchange that Beijing's "current-account surplus in the first half of this year totaled $91.58 billion, widening from $67.26 billion in the same period a year earlier." The surplus "in the January-June period was bolstered by a growing surplus in China's trade in goods." The Journal says this data suggests that "China's current-account surplus is on track to exceed the $160.82 billion posted for full-year 2005." The government "reiterated it will encourage outflows and control the use of foreign debt" in an effort to reach "equilibrium in the balance of payments, including moving toward yuan convertibility on the capital account."

China's Hu Will Stress Unity, Highlight His Policies At Party Conference. The Los Angeles Times (10/7, Magnier, 918K) details Chinese President Hu Jintao's political preparations for the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) conference that begins tomorrow. He "has worked overtime to burnish the image of harmony in the party, even if it's taken some bloodletting to drive the point home." Recent purges and arrests in Shanghai "sent shock waves through China's political establishment" and "served as a warning to those in lower party ranks that Hu means business, further consolidating his power and stressing his underdogoriented policies as he heads into the fourth year of an expected 10-year administration. " The Times says Hu has repeatedly "stressed the importance of harmony as a salve for growing tensions over China's rich-poor gap and endemic corruption — even as the party and the nation's wide-ranging security apparatus have backed up words with force, intimidation and censorship when appeals for calm are ignored by rioting farmers, the media or social activists."

Putin Steps Up Deportations Of Georgians, Seizures Of Businesses. The New York Times (10/7, Myers, 1.21M) notes Moscow "deported 153 citizens of Georgia on Friday as a wave of punitive measures against Georgian migrants and businesses grew, prompting criticism that the government is carrying out an ethnically motivated campaign of harassment." The Times says the past week has been marked by "political and diplomatic conflict between Russia and Georgia that began with the arrests of four Russian military officers for espionage, and has shown little sign of easing despite the officers' release." An ethnic Georgian who runs a Moscow-based NGO "described the authorities' actions as an unjustified overreaction to political disputes with Georgia's president, Mikheil Saakashvili." These measures "have coincided with two new campaigns announced this week by" President Vladimir Putin – "sweeping new restrictions on gambling," and "new regulations of migrant workers, especially those in wholesale and retail markets." The Times adds, "Using some of the most strikingly nationalistic language of his presidency, Mr. Putin said that markets should be regulated 'with a view to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population.'"

WSJ Says Georgian Independence Has Fueled Kremlin Retaliation. The Wall Street Journal (10/7, 2.03M) editorializes, "The world needs to watch Russia's current pressure on Georgia." Moscow's moves this week are "a fresh reminder of just how paranoid and bullying the Kremlin's foreign policy has become in the hands of President Vladimir Putin." Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "alleges that the arrest of the [Russian] officers is part of a Western plot apparently hatched in Washington." While "Comrade Lavrov" may believe that "the Bush Administration wastes its time hatching two-bit schemes in the Caucasus to humiliate Mother Russia," the Journal says "what we are likelier witnessing is another fit of Russian pique at [Georgian President] Saakashvili's courageous decision to yank Georgia out of Moscow's orbit…and into the orbit of the West." Tblisi's efforts over the past three years "can serve as a model for other former Soviet republics such as Kyrgyzstan and Ukraine as they struggle to prosper. It could also serve as a model for Russia itself, which may be why Moscow has used every opportunity to bring Georgia and its leaders to heel." The Journal concludes the world should "feel grateful that President Bush, after placing too much faith in Mr. Putin in his first term, has given Mr. Saakashvili the support he deserves."

Administration Believes Unconfirmed Reports That Castro Has Cancer. Time Magazine (10/6, Burger, Donnelly) reported, "Ever since President Fidel Castro was sidelined for what was said to be abdominal surgery last July, Cuban officials have maintained that the country's leader will return to his post." However, Time says the Administration is "now convinced that Castro, 80, has terminal cancer and will never return to power." Time continues, "Of course, such intelligence reports could be wrong, and one official cautioned that definitive proof is nearly impossible for the U.S. to come by. Yet the fact that the Cuban government removed Castro from the public stage before his death could suggest that Castro and his would-be successors were aware of a terminal condition and wanted to gauge public reaction to his absence." While the Administration is preparing for "the inevitable," Times adds Castro's death wouldn't "mean that things will change much. Fidel's brother Raul…has given no indication that he will change the policies of the isolated Communist government that has tormented the U.S. since taking power in 1959."

Hungarian Premier Wins Confidence Vote. The Financial Times (10/7, Condon) reports, "Lawmakers from Hungary's two coalition parties on Friday signalled their near unanimous support for" Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany "in a confidence vote. Despite a withering attack from the opposition and the knowledge that hundreds of thousands of Hungarians were expected to mass outside parliament to demand the prime minister's resignation later in the day, MPs voted 207-165" to support the premier. "Only three coalition MPs failed to vote for the measure."

The AP (10/7, Gorondi) adds, "Even as parliament voted, however, tens of thousands of people gathered on Kossuth Square just outside the legislature and demanded Gyurcsany's dismissal. The Fidesz party called on supporters to bring alarm clocks to the rally, a symbolic wake-up call for the ruling coalition to get rid of the prime minister." Gyurcsany "had requested the vote of confidence to reinforce political support for his austerity package and the transformation of the inefficient public sector" after his "coalition suffered large setbacks in Sunday's nationwide municipal elections."

Darfur Divestment Movement Finds Success In States And Cities. The Washington Post (10/7, A12, Boustany, 748K) reports, "House members are scattering to their home states this week with inconclusive results on the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of western Sudan, but momentum is growing at the state level for governments to divest public funds from companies, mostly foreign-based, doing business with Khartoum." The Post calls the sanctions bill, HR 3127, "a victory for business lobbyists" because it omits "language that would have endorsed states' rights to pass divestment laws." However, the Post notes, "a divestment movement appears to be gaining momentum across the country, with active campaigns on university campuses and at city and state levels. Six states have already passed divestment laws: Maine, Connecticut, Oregon, Illinois, New Jersey and California."

California State Moves Progressive Agenda. The Financial Times (10/7, Garrahan, Dinmore) reports that the progressive politics driving California politics "are beginning to take on an increasingly international dimension. This has left some businesses leaders and Washington policy makers uneasy." For example Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, signed "a law that prohibits the state's pension funds from investing in companies with active business in Sudan." Schwarzenegger's "efforts were hailed by voters from across the political spectrum. But the Sudan divestment law…is troubling the Bush administration, as well as business lobby groups and some senators." And it "comes weeks after the US Senate blocked legislation that would have ratified divestment from the Sudan by US states."

Volcker Says World Bank Must Lead Worldwide Anti-Corruption Effort. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (10/7, 2.03M), former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker says the murder of Russian central banker Andrei Koslov does not mean financial crimes occur only in Russia. Koslov's murder "defines the battle lines for all of us. It's a battle that all those supporting economic development and the rule of law cannot afford to lose. And, appropriately, it is international institutions that are placed front and center in that battle." He concludes, "My impression is that the corruption problem may be getting worse. … The implications go far beyond any one institution. But I know of no institution, by its leadership, by its professional staff, by its standing in the world, that is better equipped to take on that challenge than the World Bank."

NYT Says Paisley's DUP Should Renew Northern Ireland Peace Efforts. The New York Times (10/7, 1.21M) editorializes, "The transformation of militant Irish Republicanism from terrorism to democratic politics over the past decade has been little short of remarkable — a welcome success story in troubled times." Now that the IRA "has fully renounced terrorism, dissociated itself from organized criminal activity and committed itself to following an exclusively political path, the very steps its critics have demanded for years," the Times says the Democratic Unionist Party "led by the Rev. Ian Paisley," should offer "a similarly remarkable response." The DUP should "acknowledge that the conditions it has long set out for entering into a power-sharing government with [Sinn Fein] have been achieved."

Pentagon To Probe Gitmo Beatings Claim (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, October 7, 2006

The Pentagon said Friday that it will investigate a Marine's sworn statement that guards at Guantanamo Bay bragged about beating detainees and described it as a common practice.

The Marine, a paralegal who was at the U.S. Navy station in Cuba last month, alleges that several guards she talked to at the base club said they routinely hit detainees.

"From the whole conversation, I understood that striking detainees was a common practice," the sergeant wrote. "Everyone in the group laughed at the others' stories of beating detainees."

The woman's name was blacked out of a copy of a two-page affidavit provided to The Associated Press by a civilian defense attorney working with Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, the Marine Corps' defense coordinator for the Western United States and based at Camp Pendleton.

Vokey, who sent the statement Wednesday to the Inspector General at the Department of Defense, called for an investigation, saying the abuse alleged in the affidavit "is offensive and violates United States and international law."

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler said defense officials "are reviewing this affidavit and will investigate these allegations fully." A call to the inspector general's office was not immediately returned

Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, spokesman for the Joint Task Force that oversees detention facilities at Guantanamo, said the force "will participate fully with the inspector general to learn the facts of the matter and will take action where misconduct is discovered."

"Abuse or harassment of detainees in any form is not condoned or tolerated," Durand said.

Guantanamo Bay houses about 450 suspected members of al-Qaida and the Taliban. Human-rights groups have roundly criticized the Bush administration for detaining most without criminal charges, but U.S. officials have defended the detentions as necessary in the war on terrorism and say the detainees are treated humanely.

DOJ_NMG_0078403

The Marine said in the sworn statement that she has been working at Marine Corps Base, Camp Pendleton in Southern California on a Guantanamo-related case, and was in Guantanamo from Sept. 20-27.

She said some Marines had invited her to the base club Sept. 23. She didn't see them but a group of at least 15 sailors invited her to join them. She said she spoke with the sailors for about an hour, during which she had one drink, and that the sailors did not appear drunk.

A 19-year-old sailor referred to only as Bo "told the other guards and me about him beating different detainees being held in the prison," the statement said.

"One such story Bo told involved him taking a detainee by the head and hitting the detainee's head into the cell door. Bo said that his actions were known by others," the statement said. The sailor said he was never punished.

Other guards "also told their own stories of abuse towards the detainees" that included hitting them, denying them water and "removing privileges for no reason."

"About 5 others in the group admitted hitting detainees" and that included "punching in the face," the affidavit said.

Guantanamo was internationally condemned shortly after it opened more than four years ago when pictures captured prisoners kneeling, shackled and being herded into wire cages. That was followed by reports of prisoner abuse, heavy-handed interrogations, hunger strikes and suicides.

Military investigators said in July 2005 they confirmed abusive and degrading treatment of a suspected terrorist at Guantanamo Bay that included forcing him to wear a bra, dance with another man and behave like a dog.

However, the chief investigator, Air Force Lt. Gen. Randall M. Schmidt, said "no torture occurred" during the interrogation of Mohamed al-Qahtani, a Saudi who was captured in December 2001 along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

Description Of Prisoner Abuse At Guantánamo (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

The Pentagon said it would investigate claims by a Marine Corps sergeant that guards at the United States military prison at Guantanámo Bay bragged about beating prisoners and denying them privileges to anger them. The accusations are in an affidavit by a sergeant that was made public after being sent to the Defense Department's inspector general for investigation by Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, a Marine Corps defense lawyer. The sergeant, a paralegal whose name was not released, said in the affidavit that she heard about the alleged abuse while talking to several guards at the Guantanámo Bay base club while she was visiting Cuba last month, Colonel Vokey said. "Examples of this abuse included hitting detainees, denying them water and removal of privileges for no reason," the sergeant said in the affidavit read to The New York Times by Colonel Vokey. A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler told the Associated Press that defense officials "are reviewing this affidavit and will investigate these allegations fully."

At Guantanamo: Hard Time And A View Of What Could Have Been (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Detainees at a new camp will see only a sliver of a common area; isolation has become the norm.

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba — The narrow windows in the 7-by-12 steel and concrete cells of Camp 6 will give detainees a view of a common room designed to bring them together as brothers in faith, language and customs.

But looking is all they will be able to do. The area will be off-limits.

When the Guantanamo prison complex's new camp was designed two years ago, the triangular communal area was intended to let detainees mingle over meals, games and conversation.

But virtually all time at Guantanamo has become hard time, and when prisoners begin arriving at the $38-million building in the next few weeks, they will be kept mostly in isolation.

A May riot in which dozens of detainees attacked U.S. soldiers, the suicide of three prisoners in June, and changes in the camp population — including the arrival of 14 "high value detainees" — have transformed Guantanamo into a largely maximum security facility.

The first new arrivals in two years — the group including the self-proclaimed Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and his alleged lieutenant Ramzi Binalshibh — were flown from secret CIA prisons abroad over Labor Day weekend. But dozens have left in recent months, too, having been cleared by annual review boards for release or transfer to their native countries. Negotiations also are underway between the State Department and foreign governments on the possible group repatriations of more than 300 Afghans, Saudis and Yemenis. Washington is trying to obtain assurances that the men will neither be tortured nor freed to potentially threaten U.S. or allied forces.

The 100 or so expected to remain after the transfers will be the detainees considered the most dangerous, those with little hope of release or reward for good behavior, according to military jailers. That population is unlikely to elicit much softening of the conditions.

Near the same time of the May and June incidents, officials discovered that prisoners with good behavior records had been dismantling their faucets to fashion weapons, officials said. That prompted jailers to reconsider whether prisoners should be allowed to interact and possibly plot resistance.

"We had to think about whether there is such a thing as a medium-security terrorist," said Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., commander of the prison and interrogation network that houses 460 war-on-terror suspects.

Col. Wade Dennis, who is effectively Guantanamo's warden, echoed Harris' concern that although most detainees cooperated with camp rules, the recent violence suggested some had been hiding their true nature.

"Detainees have already demonstrated they have the will and the thought processes to do self-harm and I facilitate that if I let them live in a communal-type environment," said Dennis.

Shortly after the suicides, the prison commanders decided to scrap the medium-security comforts, and will keep inmates isolated behind steel doors for all but an hour or two of daily exercise time.

"Meals will be served in their cells," said Naval Cmdr. Kris Winter, head of the force staffing the prisons.

Since the discovery of the vandalized faucets, Camp 1 has been emptied and its detainees moved to temporary metal-mesh cells pending repairs or relocation to Camp 6, which is expected to be fully populated by the end of the year.

Camp 4, which held about 175 prisoners before the riot, is a barracks-like compound where detainees slept 10 to a room, ate together and were free to congregate for as much as 14 hours daily. It has been cleared of all but about 30 Afghans who didn't take part in the uprising — the only detainees not confined to solitary cells.

Harris and Dennis say they will invoke tougher screening before any prisoners are allowed back into communal living.

Where to hold the prisoners among Guantanamo's eight detention facilities is an exercise in risk assessment complicated by the shutdown of Camp 1 — previously the most populous prison — and the virtual emptying of Camp 4 to modify fans and light fixtures that the rioters used to make weapons.

Unlike Camp 5, the reigning hard-time housing, Camp 6 has no outside windows or natural light in the cells. The prefabricated units are arrayed along two sides of a triangle. Bare concrete walls, floors and metal furnishings make the common room an echo chamber.

In addition to mothballing the tables, lockers and leg-stretching spaces in the new camp, the Navy's construction force, or SeaBees, and the prison's Kellogg Brown and Root contractors have erected chain-link partitions to make 10-by-30-foot exercise pens in what was designed as an open sports court.

Other retrofitting has included shower doors that will prevent the detainees from communicating, said Lt. Cmdr. Eileen D'Andrea, who was in charge of the prison's construction and 11th-hour revisions. An expanded guard force also will be needed to provide the manpower to shackle and escort each prisoner every time he needs to leave his cell, said Lt. Col. Mike Nicolucci, Dennis' deputy.

The hardening of Guantanamo detention dispirits the detainees and their lawyers, who see it as part of U.S. political posturing in an election year.

"They've set this up as a showcase and they feel they can't back down from it," Marine Maj. Michael Mori, who represents Australian detainee David Hicks, said of the Bush administration's Guantanamo operations. "Every day in Iraq and Afghanistan they let people go who they know are far more dangerous than these guys."

DOJ_NMG_0078405

Rank-and-file guards express little concern or curiosity about the conditions of the prisoners' confinement, noting that they are just doing their duty.

"I don't know exactly what they did but they must have done something wrong to be here," said Master-at-Arms Seaman Leif Kreizenbeck, a 23-year-old Oregonian who arrived barely a month ago.

Construction chief D'Andrea said the prison's design allows for future changes. Each of the eight clusters of 22 cells around a common area is self-contained and could be transformed to a medium-security, communal-living "pod" if that is what detention authorities decide.

That prospect seems distant.

"Once we get Camp 4 repaired — and that is costing us a tremendous amount of money — we will be very selective about who goes back to Camp 4," said Harris.

Produce The Body (WSJ)

By Richard A. Epstein

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

Last week, the Bush administration persuaded a divided Congress to pass the Military Commissions Act (MCA), giving the president the authorization the Supreme Court ruled that he needed to try enemy combatants in Guantanamo.

The MCA was bitterly contested, and one of the most hard-fought provisions involves the right of detainees to demand that the government justify their detention to an independent judicial officer. On this point, Sens. John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham have claimed in this newspaper that the MCA preserves the rights of individuals "to challenge his status in administrative and judicial fora," and that "these challenges are in excess of what our soldiers would be afforded as prisoners of war." In fact, the law offers far less protection than their broad observation suggests. The MCA strips them of their right to habeas corpus -- unwisely removing an indispensable and long-standing check on the abuse of executive power.

The average American naturally responds with a blank stare to that Latin mouthful, habeas corpus ad subjiciendum. But the phrase loses all of its obscurity -- and none of its punch -- when expressed in plain English: "Produce the body that it may be subjected to examination."

The writ grew up in England, long before the American Revolution, to counter the power of the Crown to arbitrarily imprison and execute its foes. Historically, habeas corpus directed the officer of the Crown who had custody of a prisoner to bring him into court, where an impartial judge could independently decide whether the confinement was justified. If, however, the original conviction was tainted by a coerced confession or the admission of illegally obtained evidence, the judge could order the prisoner freed, then and there.

Modern American practice no longer requires that the prisoner literally be brought into court at the outset of legal proceedings. Today, a judicial hearing attended by lawyers for both sides decides on the legality of the prisoner's confinement. Nevertheless, the older concerns still animate the modern practice. Lawful imprisonment, second only to lawful infliction of death, is the hallmark of state power. In any system of limited government, such loss of liberty should be hedged by strong procedural protections unless some grave public necessity requires its suspension.

By eliminating habeas review for Guantanamo detainees, the MCA has jettisoned the fundamental right of any prisoner to test the lawfulness of his detention. You may immediately object: Why, if ordinary prisoners of war may be detained for the duration of the conflict without habeas corpus -- as in World War II, the Korean War or the Vietnam War -- should the writ be available to unlawful enemy combatants captured in the war on terror? Because context matters. In conflicts between states, the prisoners are uniformed soldiers. We know they are combatants, we know what counts as the end of the war, and habeas serves no useful role. In a terrorist war, with nonuniformed combatants and chaotic battlefield conditions, wide military sweeps make sense -- but only if we take steps after the heat of battle to allow detainees to challenge their status. Without meaningful judicial review, innocent people could be arbitrarily or erroneously imprisoned, indefinitely.

To be sure, an individual's status as an enemy combatant is determined by a Combatant Status Review Tribunal (CSRT), and the MCA subjects this military tribunal's determination to judicial review. But the process is grossly deficient. It denies a detainee the assistance of counsel. It prohibits him from seeing the evidence against him. It lets the government alone decide what evidence the tribunal sees; it lets the government rely on evidence consisting of double or even triple hearsay; and it lets military superiors override tribunal decisions and fire tribunal members when they disapprove of their decisions.

The MCA also sharply limits judicial review. The court sees only the questionable evidence that the government allowed the tribunal to see, which the detainee has no opportunity to confront. And even this limited judicial review kicks in only if the government (1) triggers a CSRT proceeding for the detainee and (2) carries that review process through to a "final decision." The MCA does not require the government to do either. However, unless the government does both, the law allows the government to hold any prisoner -- even if he is not an unlawful enemy combatant -- in custody for the rest of his life, with no due process and no recourse to the courts.

No one deserves that fate. Truth must count. Innocence must matter. A deeply flawed Combatant Status Review Tribunal process and an optional system of limited judicial review sacrifices both. Only habeas corpus review can fill the gap. Happily, the Supreme Court is likely to invalidate this part of the MCA. The Constitution states that the writ of habeas corpus can be suspended only when rebellion or invasion endangers public safety. That's not the case here: A world of difference separates the risk of future terrorist acts from a present invasion on American soil.

To strip the federal courts of habeas jurisdiction for individuals captured in the war on terror tramples a fundamental guarantee of liberty that the Constitution provides to citizen and alien alike. It makes a mockery of our efforts to advance the cause of freedom throughout the world, and will be seen, both at home and abroad, as a cynical exercise in hypocrisy.

We can effectively respond to terrorist threats as long as our institutions remain open, as they are today. No disorder or unrest blocks the use of ordinary judicial processes; an aggressive foreign policy abroad, coupled with lawful surveillance at home, can go a long way to reduce the terrorist threat without trenching on key personal liberties. Retaining habeas corpus is vital if we are to remain faithful to our noblest constitutional traditions when they matter most, in times of trouble.

The Supreme Court should enforce the constitutional guarantee that Congress has authorized the president to ignore.

USA Denies Any Wrongdoing In Computer Terrorism Lawsuit (AP)

By Rebecca Boone, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

BOISE, Idaho (AP) -- The United States says it did nothing wrong when federal agents arrested and detained an American citizen as a material witness in a computer terrorism case.

The government's formal response to the lawsuit brought by Abdullah al-Kidd was filed in U.S. District Court on Friday.

In his lawsuit, al-Kidd contended that the federal government and several of its agents - including former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft and his successor, Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert Mueller, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and others - violated his civil rights by improperly using material witness laws.

The individuals named in the case have until Nov. 27 to respond; the United States' response deadline was Friday.

In its response, filed by Justice Department lawyer J. Marcus Meeks, the United States denied al-Kidd's allegations and said that al-Kidd was not entitled to any damages.

The lawsuit arose after al-Kidd - a former student at the University of Idaho who played football for the Vandals under the name Lavoni Kidd - was arrested in 2003 as a material witness in the government's case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen. Al-Kidd and Al-Hussayen both worked on behalf of the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators alleged funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States.

A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia.

Al-Kidd was never actually called to testify, but he spent two weeks in jail as a material witness and was later released to the custody of his wife with strict limitations on where he could travel. He sued, alleging that he was falsely imprisoned and that the government violated due process, using material witness laws to arrest, detain and investigate individuals without first proving probable cause.

Al-Kidd said the investigation and detention not only caused him to lose a scholarship to study in Saudi Arabia, but cost him employment opportunities.

Harper Protests US Deportation Of Canadian To Syria (AFP)

AFP, October 7, 2006

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper has protested to US President George W. Bush about the deportation to Syria of a Canadian, who was tortured and held for a year.

Harper spoke about Maher Arar, a Canadian of Syrian origin, in a 15-minute telephone call with Bush following a Canadian inquiry's report that cleared Arar of any terror links.

"I indicated to president Bush that Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, would be sending a letter today to his counterpart, Secretary of State (Condoleezza) Rice, to launch a formal protest on the treatment of Maher Arar," Harper told reporters.

"He had been unfairly deported where he had faced torture in Syria, and that American officials had not been candid and truthful in their dealings with Canadian officials in the case and had violated what we understand to be the protocols for such communications between our two governments," he said.

Arar was stopped in New York, on his way to Canada from a trip to Tunisia, in September 2002 and was deported to Syria where he was jailed and tortured for more than a year.

"The president said that he would look at the complaint seriously, and we are expecting a response, an official response, to our complaint as well as assurances that we will not be facing that kind of conduct on the part of US authorities in the future, because we want to help the US in the fight against terrorism, and certainly, we share their concerns about security," Harper told reporters.

The inquiry headed by Judge Dennis O'Connor said in its report that US authorities had likely relied on faulty intelligence provided by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) to hold and deport the 36-year-old software engineer to Syria.

The mid-September report also urged Ottawa to register officially objections with Syria and the United States for their treatment of Arar.

Germany's Denials On Detainees Challenged (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

BERLIN, Oct. 6 -- The chief plotter of the Sept. 11 hijackings and another al-Qaeda leader who spent time in secret CIA prisons might have been interrogated in Germany before their transfer last month to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to lawyers for other terrorism suspects in U.S. custody.

Lawyers for a British legal association that represents Guantanamo prisoners reported Friday that two of their clients had given independent -- though secondhand -- accounts that al-Qaeda leaders Khalid Sheik Mohammed and Tawfiq bin Attash were questioned on military bases in Germany after their capture in Pakistan in 2003.

The prisoners' statements, based on information that they said was revealed to them by interrogators, challenge repeated denials by the German government that it played any part in the U.S. government's secret network to detain and transport terrorism suspects after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States.

The statements also open the possibility that the CIA held prisoners on a U.S. military base in Germany without the knowledge of the host government in the early days after the attacks.

The British legal defense group, Reprieve, acknowledged that it did not have proof that German airspace or territory was used. But it called on the German government to investigate further. The prisoner statements, which have been declassified by the U.S. military, are contained in notes from interviews with their lawyers at the U.S. military detention center at Guantanamo.

"I'm certainly not saying it's established fact," Clive Stafford Smith, Reprieve's legal director, said in a telephone interview. "But it's definitely something we should follow up on."

DOJ_NMG_0078408

Thomas Steg, a German government spokesman, dismissed the report. He said a German parliamentary committee had already found no evidence that the CIA used Germany to transfer or detain terrorism suspects. "There is nothing to these accusations," Steg said at a news briefing. "There were and are no such facilities in Germany."

Robert Wood, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Berlin, declined to comment.

Last month, President Bush revealed that 14 senior members of the al-Qaeda leadership had been taken to Guantanamo on Sept. 6 after spending years overseas in secret prisons operated by the CIA. The 14 prisoners included Mohammed, the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and Attash, who helped plan the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole in Yemen.

After the two were captured, they disappeared from public view. The Bush administration has not revealed where they were detained before they were taken to Cuba last month.

According to Reprieve, however, foreign interrogators fishing for information about Mohammed and Attash revealed to other prisoners that the al-Qaeda leaders were being kept in Germany for at least part of that time.

One of those prisoners, Binyam Mohammed, said that he was imprisoned in Morocco for 18 months after the CIA transferred him there. Moroccan interrogators, he said, accused him of meeting Khalid Sheik Mohammed in March 2002 to discuss an alleged plot to explode a radiological device, or "dirty bomb."

During questioning, Binyam Mohammed said his Moroccan interrogators told him the al-Qaeda leader was being held at a U.S. prison at an air base in Germany. The Moroccan prisoner, who was later taken back to Guantanamo, denies having any connection to al-Qaeda or knowing Khalid Sheik Mohammed, his lawyers said.

Separately, Attash's younger brother said he was told by Jordanian interrogators in 2003 that the USS Cole plotter was also being detained at a U.S.-run prison at an air base in Germany, according to Reprieve. The brother, 21-year-old Hassan Attash, was also later transferred to Guantanamo and remains in custody there.

Reprieve said both prisoners' statements concerning Germany were unsolicited. Because they were being held in isolation at Guantanamo and elsewhere, the group said, it would have been difficult to coordinate their story.

Since last year, German prosecutors have also been investigating whether the CIA used Ramstein Air Base, a NATO installation and headquarters of the U.S. Air Forces in Europe, to transfer a kidnapped radical cleric from Italy to Egypt in 2003.

In that case, German and Italian investigators have tracked flight logs indicating that the cleric was flown from a joint U.S.-Italian base in northern Italy to Ramstein, where he was put on another plane and flown to Cairo.

The American Way Of Secrecy (NYT)

By Francis Fukuyama

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

A RECENT article in The Washington Post described how researchers at George Washington University's National Security Archive were surprised to find 1970's statistics on the size of the American nuclear arsenal blacked out in documents they had obtained. This was surprising because the figures had been published many times in the past; more detailed ones had in fact been given directly to the Soviets in various arms control talks. And yet bureaucrats in the Defense and Energy Departments, acting under new post-9/11 rules, deemed the airing of this historical information dangerous in a world of terrorists and rogue nations.

It has become a cliché to say that "everything changed" after 9/11, but for two great American intellectuals — the sociologist Edward Shils and Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the former New York senator — recent events would have represented the eternal return of the same. Both argued that in the past, the United States has taken real foreign threats and vastly exaggerated the menace they represented, spinning out conspiracy theories. These justified the creation of a state based on secrecy that undermined American liberties and the free exchange of information, the fundamental sources of success for the United States as a society.

Shils, one of the founders of modernization theory and a longtime professor at the University of Chicago, wrote "The Torment of Secrecy: The Background and Consequences of American Security Policies" in 1956, in the immediate aftermath of the McCarthy era. Shils accepted the reality of the Soviet threat and the existence of conspiracies against the American way of life. But he also argued that American democracy, in contrast to the historically aristocratic orders in Europe, was based on a principle of publicity in public affairs — indeed, it "luxuriated" in its wide-open culture. That openness made the idea of external threat and internal subversion especially shocking: "In America, more excitable temperaments and a tradition of violence in expression and energy in action have prompted a passionate response to the threat of secret machinations." A weaker sense of privacy than that of the Europeans, as well as a "flimsier attachment to corporate bodies," made Americans seek their identity in great national symbols, leading to a hyperpatriotism and a tendency to see things in black and white.

In the early days of the cold war, the government's response to these fears was to grant the executive branch a huge degree of discretion in security affairs. The most visible manifestation of this tendency was the development of a classification system that suddenly removed a large amount of information from public scrutiny, and a system of loyalty checks that, in Shils's words, "hurt the delicate tissue which binds our society together."

Shils had no more ardent disciple than Moynihan, who wrote an introduction to a 1996 reissue of "The Torment of Secrecy." Moynihan used his perch on the Senate Intelligence Committee to make a sustained attack on the government's penchant for secrecy, and for his fellow Americans' willingness to tolerate restrictions on their liberties in the name of security. In his book "Secrecy: The American Experience," published in 1998, he argued that "secrecy enables a constitutionally weak executive to bypass the legislature in making decisions that the legislature will not support when things go wrong."

Moynihan pointed out that the Venona intercepts of decrypted Soviet communications from the late 1940's, declassified only after the cold war ended, showed without a doubt that there had been a major Soviet spy network in the United States. The intercepts proved that Julius Rosenberg was guilty of atomic espionage, and that Whittaker Chambers's charges that Alger Hiss was a Soviet agent were correct. Defense of Hiss had of course become a cause célèbre among the liberal intelligentsia of the 1950's. And yet security officials within the government all along had conclusive evidence of his spying, and of the true scope of the Soviet conspiracy. But they failed to reveal what they knew, even to President Truman. This failure, Moynihan said, allowed the public imagination to supplement real knowledge with destructive fantasies, which in turn called into being a generation of anti-anti-Communists. This is a polarization with which we are still living today.

The creation of a national security bureaucracy walled off from public scrutiny produced other malign effects as well. Assumptions about the economic strength of the Soviet Union generated by the intelligence community were not scrutinized against what many people who had actually visited the country knew about its condition. This led to a consistent overestimating of the Soviet threat and the failure to predict the largest event of the late-20th century, the collapse of Communism. All bureaucracies seek to enlarge their missions, and in true form the end of the cold war led not to a decrease in the number of official secrets, but to a vast increase.

Rereading these books in the light of 9/11, the Iraq war and the Bush administration's current efforts to extend executive power makes one realize the extent to which our current situation is not in the least new. While the nihilistic murder of nearly 3,000 Americans on American soil was unprecedented, the fact remains that both the actual and perceived threat of the late 1940's was much more acute than the one presented by Islamist terrorism today. The Communists controlled a huge nation-state — the Soviet Union — and conquered half of Europe. In 1949 they came to power in the most populous country in the world. The awesome destructive power of nuclear weapons was new; experts at the time confidently predicted that many states would acquire them in short order and that future wars would be nuclear. Americans lived in the shadow not of the destruction of a single city, but of their entire society. And the enemy had agents who could potentially penetrate the country's most elite institutions, something few jihadists can aspire to do today.

All new threats entail huge uncertainties. Then, as now, there was a pronounced tendency to assume the worst, and for the government to claim enormous discretion in protecting the American public. The Bush administration has consistently argued that it needs to be protected from Congressional oversight and media scrutiny. An example is the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance of telephone traffic into and out of the United States. Rather than going to Congress and trying to negotiate changes to the law that regulates such activities, the administration simply grabbed that authority for itself, saying, in effect, "Trust us: if you knew what we know about the threat, you'd be perfectly happy to have us do what we're doing." In other areas, like the holding of prisoners in Guantánamo and interrogation methods used there and in the Middle East, one can only quote Moynihan on an earlier era: "As fears of Communist conspiracies and German subversion mounted, it was the U.S. government's conduct that approached the illegal."

Even if we do not at this juncture know the full scope of the threat we face from jihadist terrorism, it is certainly large enough to justify many changes in the way we conduct our lives, both at home and abroad. But the American government does have a track record in dealing with similar problems in the past, one suggesting that all American institutions — Congress, the courts, the news media — need to do their jobs in scrutinizing official behavior, and not take the easy way out of deferring to the executive. Past experience also suggests that the government would do far better to make public what it knows, as well as the limits of that knowledge, if we are to arrive at a balanced view of the challenges we face today.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US And Europe Reach Draft Air Data Deal (FT)

By Sarah Laitner

Financial Times, October 7, 2006

The FBI and other American anti-terror agencies will have easier access to sensitive personal information on passengers flying from the European Union to the US, under a deal agreed on Friday.

Brussels and Washington struck the fresh concord after weeks of negotiations to replace a controversial pact from 2004 through which the US receives up to 34 pieces of data on air travellers.

That deal was invalidated by the EU's highest court on a legal technicality and expired last Saturday, prompting fears of transatlantic travel chaos.

Negotiations on a new pact had hit a sticking point over Washington's demands for an easing of restrictions on sharing the passenger records among US anti-terror authorities.

Michael Chertoff, head of the US department of homeland security, last month warned that his agency was "handcuffed" by European privacy requirements that had hindered it giving information to other agencies.

But Franco Frattini, EU justice commissioner, on Friday said that he had agreed to allow smoother passage of information between US authorities after Washington gave fresh guarantees over data protection.

Speaking at an EU justice ministers' meeting in Luxembourg, he said: "We are not talking about more data or more exchanges, we are talking about making it easier to transmit data."

In a statement issued after agreement was reached, Mr Chertoff said: "I applaud my counterparts at the European Union for agreeing with me on the importance of sharing this passenger data to defend us against terrorism." He pointedly emphasised the EU and US's "joint goal of combating terrorism while respecting our joint commitment to fundamental rights and freedoms, notably privacy".

Requests from other agencies that might conduct counter-terrorism investigations, such as the US Treasury and the Department of Justice, would have to be examined on a case-by-case basis, EU officials said, and these authorities would not have direct electronic access to the records.

US authorities demand records including name, age, seat preferences and payment details on incoming air travellers as part of toughened measures introduced after the September 11 attacks.

EU officials said that Washington will continue to store the data for up to three and a half years. The US will also retain the right to share the records with other governments, they added.

The court decision to strike down the original concord was an embarrassment to the EU, which spent months crafting the initial deal in the face of concerns over passengers' privacy rights.

A failure last week to establish a new agreement had prompted fears of legal limbo for airlines, amid worries that they would face lawsuits for breaching privacy rights.

The new pact, finalised after a nine-hour video conference, is valid until next July. Brussels and Washington will in November start talks for a longer-term agreement.

U.S. Reaches Deal With EU To Obtain Data From Airlines (WSJ)

By William Echikson And Anne Jolis

DOJ_NMG_0078411

The Wall Street Journal, October 7, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union and the U.S. on Friday reached a deal over the exchange of data on airline passengers.

The agreement was reached after the two sides missed a court-appointed Oct. 1 deadline to renew a 2004 deal under which airlines gave 34 pieces of passenger information to the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

Negotiations collapsed about a week ago when EU negotiators rejected Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's demand to lift restrictions on sharing the passenger data with other U.S. law-enforcement agencies.

"This is positive for the EU -- this will guarantee legal continuity on a very sensitive matter," said EU Security Commissioner Franco Frattini.

Mr. Frattini said Friday's new deal is applicable until the end of July 2007, by which time the two sides will "agree on a more permanent arrangement." Mr. Frattini said the EU agreed to allow Homeland Security to share the data with other U.S. agencies with a "comparable standard of data protection." This includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation and agencies within the Department of Justice.

This will allow the U.S. to "make full use of passenger data," Mr. Chertoff said in a statement Friday.

Trans-Atlantic carriers breathed a sigh of relief at the deal. "The agreement signed today will put an end to a period of uncertainty that was highly uncomfortable both for European carriers and their passengers," said Ulrich Schult-Strathaus, secretary-general of the Association of European Airlines.

The U.S. has acceded to the EU's demand that Homeland Security may no longer directly access the data from the airlines' databases, but will have to request the data from airline authorities.

Under the previous deal, the Department of Homeland Security was able to access the names, addresses and credit-card details of passengers within 15 minutes of a flight's departure for the U.S. Mr. Chertoff added, however, that the new agreement means Homeland Security will receive the data it wants earlier still "when there is an indication that early access could assist in responding to a specific threat."

E.U. Agrees To Ease U.S. Access To Data On Passengers (WP)

By Molly Moore And Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 6 -- European officials agreed Friday to grant U.S. law enforcement and intelligence agencies easier access to detailed personal data on transatlantic air passengers, despite concerns about individual privacy and fears that the information could be misused.

The new pact, replacing one struck down by a European Union court in May, continues arrangements by which all passenger names, credit card numbers and other personal information are passed electronically to the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency.

But it softens various restrictions on when and how that data can be passed to the CIA and other intelligence organizations.

Under the new system, "if we have particular interest in a number of flights, or a specific destination, then we can therefore use that information and share it with other counterterrorism agencies," said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, which includes the customs and border agency.

The data request must have some "specificity," he said, such as the recent alleged plot to bomb airliners flying from London. In that case, passenger information on flights from Britain to the United States could be shared with the FBI, he said.

The Europeans insisted on certain data protection safeguards. The U.S. agencies sharing the information, for instance, may retain the data for no more than 3 1/2 years, the same limit that applies to the border protection agency. And not everything that an airline knows about a passenger -- special meal requests, for instance -- will be turned over.

Many Europeans, living in countries with some of the most stringent privacy protections in the world, have been critical of what they perceive as U.S. efforts to usurp privacy of personal data, banking records and other information as part of attempts to identify potential terrorists.

In 2004, the European Commission -- the E.U.'s executive arm -- approved an agreement with the United States on the transfer of passenger data. But the European Parliament -- the E.U.'s elected lawmaking body -- challenged the deal in court, leading to it being overturned in May.

Pierre Sellal, France's permanent representative to the E.U., told reporters Friday that the new arrangement, reached after a nine-hour, transatlantic video conference, "permits the United States to protect against terrorist attack, but at the same time safeguards the essential liberties of passengers."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff offered a similar view.

But some European officials remain skeptical of the new agreement, which requires airlines to provide the data to the U.S. government on flights heading to the United States within 15 minutes of takeoff.

"The E.U. has once again caved in to U.S. pressure at the expense of E.U. citizens' civil liberties," Cem Oezdemir, a German member of the European Parliament, said in a statement released in Brussels. He said the new accord "allows the continued plundering of E.U. passengers' personal information."

"It's clear that the U.S. government continues to want more data than it needs to screen passengers and that it wants to use the data for purposes other than simply keeping dangerous people off of airplanes and in this agreement it has made some steps in that direction," said Jim Dempsey, policy director for the Washington-based Center for Democracy and Technology.

Since the court ruling in May, airlines have been operating in a legal limbo, subject to possible lawsuits from passengers alleging privacy violations and facing potential fines or landing-rights refusals from the United States if they fail to provide the data.

"This is an important agreement that will ensure normal operations for the 105,000 passengers who fly between these two jurisdictions each day," Giovanni Bisignani, director general of the International Air Transport Association, said in a statement.

The new agreement does not change the type of information to be provided on each passenger. It will include name, address, credit card information, frequent flier number, telephone and e-mail contacts and the history of the person's no-shows for flights.

E.U. officials said that airlines would not have to provide data that could be used to identify racial origin, political opinions, health and sex life. Meal orders, for instance, could help identify a passenger's religious or ethnic background.

Nakashima reported from Washington.

Report Cites Watch List Errors (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct 6 — Thousands of people have been mistakenly linked to names on terrorist watch lists when they crossed the border, boarded commercial airliners or were stopped for traffic violations, a government report said Friday.

More than 30,000 airline passengers have asked just one agency — the Transportation Security Administration — to have their names cleared from the lists, according to the Government Accountability Office report.

Separately, the National Security News Service and "60 Minutes" reported that the no-fly lists contain the names of 14 of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers; Evo Morales, the president of Bolivia; Nabih Berri, the speaker of Lebanon's Parliament; and Saddam Hussein.

In a statement released Friday, the F.B.I. denied that either Mr. Morales or Mr. Berri were on the list.

The list also contains such generic names as Gary Smith, John Williams and Robert Johnson. When "60 Minutes" spoke with 12 people named Robert Johnson, it reported, all said that they are detained almost every time they fly.

But the list did not have the names of any of the 11 British suspects charged with trying to blow up airliners with liquid explosives.

Probe Of Anthrax Attacks Casts Shadow On Brothers (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

CHESTER, Pa. -- On Nov. 15, 2001, Irshad and Masood Shaikh found themselves standing under the darkest cloud imaginable: The brothers had become suspects in the worst bioterrorism attack in American history.

DOJ_NMG_0078413

An FBI SWAT team battered down their front door, pointed semiautomatic rifles at Irshad's wife and carried out the first raid on a private home in the federal investigation of the anthrax attacks. Agents in moon suits carted out the Shaikhs' computers, medicines and books and swabbed the television set for anthrax spores.

But the FBI had acted on a bad tip. By every account available, agents found no evidence implicating the brothers, who are widely respected public health experts.

Since then, the Shaikhs have suffered consequences great and small. Irshad Shaikh, 44, who is Chester's health commissioner and has worked on humanitarian missions in Iraq and Afghanistan with U.S. officials, has been blocked by the FBI from obtaining a federal contract with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Immigration officials canceled his scheduled interview for U.S. citizenship. And whenever Irshad returns to the United States from abroad, federal agents escort him off the airplane and interrogate him for hours.

Masood Shaikh, 46, serves as the Chester city epidemiologist. Like Irshad, he obtained a medical degree in Pakistan and a master's degree and a doctorate in public health from Johns Hopkins University. Two years ago, Masood was selected to work on removing land mines from Iraq. But the federal government refused to extend Masood's work visa pending a "security clearance." The clearance never came through, and Masood could not leave the country.

Masood, once poised to apply for American citizenship, now faces the expiration of his work visa and a return to Pakistan after 15 years in the United States.

The brothers acknowledge that they cannot prove that the government is behind every one of these roadblocks, but they point to a pattern.

"Our whole life has been turned upside down since 9/11," Irshad said by telephone from Cairo, where he is working with the World Health Organization. "For God's sake, they are welcome to search my house anytime. I will give them the key."

No one could argue with the FBI's urgency in trying to find the anthrax killers. The mail attacks in September and October 2001 claimed five lives and left 17 people gravely ill. The assailant possessed one of the deadliest bioweapons, and, with the slightest tweak in delivery, the anthrax spores might have caused tens of thousands of deaths. As the years passed and the FBI turned its searchlight on half a dozen people, careers and lives have been shattered.

The FBI designated Steven J. Hatfill, a Washington infectious disease researcher, as "a person of interest," and Louisiana State University dismissed him in 2004. In August 2004, FBI teams searched the home of Kenneth Berry, a New York physician who held three patents related to bioterrorism. He has lost his job and now lives in New Jersey.

Neither Hatfill nor Berry has been charged with a crime. Both vehemently deny any involvement with the anthrax letters, and Hatfill has sued the Justice Department.

But few suspects so unequivocally lack any connection to anthrax research as do the Shaikh brothers. They have never done biowarfare research. Their attorney, former prosecutor Anthony F. List, describes a Kafkaesque maze in which federal officials argue that they cannot be expected to "clear" men who, officially, are accused of nothing.

Spokesmen for the FBI, the U.S. attorney's office and the Department of Homeland Security say they are prohibited by federal law from talking about anyone even tangentially connected to a criminal investigation.

"This office has made no allegations regarding the Shaikhs," said Richard Manieri, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. "The Justice Department . . . typically doesn't announce when an investigation is closed or comment on the status."

List says prosecutors gave him Web addresses for federal inspectors general, but that is an uncertain path, and appeals can take years. "My clients are committed public servants," List said. "They don't have years to get on with their lives."

The Shaikh brothers grew up in Islamabad, Pakistan, in what they described as a secular and upper-middle-class family -- nine of their cousins are doctors. They immigrated to the United States and attended Johns Hopkins; Irshad was a Fulbright scholar.

In Chester, a working-class city of 36,000 just south of Philadelphia on the Delaware River, many residents view the Shaikh brothers with something approaching reverence. Irshad has served as health commissioner since 1994. On holidays, the brothers would volunteer to run the animal-control truck, picking up dead dogs and deer.

DOJ_NMG_0078414

"We are very lucky to be the beneficiaries of their talents," said Chester City Council member Monir Z. Ahmed. "They've had a thousand opportunities to hurt people right here in Chester, and all they do is help us."

Then came the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The anthrax mailings began a week later. When Irshad heard a knock at his office door Nov. 15 and found four federal agents waiting, he was not surprised, he recalls.

"Muslim? Pakistani? Unfortunately we have all these characteristics," Irshad said. "I understand that. We are not angry, we are not resentful. This was logical."

The FBI smashed through the door of his house and found Irshad's wife, a dentist, asleep in bed. They handcuffed her at gunpoint. Other agents burst into the downstairs office, which was rented by the AIDS Care Group of Chester.

"They handcuffed our carpenter," recalled physician Howell Strauss. "One agent asked about the white dust -- I explained it was from the Sheetrocking. Then they took away our Elmer's glue for testing. I told them, 'You've been surveilling this house for weeks, and this is what you do?' I'll never have the same faith in our government."

Half a year later, Irshad Shaikh took a job with the Vietnam Veterans of America Foundation, running a mortality survey in Afghanistan. He worked closely with State Department officials. Later, the CDC asked Irshad to work in Atlanta and analyze the data, but the FBI insisted that he could not set foot in the federal offices, a ban that at least one senior CDC administrator protested, according to a federal official.

In June 2003, Irshad served as a leader with the Emergency Mine Action Survey in Iraq under the auspices of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority. He was responsible for securing and removing ammunition stockpiles, working closely with Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus and Brig. Gen. Frank G. Helmick of the Army's 101st Airborne Division. Irshad proudly e-mailed a photo of himself in a Black Hawk helicopter. He's sitting shoulder to shoulder with Helmick.

When Irshad returned to the United States, agents escorted him off the airplane. "You know what the other passengers are thinking: 'Terrorist!' " Irshad said.

Irshad and his wife have decided it is wiser to stay overseas in Cairo with WHO until the matter blows over -- although, for the first time, he has started saying, " If this blows over . . ."

"I decided to live this difficult exile," he said. "I know we are collateral damage. But we know, we believe , that fairness will prevail in our adopted country."

He paused.

"I would like say, respectfully, please let us get on with our lives."

The phone clicked off. Masood, sitting in their attorney's office listening to the conversation, shrugged. Irshad is the family optimist. "I came to this country hoping I could work and have a good career," Masood said. "My brothers still has some hope. I'm losing mine."

Bush Balks At Criteria For FEMA Director (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

President Bush reserved the right to ignore key changes in Congress's overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency -- including a requirement to appoint someone with experience handling disasters as the agency's head -- in setting aside dozens of provisions contained in a major homeland security spending bill this week.

Besides objecting to Congress's list of qualifications for FEMA's director, the White House also claimed the right to edit or withhold reports to Congress by a watchdog agency within the Department of Homeland Security that is responsible for protecting Americans' personal privacy.

The standards for the FEMA director were inspired by criticism of former FEMA chief Michael D. Brown's performance after Hurricane Katrina last year. Brown, a lawyer and judge of Arabian horses, had no experience in disaster response before joining FEMA.

Bush's moves came in a controversial assertion of executive authority known as a "signing statement," which the White House issued late Wednesday, the same day the president signed the $34.8 billion measure. Congress has assailed the unprecedented extent of Bush's use of signing statements to reinterpret or repudiate measures approved by lawmakers instead of exercising a formal veto.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said the actions, first reported by the Associated Press, upheld the president's right to choose his advisers and control executive branch activities.

"There's nothing new here. The president has the authority to choose which of his subordinate officers he'll rely on," Fratto said. "The president has the authority to determine what the relationship is between them."

Lawmakers in both parties -- Democrats more harshly than Republicans -- said Bush was ignoring precedent and neglecting lessons of the bungled response to Katrina.

"Amazingly, President Bush continues to show more interest in expanding his executive power than in running the government in a fair, effective and competent manner," said Rep. Martin O. Sabo (Minn.), ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security.

A spokesman for Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who chaired a House Katrina investigation, said the White House is slighting Congress and ignoring the political toll of Brown's incompetence and ties to GOP cronies.

"Davis hopes the White House isn't saying they don't understand the need for minimal qualifications, or that they might bypass them. If indeed they are, then we haven't come very far from the days of 'Heck of a job, Brownie,' " Davis spokesman David Marin said, in a reference to Bush's early praise for Brown. "Good luck getting someone confirmed who doesn't meet these standards."

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate's Katrina investigation, said its findings showed that the president needs a principal adviser for emergency management, as he has on military matters in the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Congress sets job requirements for officials from the U.S. solicitor general to the director of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, she said. They are comparable to the five years of management experience and demonstrated emergency-management skills it mandated for the head of FEMA, she said. The director also should be allowed to make recommendations directly to Congress, she said, authority that the White House rejected.

"Congress needs a forthright assessment of the state of the nation's preparedness from the FEMA director," Collins said.

The White House also reserved the right to withhold or alter reports of a unit that monitors DHS use of Americans' personal information in background checks, employment screening and air travel, among other things.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, warned against muzzling the office, as DHS emerges as "the central hub for the integration" of government databases containing that information.

The DHS Privacy Office's last report to Congress covered activities up to June 2004. DHS spokesman Larry Orluskie said a new report, updated through this June, will be sent to the White House for review in coming days and is expected to be made public in about a week.

New Orleans Population Is Reduced Nearly 60% (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 6 — The city's population has dropped by nearly 60 percent since Hurricane Katrina, far more sharply than recent optimistic estimates had suggested, according to an authoritative post-storm survey released this week.

The population of New Orleans is now only 187,525, well under half the pre-storm population of 454,863, according to the survey, commissioned by several state agencies. The United States Census Bureau and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention advised those who carried out the door-to-door population count this summer.

"We actually knocked on doors and asked how many people lived there," said Dr. Alden Henderson of the centers. About 490 households were surveyed, and researchers went to more than 1,100 dwellings, he said.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin has suggested that about half of New Orleans's former residents had returned, basing his projections partly on utility users. But the new numbers indicate that repopulation will take awhile to reach that level.

"The recovery is going to be slower than we anticipated," said David Bowman, an official with the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which helped commission the survey. "It's going to take time to get the housing stock back online."

The margin of error for the survey was relatively high, plus or minus 12 percentage points.

The new figures also suggest that many more whites than blacks have returned to New Orleans. The white and black populations here are now separated by less than three percentage points, according to the survey — a gap much smaller than previously thought, and far less than the pre-hurricane divide, when New Orleans was 67 percent black. Whites now make up 44 percent of the population and blacks 46 percent, according to the new survey.

For months, neighborhood activists and housing advocates have suggested that the city's African-American population has had a difficult time re-establishing itself. Much of the rental housing was destroyed by the storm, rents have risen significantly and federal housing aid has barely begun to flow. The new numbers appear to bear out these concerns. They also suggest that the relatively high black vote in last spring's city elections — as much as 57 percent of the electorate — was elevated by citizens making the trip specifically to vote.

Still, officials expect these population figures to go up, eventually. More than 11,000 people from New Orleans have applied for federal rebuilding aid through the state's Road Home program. Some 80,000 housing units were destroyed in Orleans Parish alone, and their reconstruction has hardly begun.

The new population count has taken analysts here somewhat aback.

"The conventional wisdom was higher," said Richard Campanella, a Tulane University geographer. "It's a little bit of a disappointment. I don't question the numbers, that's for sure. This is the most authoritative survey yet."

Though officials acknowledged the new survey might not fully account for all of the city's daytime population — many are still commuting in to work on their houses — they emphasized that it was likely to be far more reliable than previous efforts, which relied on measures like school enrollment and electricity use.

WAR NEWS:

Warner's Iraq Remarks Surprise White House (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — The White House, caught off guard by a leading Republican senator who said the situation in Iraq was "drifting sideways," responded cautiously on Friday, with a spokeswoman for President Bush stopping short of saying outright that Mr. Bush disagreed with the assessment.

"I don't believe that the president thinks that way," Dana Perino, the deputy White House press secretary, said when asked whether the president agreed with the senator, John Warner of Virginia. "I think that he believes that while it is tough going in Iraq, that slow progress is being made."

Ms. Perino's carefully worded response underscores the delicate situation that Mr. Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has created for the White House just one month before an election in which Mr. Bush has been trying to shift the national debate from the war in Iraq to the broader war on terror.

Speaking to reporters on Thursday after returning from a trip that included a one-day stop in Baghdad, Mr. Warner said the United States should consider "a change of course" if the violence there did not diminish soon. He did not specify what shift might be necessary, but said that the American military had done what it could to stabilize Iraq and that no policy options should be taken "off the table."

With the blessing of the White House, a high-level commission led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, is already reviewing American policy in Iraq. But the commission is not scheduled to report to Mr. Bush and Congress until after the November elections, a timeline that the White House had hoped would enable Mr. Bush to avoid public discussion of any change of course until after voters determine which party will control Congress next year.

Now, Mr. Warner's comments are pushing up that timeline, forcing Republicans to confront the issue before some are ready. In an interview on Friday, Senator Susan Collins, a Maine Republican who has been critical of the administration's approach in the past, said there was a "growing sense of unease" among other Republicans, which she said could deepen because of Senator Warner's comments.

DOJ_NMG_0078417

Ms. Collins, who is the chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, echoed Mr. Warner's calls for a shift in strategy in Iraq. "When Chairman Warner, who has been a steadfast ally of this administration, calls for a new strategy," she said, "that is clearly significant."

She said the current approach, which she attributed to Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, had not led to an overall reduction in violence or any prospect that American troop levels would come down soon.

"We've heard over and over that as Iraqis stand up, our troops will stand down," Ms. Collins said. "Well, there are now hundreds of thousands of Iraqi troops and security forces, and yet we have not seen any reduction in violence."

Democrats, who have been using their fall election campaigns to tap into intense voter dissatisfaction with the way that Mr. Bush has handled Iraq, quickly seized on the Warner remarks, circulating them in e-mail messages to reporters. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, convened a conference call on Friday afternoon to hammer home the theme that even Republicans believed that the administration must change course. "Warner's statement is an important, important statement and, I hope, a turning point," Mr. Biden told reporters.

He that at least two Republican colleagues other than Mr. Warner had told him that once the election was over, they would join with Democrats in working on a bipartisan plan for bringing stability to Iraq. Echoing Mr. Warner's language, he said, "I wouldn't take any option off the table at this time. We are at the point of no return."

The White House said Friday that Mr. Bush had not spoken to Mr. Warner about his comments, and otherwise insisted that it had not glossed over the problems in Iraq. During her afternoon briefing, Ms. Perino harked back to a speech in late August in which, she said, the president said Iraq was at a "crucial moment." She said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had put forth the same message during her unannounced visit to Baghdad this week.

Later in the day, the White House circulated an e-mail message titled "Iraq Update: Political Progress," citing comments of other lawmakers, including Democrats, who had returned from the Middle East with more hopeful assessments than the one offered by Mr. Warner.

Senator Warner Has Grim View Of Iraq (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 7, 2006

U.S. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, returned from Baghdad with a grim outlook on how things are going there.

Normally a supporter of Bush policies in Iraq, Warner now says he believes in giving Iraqi leaders 90 days to make progress against insurgents.

Otherwise, the United States will need to make some "bold" moves, he told the Virginia Pilot. He did not elaborate.

Rice Urges Kurds To Work For Peaceful, Unified Iraq (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, October 7, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met the leaders of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, urging them to cooperate with Iraqi Arabs in building a peaceful and unified country.

Rice dropped in on Kurdish regional president Massud Barzani in Arbil, his northern capital, after an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital Baghdad, which is in the grip of a brutal sectarian conflict.

"The Kurdish people will ... certainly be better served if Baghdad and its surrounding areas are stable and democratic," Rice told reporters at a joint press conference with Barzani.

"We had a very good discussion about the national reconciliation process and the vision of unified democratic Iraq that is stable, that is at peace and at peace with its neighbors," she said.

Grateful for US support in throwing off the yoke of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein, Iraq's Kurds have put their long-cherished dreams of independence on hold while the Baghdad government struggles to rebuild the war torn country.

But separatist tensions are never far from the surface, and fierce rows have recently erupted over the banning of Iraq's national flag in the north and the Kurdish government's determination to develop its own oil industry.

Washington fears a Kurdish declaration of independence would accelerate the possible disintegration of Iraq and knows it would be bound to anger regional ally Turkey, which has a restive Kurdish minority of its own.

Kurdish leaders regularly warn that they will secede if the rights of their region -- a union of three Iraqi provinces which has been broadly autonomous since 1991 -- are trampled on by the Arab-led Baghdad administration.

This threat reared its head again last week, when the Kurds announced the development of a new oil field, amid complaints from the central government that it should be consulted before deals are signed with foreign firms.

Barzani's oil minister furiously rejected federal oversight of oil contracts, and repeated the threat to declare independence.

Rice tried to calm the oil row during her visit.

"Our view... which I think most Iraqis agree with, is that oil needs to be a unifying factor and not one that would help to make the country less unified," she told reporters late Thursday.

Barzani said after meeting Rice: "We are for a fair distribution of oil revenues for the Iraqis."

Meanwhile, officials in Baghdad confirmed that a Kurdish lawmaker in Iraq's national parliament had been kidnapped and murdered during Rice's visit, which came after Monday's breakthrough pledge by Iraq's political factions to work together to halt the bloodshed.

Rice met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and senior leaders from both sides of Iraq's bitter sectarian divide between Sunni and Shiite factions.

"The mass murders have shocked the people," Maliki said on Iraqi television, insisting that the reconciliation initiative was not reached under foreign pressure "but by the will of the Iraqis."

The violence convulsing the capital was in full evidence for Rice's visit, with 16 US soldiers killed since Monday. A rocket attack on the airport upon her arrival forced her military C-130 transport plane to spend 45 minutes circling the airfield.

Rice departed Arbil after a delay of more than two hours due to aircraft problems and headed to London for a meeting of six major powers on whether to urge the United Nations to slap sanctions on Iran over its suspect nuclear programme.

The Iraqi authorities, meanwhile, declared a total curfew Friday evening in the northern oil city of Kirkuk, shutting down entrances to the city for an undisclosed period of time, police said.

"This operation comes within the context of a new security being implemented by Iraqi forces in Kirkuk," said Captain Emad Jassem Khidr of Kirkuk police.

Police said they had collected 35 corpses over a period of 24 hours in Baghdad, mostly in the Sunni western half of the city.

The bodies bore the tell tale markings of Baghdad's grim sectarian war with signs of torture and bullet wounds to the head.

Rice Appeals To Oil-rich Kurdish North (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

Convinced oil revenue is the long-term key to economic independence for a unified Iraq, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appealed Friday for cooperation from the autonomous and oil rich Kurdish north.

Rice visited the region's powerful president, Massoud Barzani, less than two weeks after the regional government threatened to break away from Iraq in a dispute over oil.

After a session with their staff, followed by a lengthy one-on-one meeting at the Kurdish government offices in Irbil, Rice and Barzani stood in front of U.S. and Kurdish flags and spoke to reporters.

Barzani, speaking in Kurdish through an interpreter, said Kurdistan, "like any other nation, has the right to self-determination." However, he said he is committed to a "federal democratic and pluralistic Iraq."

For her part, Rice thanked Barzani for the Kurds' long cooperation with the United States, adding, "and I appreciate also your important participation in the process of national reconciliation. Thank you."

When he was asked about the future distribution of oil wealth, Barzani did not repeat recent assertions that Kurdistan alone should control new contracts and business arrangements for oil pumped in the region. But at the same time, he gave no endorsement of proposed national legislation on dividing up income from oil.

DOJ_NMG_0078419

Rice's two-day trip to Iraq is meant to show U.S. support for the country's fragile central government, under assault by a spiral of sectarian violence and growing calls for autonomy among Iraq's regions.

And while she said the administration is always reviewing its policies in Iraq, she said it would not halt its backing for the country's struggling government.

"The option that the President has been very clear that he is not reviewing is beginning to somehow remove American support for this regime, for this new government in Iraq, before it's able to do the job on its own," she told reporters as they flew to London for a meeting on Iran's nuclear program.

Rice's departure from Irbil was delayed Friday, leaving unclear how much progress would be made at the London session.

Rice had to wait about two hours for a replacement plane because of mechanical problems discovered in the C-17 military transport that was supposed to ferry her to Turkey, where another jet was waiting to fly her to London.

The delay meant Rice would arrive late for a meeting with foreign ministers from Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China. The group still planned to meet but would be unable to finish its business and refer Iran to the U.N. Security Council on Friday as had been expected, said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, who was traveling with the secretary.

In Iraq, fears of Kurdish secession have risen in recent weeks, especially when Barzani briefly banned the display of the Iraqi flag in government buildings.

The oil dispute reflects the larger fight over federal control in Iraq.

Although the parliament briefly averted a crisis over the Kurdish threat last month, leaders have been unable to pass a federal law on the distribution of oil wealth

The U.S. and other international backers want quick action on a law that would streamline the complicated oil sector, attract foreign investment and provide for equitable distribution of oil profits across Iraq.

Oil is still pumping at prewar levels more than three years after the invasion that toppled the former president of Iraq, Saddam Hussein.

Oil resources are now governed by vague terms in the national constitution written last year.

Energy analysts estimate oil revenues make up more than 95 percent of Iraq's domestic budget.

Since the Gulf War of 1991 the Kurdish north had been out of Saddam's control and the Kurds established their autonomous region under U.S. and British protection. After the U.S.-led invasion and occupation of Iraq, Kurdistan was the only region that did not witness major changes.

Iraq's new constitution recognizes Kurdish self-rule and provides a legal mechanism for other areas to govern themselves but within the Iraqi state.

Sunni Arabs, who had enjoyed control over Iraq under Saddam, now fear the Kurdish push for secession under the nation's new federal system. Should the Shiite majority in the oil-rich south follow suit, the Sunnis would find themselves with little more than date groves and sand.

Kurds Show Signs Of Seceding From Iraq (AP)

By Yahya Barzanji, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 7, 2006

With violence bloodying Iraq, Kurds in the peaceful north have been showing signs of going their own way, raising their own flag and even hinting they could secede in a dispute over oil wealth — moves that have alarmed Shiites and Sunnis.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's visit to Kurdistan on Friday underlined American worries that Kurds may be pushing too hard too soon for autonomy powers at a time of increasing sectarian tensions.

Kurds insist they are only using the autonomous powers given to them by the constitution passed last year that laid down a federal system in Iraq. But many of those powers — particularly the division of oil wealth — remain vague.

Some Shiites are also pressing for their own autonomous region in the south, but even mere talk of federalism — amid a wave of Shiite-Sunni violence that has killed thousands this year — has raised fears of the country falling apart.

DOJ_NMG_0078420

"I warn those who back federal regions," a top Sunni Arab cleric, Harith al-Obeidi, said in his prayer sermon Friday in a Baghdad mosque. "They should think about security in Baghdad before claiming that federalism will provide security for the regions. ... Federalism in its current form will lead to the division of Iraq."

Sunnis in particular worry that a breakup of the country will create strong Shiite and Kurdish regions in the south and north — where Iraq's oil wealth is concentrated — and leave Sunnis in an impoverished central zone with no resources.

Backing for independence has always been strong in the autonomous zone in Iraq's northernmost three provinces, where the majority of the country's 5 million Kurds live. They have enjoyed self-rule since 1991.

While much of the rest of Iraq has been torn by violence, Kurdistan has remained largely at peace. Sunni and Shiite Arabs who want to enter Kurdistan must go through elaborate permit procedures — still, many have flocked there seeking jobs in one of Iraq's few areas that see significant private investment.

Kurdistan's president, Massoud Barzani, sparked an outcry last month when he ordered all Iraqi flags removed from government buildings in the region and replaced with the Kurdistan flag — a green, red and white tricolor with a yellow sun.

The Kurdish flags remain in place, and Barzani refuses to raise the Iraqi one — a holdover from the rule of Saddam Hussein, who persecuted the minority Kurds and Iraq's Shiite majority — until a new national flag is created representing all of the country's communities.

Kurdish oil deals have also raised concerns in Baghdad. The Kurdistan government signed a series of agreements with foreign companies to develop new oil fields this year. Over the summer, a Canadian-Turkish consortium drilled a test well in the area of Taq Taq, between Sulaimaniyah and Irbil.

Oil Minister Hussain al-Shahristani said the central government would review contracts signed separately by the Kurdistan government — drawing a sharp warning from the region's prime minister, who said if Baghdad moves in on Kurdish deals it would fuel independence sentiment.

"The people of Kurdistan chose to be in a voluntary union with Iraq on the basis of the constitution," Prime Minister Nechirvan Barzani said in a statement issued Sept. 28. "If Baghdad ministers refuse to abide by that constitution, the people of Kurdistan reserve the right to reconsider our choice."

At a news conference with Rice in the Kurdish city of Irbil, Barzani underlined that Kurdistan, "like any other nation, has the right to self-determination." However, he said he is committed to a "federal, democratic and pluralistic Iraq."

For her part, Rice told Barzani, "I appreciate also your important participation in the process of national reconciliation."

Kurdish officials insisted they would move ahead with developing their oil sector, arguing the constitution gives them the right to do so.

"We will continue in exploring the oil resources in Kurdistan in accordance with articles in the constitution that allow each region to exploit its resources," Kamal Kirkoukli, deputy president of the Kurdistan parliament, told The Associated Press.

But the constitution remains vague on sharing oil wealth. It calls for a fair distribution, but also gives regions a hand in developing new oil fields. Parliament has been debating legislation on dividing oil wealth, but has yet to pass a law.

Kirkoukli and other Kurdish officials dismissed worries of the Kurds pressing a bid to secede.

"This is nothing new. ... They always accuse the Kurds that they want to break up Iraq," said Saadi Ahmed Pira, the Irbil chief of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, one of the region's two main parties. "Today in the Iraqi government, there are strange voices of Arab chauvinism and they mirror the ideas of the previous Saddam government."

"The Kurds' decision not to withdraw from Iraq is not for the sake of the Sunnis," he said. "In the current political situation, the Kurds have chosen to live in a united federal Iraq."

Rice Tells Kurds That Unity Is Key (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Their security rests with closer ties to fellow Iraqis, not to their friend the U.S., she says.

DOJ_NMG_0078421

IRBIL, Iraq — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged restless Iraqi Kurds to seek their future in a closer alliance with other Iraqis, as she visited the country's relatively peaceful Kurdistan region Friday for talks with regional President Massoud Barzani.

Meanwhile, political and sectarian violence continued to afflict the rest of the nation. Kurds condemned Thursday's abduction and slaying of a Kurdish lawmaker in Baghdad, a probable sectarian attack, and a Danish soldier was killed in southern Iraq. At least 20 Iraqi civilians were reported killed in bombings and shootings around the country, Iraqi officials said.

Rice declared that Iraq's minority Kurds, who suffered greatly under the rule of Saddam Hussein, can find their best security guarantee not from their powerful ally, the Americans, but from the Iraqi Constitution.

The efforts of Iraq's new government to revise the constitution and better develop a federal system "is one that can, within the framework of a united Iraq, protect and defend the rights of all people," she said in an appearance with Barzani at his offices in Irbil, in northern Iraq.

Barzani, president of the Kurdistan regional government, spoke publicly in terms likely to please Rice, saying Kurds are committed to working within the federal system and will share oil revenue from wells discovered in their region.

"Our views were very similar, and we have pledged that we will continue in our efforts in our cooperation to implement the process that we have started, until we establish a federal, democratic, pluralistic Iraq, an Iraq which will be free from terrorism and terrorists," Barzani said.

Despite the apparent harmony, U.S. officials are concerned by issues now swirling in Kurdistan, the least violent and most pro-American part of Iraq.

Many Kurds want the region to secede, especially as they see sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Arabs to the south on the rise.

There has been growing tension with Turkey, which has attacked members of the separatist Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, within Iraq's borders. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, recently warned that if Iraq's neighbors, including Turkey, sought to undermine the sovereignty of the country, Iraqis could reciprocate.

Kurds are also at odds with fellow Iraqis over how to divide oil revenue. Some Kurds think money from newly developed fields should be spent in Kurdistan, not turned over to the federal treasury. The constitution is vague on that point.

Barzani, asked for his view on the issue, said that as the constitution provides, "we are [for] a fair distribution of the oil revenues all over Iraq."

Rice didn't mention the issue during her appearance, but earlier in the week she said the United States favored an equal distribution of oil wealth to all segments of the country.

The dispute has exacerbated tensions between Kurds and those Iraqis who favor a strong role for the central government in allocating energy revenue. The conflict is often played out violently on the streets of the oil-rich northern city of Kirkuk, where U.S. and Iraqi forces Friday imposed a new curfew in an effort to stem a string of bombings and assassinations.

Danish military officials said a soldier was slain in fighting in Basra.

Violence has been a constant in Baghdad, where Mohammed Redha Mohammed, a Kurdish member of parliament, and a bodyguard were abducted Thursday and later found dead. The two were kidnapped as they left the offices of a prominent Sunni charity.

Such killings are often carried out by sectarian death squads suspected of having ties to Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces. U.S. and Iraqi officials consider the Shiite gangs the most destabilizing element in the civil warfare that has gripped much of central Iraq.

The 1,200-man 8th Brigade of the Interior Ministry was taken off Baghdad's streets this week amid charges of complicity or cooperation with Shiite death squads. But at a news briefing Friday, U.S. Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, the officer in charge of training Iraqi police, called that move an "isolated incident."

The 8th Brigade has had a bad reputation for months, he said, and he commended Iraqi police, noting that 4,000 officers have been killed and 8,000 wounded since August 2004.

Iraqi forces have made significant progress under the current government, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0078422

"A year ago we had a situation where a police station was attacked and policemen were running out the back door leaving all the equipment," he said. "That does not occur anymore. Our policemen are more confident."

But Iraqis continue to express grave doubts about the government and its security forces.

"These days the Iraqi people are being slaughtered, and the politicians are only concerned about how to divide Iraq, to make one part for a particular sect," Hareth Ubaidi of the Sunni Nawaf Mosque in Baghdad told worshipers gathered for Friday prayers.

"All of this is preparing for a sectarian war."

Richter reported from Irbil and Daragahi from Baghdad. Times staff writers and special correspondents in Baghdad, Diwaniya, Kirkuk and near Basra contributed to this report.

Afghanistan: Five Years Later (WP)

By Donald H. Rumsfeld

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

On Oct. 7, 2001, President Bush spoke from the Treaty Room of the White House to announce the beginning of Operation Enduring Freedom, a mission designed to disrupt and destroy al-Qaeda operations in Afghanistan and the regime that had harbored and supported Osama bin Laden's terrorist network.

It was never going to be an easy mission. Afghanistan was among the world's poorest nations, with little political or economic infrastructure. Nearly three decades of war, drought and a Soviet occupation by hundreds of thousands of troops had yielded a broken, lawless nation.

Yet from halfway around the world -- with but a few weeks' notice -- coalition forces were charged with securing a landlocked, mountainous country that history had dubbed the "graveyard" of great powers.

Given the circumstances, it is not surprising that military experts and columnists raised the specter of Vietnam and "quagmires" -- both before and during combat operations. They cited the forbidding terrain, brutal weather and the Soviet Union's total failure.

Within weeks of our launching combat operations, however, the Taliban regime had been defeated, consigning yet another cruel regime to the dustbin of history. Coalition forces took control of Kabul, and since then the Afghan people have fashioned a new constitution and successfully held the first democratic presidential election in their long history.

Now, five years after the start of Operation Enduring Freedom, another signpost has been marked on Afghanistan's long, difficult road to stability: NATO took control of security operations for the entire country on Thursday, as well as the 24 Provincial Reconstruction Teams that are strengthening infrastructure across the nation.

This is an unprecedented moment for the NATO alliance. In 2001 NATO forces were for the first time deployed beyond their traditional European borders. Today the number of troops in Afghanistan from nations besides the United States has reached more than 20,000 -- to add to the approximately 21,000 American troops serving there.

Not all the news about Afghanistan is encouraging. There is, for example, the legitimate worry that increased poppy production could be a destabilizing factor. And rising violence in southern Afghanistan is real.

President Hamid Karzai, speaking with President Bush recently at the White House, acknowledged the difficulties: "Afghanistan is a country that is emerging out of so many years of war and destruction. . . . We lost almost two generations to the lack of education. . . . We know our problems. We have difficulties. But Afghanistan also knows where the problem is."

The problem, he said, is poverty and extremism. Success requires a strong and capable Afghan government that can provide services and opportunities for all its people.

During the active combat or conventional phase of any war, there are clear signs of progress: battles won, key strategic points taken, enemy forces captured or killed. In the post-battle phase, however, the measure of progress is not as clear -- especially in a war such as the Global War on Terror, which relies so heavily on the development of civic institutions in places that have known little more than war and destitution.

And yet, for all of the challenges the Afghan people face, there are many promising indicators. Among them:

DOJ_NMG_0078423

Â· Security: The Afghan National Army has grown to more than 30,000, with approximately 1,000 soldiers added each month. The Afghan National Police now number more than 46,000. Afghan forces were successful in providing security for the two national elections held since 2004.

Â· Economy: The size of Afghanistan's economy has tripled in the past five years and is projected to increase another 20 percent next year. Between 2003 and 2004, government revenue increased 70 percent, to $300 million. Coca-Cola recently opened a $25 million bottling plant in Kabul, and other large multinational companies are considering opportunities in Afghanistan.

Â· Education: In the past five years, more than 42 million school textbooks have been printed and distributed, and some 50,000 Afghan teachers have been trained. Almost 600 schools have been built, and now more than 5 million children attend school, a 500 percent increase from 2001.

Â· Health care: In 2001 only 8 percent of Afghans had access to at least basic health care; at least 80 percent do today. Some 5 million Afghan children have been vaccinated.

Â· Infrastructure: Thousands of kilometers of roads have been built or improved since the Taliban fell. Since 2004, 25 provincial courthouses have been built and hundreds of judges trained.

Building a new nation is never a straight, steady climb upward. Today can sometimes look worse than yesterday -- or even two months ago. What matters is the overall trajectory: Where do things stand today when compared to what they were five years ago?

In Afghanistan, the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one.

The writer is secretary of defense.

Rumsfeld Cites Progress In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, October 7, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that despite Afghanistan's rising opium production and violence in the south, "the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one" five years after the Taliban's fall.

Rumsfeld, in an opinion piece in Saturday's edition of The Washington Post, said Afghanistan's economy has tripled in five years, its forces have grown by 1,000 soldiers a month, the number of students in school has grown fivefold and 80 percent of the population has access to basic health care, up from 8 percent.

Ticking off more progress, he cited the building of 25 courthouses, a 70 percent jump in revenue and even Coca-Cola's opening of a $25 million bottling plant in Kabul.

"Building a new nation is never a straight, steady climb upward," he wrote. "Today can sometimes look worse than yesterday — or even two months ago. What matters is the overall trajectory."

Rumsfeld touched on only a few of the setbacks, including a surge in the drug production that the Taliban had almost wiped out five years earlier.

But the defense secretary glossed over other dangers: The Taliban has taken control large parts of the countryside, more than 3,000 people have been killed in rising violence this year, and militants have been assassinating political figures, burning down schools and creating havoc with roadside bombs.

Taliban Revived In Southern Afghanistan (AP)

By JIM KRANE

Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP, October 7, 2006

New Zealand soldiers, part of International Security Assistance Force, man in the city of Bamyan, north west of Kabul, Afghanistan on Thursday, Oct. 5, 2006. NATO took over eastern Afghanistan from U.S.-led forces Thursday, assuming control of 12,000 U.S. troops and command of the entire country.

Afghanistan (AP) - A sweating man wanders into a crowd and blows himself up, leaving a dozen bodies lifeless on the street. A few blocks away, a car bomb pulverizes an armored Humvee, killing two U.S. soldiers and 14 civilians. The kind of anonymous insurgent violence that is convulsing Iraq has migrated 1,500 miles east to plague Afghanistan five years after the U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban regime.

The prospect of a second downward spiral - though so far Afghanistan isn't nearly as violent as Iraq - has experts worried that Western militaries don't have an effective strategy for these irregular wars.

"One Iraq is bad enough," said Bruce Hoffman, a counterinsurgency expert at Georgetown University. "Given that our two main theaters of operations aren't going well, one has to question how well the U.S. understands counterinsurgency."

The reborn Taliban acknowledges that it has adopted the suicide bombings, beheadings and remote-controlled bombs of the Iraqi insurgent movement. Nearly 200 civilians have been killed in suicide attacks this year that look all too much like the wave of bombings sweeping Iraq.

"We're getting stronger in every province and in every district and every village," said Qari Mohammed Yusuf Ahmadi, who calls himself the Taliban's spokesman for southern Afghanistan. "We don't have helicopters and jet fighters. But we're giving America and its allies a tough time with roadside bombs, suicide attacks and ambushes. Our Muslim brothers in Iraq are using the same tactics."

Resemblances to Iraq don't stop there. Taliban public relations teams videotape attacks and post them online, an uncharacteristic venture into modern technology for a Muslim fundamentalist group that once banned cameras and computers.

The West's military strategy in Afghanistan also resembles that in Iraq.

Just as critics say Washington did not send enough troops to Iraq before the insurgency took root, analysts fault the U.S. for failing to press its advantage in Afghanistan in 2002 and 2003 when the Taliban were all but vanquished.

Meanwhile, Afghan observers say the same harsh U.S. tactics, decried in Iraq for causing civilian casualties, have helped the Taliban recruit new fighters.

But unlike Iraq's insurgents, the Taliban has ready sanctuary and support just outside their battle zone, in the border areas of Pakistan.

"There will be no end to this insurgency until its sanctuaries and external support are addressed," said Christopher Alexander, the deputy head of the U.N. Assistance Mission in Afghanistan.

The U.S. military estimates about 6,000 Taliban and other insurgent fighters operate in Afghanistan, many from bases in Pakistan. Yusuf Ahmadi - who spoke by satellite phone from an undisclosed location and whose exact ties to the militia's leadership are unclear - put the figure in the tens of thousands.

The Taliban comeback, while focused on the volatile south and east, has begun to hit Kabul. The mountain capital's tree-lined boulevards are now scarred, like the streets of Baghdad, by garlands of razor wire, towering blast walls and impromptu police checkpoints.

There's little indication that Iraqi insurgents are joining the fight in Afghanistan or giving the Taliban direct aid, although a few Arab and Chechen fighters mingle in Taliban ranks.

But even without much personal contact, the Taliban has learned from Iraq's insurgency. Web sites explain the insurgent's art: everything from concealed rocket launchers to roadside bomb-making.

"We're not saying they're getting direct support from Iraq," a U.S. military official in Afghanistan said on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity the information. "They've evolved by adapting their tactics. They've seen the value of the suicide bomber in Iraq. For them, it's a very cheap and effective weapons system."

The U.S. and NATO military response in Afghanistan also has nuanced differences from Iraq. U.S. warplanes drop 10 times more bombs in Afghanistan than they do in Iraq, and a few U.S. and NATO troops live off base in village houses, a strategy rarely attempted in Iraq.

But most of the allied war efforts looks similar. In both places, troops cordon off villages and search homes. They employ billions of dollars in technology - things like signal jammers and mine-clearing vehicles - to find and disarm roadside bombs. They operate from bases nearly identical in appearance, with troops living in tin trailers barricaded by dirt-filled metal baskets.

The Afghan war is still far smaller, occupying just 40,000 allied troops - a quarter of those in Iraq - and suffering a fraction of the casualties. But for individual soldiers serving in mountainous Taliban lands like Zabul province, the dangers feel the same.

"I know Iraq grabs a lot of headlines. But there's still a war going on over here," said Lt. Col. Steve Jarrard, 46, of Johnson City, Tenn., based in the hard-bitten southern town of Qalat. "I really hope we're doing the right thing over here."

Right now, it's too early to tell the result of major U.S. and NATO offensives aimed at crushing the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0078425

"In three to six months you'll see a noticeable effect," said NATO spokesman Maj. Luke Knittig. "But you're talking two to five years before seeing a defeat of the insurgency" in southern Afghanistan.

U.S. General Says 4,000 Iraqi Policemen Have Died In 2 Years (NYT)

By John O'Neil

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

About 4,000 Iraqi policemen have been killed and more than 8,000 have been wounded in the last two years, the American general in charge of training the country's police forces said yesterday.

"They have paid a great price," Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson said, "yet Iraqis are signing up as recruits every day."

General Peterson said the figures covered casualties from September 2004 to the present. Earlier this year, a spokesman for the general told Congressional researchers that 1,497 Iraqi police officers were killed and 3,256 were wounded in 2005.

Taken together, the numbers appear to show a rising casualty rate among the Iraqi police, who have replaced American troops as the prime focus of insurgent attacks for much of this year.

In a televised briefing from Baghdad, General Peterson acknowledged that the police forces and the Interior Ministry that supervises them were still plagued by corruption and sectarianism, and that good unit commanders were in short supply.

But he pointed to a number of recent developments as reason for optimism, including the decision last week by Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani to suspend the Eighth Brigade, Second Division, an 800-member police unit in Baghdad, after some of its officers were suspected of taking part in the kidnapping and killing of Sunni workers from a food processing plant.

General Peterson said that a battalion commander had been arrested in the episode, in which his unit was operating outside of its authorized area, and that two of the brigade's three battalions had previously failed inspection.

Murders carried out by death squads linked to sectarian militias are the main cause of Iraqi deaths now, according to the American military, and Sunni leaders have complained about Shiite killers operating under the cover of the forces led by the Shiite-dominated government.

Mr. Bolani is seen as a more independent figure than his predecessor, who was a leader of one of the main Shiite parties. General Peterson called the suspension of the Eighth Brigade the result of an "isolated incident," but said that Mr. Bolani "realizes that within his ministry he has individuals who joined the legitimate security forces of Iraq but maintained loyalty to militias."

Asked about the Sunni perception that the police are dominated by Shiites, the general said that local police units were meant to reflect the makeup of the area they patrolled. He said the national police force was 75 percent Shiite and 25 percent Sunni, which reflects the ethnic breakdown of the country apart from Iraqi Kurdistan, where security is handled by the regional government.

The national police will be the focus of a new round of training meant to improve the quality of the forces, now that a goal of recruiting 188,000 officers has been all but met, General Peterson said. The force had been created to do paramilitary duties, and its members now need to learn more basic skills, he said.

Over all, General Peterson emphasized the "tremendous progress" made since American forces designated 2006 as the "year of the police."

He cited Anbar Province, the restive western region long dominated by Sunni insurgents, as one example. "We've cleared out the Euphrates River valley and are starting to see police forces grow and take hold and perform their responsibilities admirably," he said.

But he stressed that solving the problems of the police would take time.

"This is like trying to build an airplane in flight," he said. "They're just rookies, and we put them all throughout Iraq. We give them some capable leaders, but this is not simple."

In Baghdad, authorities reported a fresh crop of sectarian deaths, with 15 bodies found yesterday. In a Shiite enclave in southern Baghdad, Abu Dshir, 5 Iraqis were killed and 10 were wounded when mortars crashed into a house, an Iraqi police official said.

4,000 Iraq Police Killed In Past 2 Years (AP)

By Lee Keath

AP, October 7, 2006

About 4,000 Iraqi police have been killed and more than 8,000 wounded in the past two years, the U.S. commander in charge of police training said Friday, but he said the force's performance was improving and officials are working to weed out militiamen.

Beefing up Iraq's security forces is a cornerstone of efforts to stop the violence that has torn the country since the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003. Police have been a prime target for attacks by Sunni insurgents.

Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led police of helping fuel sectarian violence that has killed thousands this year. They say the police have been infiltrated by Shiite militias and turn a blind eye to death squads who kidnap and kill Sunnis.

On Friday, a Sunni Kurdish party accused Shiite militias of killing a Kurdish lawmaker, Mohammed Ridha Mohammed, who was kidnapped in Baghdad the night before and whose body was found dumped along with that of his driver.

Members of parliament have fallen victim in the past to Sunni insurgents, who have often targeted Kurds. But Mohammed's slaying was the first blamed on Shiite militias. He was a member of a religious conservative Kurdish party, the Islamic Group , a small faction in the Kurdish coalition that is part of the Shiite-led government.

More victims were found Friday in the spiral of slayings between Shiite and Sunni groups. Nine bodies were discovered in the southern Shiite city of Kut and the nearby town of Suwayrah. Among them was that of a Suwayrah city councilman.

During Friday prayers at the Imam al-Hussein shrine in the southern city of Karbala, the representative of Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, urged militias to put down their arms.

"The weapons should be in the hands of the government only," Ahmed al-Safi told worshippers. "No other group should be allowed to carry weapons, so that the state would be able to provide the appropriate security conditions to the Iraqi people."

Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson said it is hard to tell how many militia members have infiltrated the police forces.

"I have no idea what the number is," said Peterson, speaking from Baghdad to reporters at the Pentagon. "Certainly if we ask the question, they won't respond that they are associated with any militia. ... It's something we continue to look for. We do ask the question."

He said that any Iraqi police who are identified with a militia or who commit crimes are arrested, and others who have affiliations that cannot be tied directly to a crime are released from duty.

Iraqi authorities on Wednesday pulled a brigade of about 700 policemen out of service in their biggest move ever to uproot troops linked to death squads. The brigade is suspected of allowing gunmen to kidnap 24 workers from a frozen food factory in a district of Baghdad where the Shiite Mahdi Army militia is known to have considerable power.

The brigade commander was relieved of his duties, and a battalion commander was arrested, Peterson said, adding that officials had identified problems with the brigade during an inspection in August. He said the brigade "demonstrated very poor performance" in their missions.

Still, he said he believes the matter, which included the deaths of seven workers, was "an isolated incident."

"We have not seen other actions of late tied to sectarianism," he said. He added that Iraqi officials realize there are "individuals who joined the legitimate security forces of Iraq but yet still maintain loyalties to militias. So that is an issue."

Peterson said there are many police who are loyal to the country and "they've paid a great price" — putting the toll since September 2004 at 4,000 policemen killed and 8,000 wounded in attacks.

Altogether about 186,000 Iraqi police have been trained, and officials expect to exceed the goal of 188,000 by 10,000 by year's end, he said.

Currently there are 6,000 coalition forces embedded with the Iraqi police units as training teams, and Peterson said the Iraqis are improving.

"A year ago we had a situation where a police station was attacked and policemen would run out the back door, leaving all the equipment," he said. "That does not occur anymore."

DOJ_NMG_0078427

The United States has put increasing pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take action to stop sectarian violence amid deep divisions within his Cabinet between Shiite and Sunni parties. Sunnis complain al-Maliki is hesitant to take tough action against Shiite militias because many of them are linked to parties he relies on.

4,000 Iraqi Police Killed In 2 Years, U.S. Official Says (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Iraqi police have suffered 4,000 killed and 8,000 wounded over the past two years as the fledgling force grapples with wartime problems including corruption and infiltration by sectarian militia, a U.S. commander said yesterday.

Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, commander of the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team in Baghdad, described significant headway in building an Iraqi police force, saying that 99 percent of the target force of 188,000 police has been trained and 82 percent have their equipment.

But he said continued efforts will be needed in 2007 to improve the quality of the force, provide training in leadership and basic policing skills, and weed out militia members -- some of whom are known to have carried out sectarian executions.

"It's hard to really ascertain how many individuals within the national police forces . . . still maintain loyalties to militias," Peterson said in a Pentagon teleconference with reporters. "We do ask the question, but obviously the response is always 'no.' So I have no idea what the number is."

This week, Iraq's Interior Ministry had to remove a brigade of hundreds of Iraqi police from duty in Baghdad after it participated in sectarian violence, including one battalion that raided a meat-processing factory and kidnapped more than 20 Sunni workers, seven of whom were later found executed.

That brigade, as well as other Iraqi police units now being inspected, will undergo three weeks of "police transformational training" to improve policing skills, Peterson said.

Peterson called the sectarian killings by police "an isolated incident" and said the decision to order the police brigade back to its garrison was "very positive."

"The minister has been concerned about two principal issues within the ministry: corruption and sectarianism," said Peterson, whose 1,000-person team is in charge of supporting the training, manning and equipping of Iraq's police force. In addition, about 6,500 U.S. troops and more than 600 police officers are currently acting as embedded advisers to Iraqi police units.

Deaths Across Iraq Show It Is A Nation Of Many Wars, With U.S. In The Middle (LAT)

By Solomon Moore And Louise Roug, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — Consider a recent day — an average 24 hours in Iraq.

Here in the capital, the bodies of eight young men were found chained together, stripped of identification papers, shot and dumped in a parking lot, the first of 20 corpses found in the city that day.

In northern Iraq, a man detonated a bomb vest amid a group of women, children and men lining up for cooking oil, killing himself and 21 others. In the south, police found the bullet-torn body of a senior anti-terrorism official. And in Al Anbar province, in the west, a car smashed into a line of police recruits and exploded, killing 13 by fire and shrapnel.

In all, at least 57 people died and 17 were injured in the violence that day, Sept. 18.

They were all killed in the same country, but not in the same war. The fighting in Iraq is not a single conflict, but an overlapping set of conflicts, fought on multiple battlegrounds, with different combatants. Increasingly, American troops are caught between the competing forces.

In western Iraq's deserts, Sunni Arab insurgent groups, some homegrown and others dominated by foreign fighters, attack Iraqi government forces and the U.S. troops who back them up. In Baghdad and surrounding provinces, Sunni and Shiite fighters attack each other and their rivals' civilians in a burgeoning civil war that U.S. troops have tried to quell.

DOJ_NMG_0078428

In southern Iraq, the Shiites dominate. But they are divided, with rival militias fighting over oil and commerce. And in the north of the country, Arabs and Kurds battle for control.

Often during the last three years, the U.S. military has shifted troops to try to tamp down one of these conflicts, only to see another escalate. Now, many American officials worry that with the proliferation of armed actors in Iraq's multiple conflicts, the original U.S. counterinsurgency mission has become something else — an operation aimed at quelling civil war, which is a much more ambiguous and politically fraught objective.

American troops find themselves in the crossfire, caught among foreign militants, Sunni Muslim nationalist rebels, Shiite Muslim militiamen and other armed groups — all fighting each other.

"It's a very complex situation," said Maj. Gen. Thomas R. Turner, commander of the Army's 101st Airborne Division. "Sometimes it's difficult to figure out where the violence is coming from."

West Desert Insurgency

Al Anbar province houses the conflict most familiar to Americans and most costly to U.S. troops — Marines and Iraqi insurgents, battling in the country's vast western desert.

The insurgents, almost all Sunni Arabs, are a mix of groups, some made up primarily of Iraqis, others heavily composed of foreign fighters drawn to the battle against the U.S. occupation. In addition to American troops, they target Iraqi forces and Sunnis who are suspected of cooperating with the government.

Barely a week passes without the U.S. military sending out several terse death notices from Al Anbar.

Attacks against U.S. forces have climbed 27% in Al Anbar since last year, according to the U.S. Marine Corps. American attempts to reduce the toll by turning over security duties there to Iraqi forces have met with little success. Marines say there are 5,000 Iraqi police officers and 13,000 Iraqi soldiers in the province, but that the Iraqi forces remain fragile and unable to sustain themselves. Half the Iraqi soldiers are on leave at any given time, and many don't return to duty. In May, desertion rates in some Iraqi units reached 40%.

In August, threats from insurgents led half of Fallouja's police force to stay home for days, a U.S. general said. And Fallouja at least has a police force. Other strategic cities, including Haditha, Hit and Ramadi, remain virtually lawless.

Meanwhile, Al Qaeda in Iraq, the best known of the insurgent groups, continues to make inroads in the province, consolidating and expanding its reach. Al Qaeda in Iraq was led by Abu Musab Zarqawi until U.S. forces killed him in June. American officials had hoped Zarqawi's death would severely disrupt the group, but that does not appear to have happened.

"Al Qaeda has murdered, intimidated, co-opted or paid off all the local national insurgent groups," said Marine Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a military spokesman in Fallouja. "They run an organized criminal enterprise that has its tentacles in everything from black-market gasoline sales to extortion of police and government paychecks. Al Qaeda provides the leadership and organization for this loose association of organized criminals."

In addition to the deaths of U.S. troops, the conflict has taken a toll on Al Anbar's residents, many of whom have fled. Those who stay are at constant risk.

Among the police recruits killed in Ramadi recently was Faiz Mohamad Ali. In an interview, his brother described Ali as an art institute graduate, painter and optimist.

Ali attempted to join the police after failing to find a market for his paintings, said the brother, who asked not be identified for fear insurgents would track him down.

"Four days before he got killed, we were chatting about Iraq. He was enthusiastic and went on talking about how everybody should take part in building this country," Ali's brother said. "I remember him talking about how he could serve Iraq as a painter: 'My paintings are talking about Iraq in my own way,' he said. 'The new, shiny Iraq.' "

Militia-Plagued Capital

While the Sunni Arab insurgency is blamed for much of the violence in Al Anbar province, in Baghdad, Shiite militias carry out the majority of killings, according to most U.S. officials. Sunnis account for most of the victims.

The capital, with its 6 million residents, is home to about a fourth of Iraq's population. It is the nation's administrative center and among its most religiously and ethnically diverse cities. This year, it has also been a sectarian killing field.

DOJ_NMG_0078429

The United Nations reported that 2,884 people were killed in Baghdad in July, the highest monthly death toll since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. In August, 2,222 people were killed and in September, 1,980 — the decline probably due to increased patrols in the capital.

In addition to the thousands killed, hundreds of thousands of residents of Baghdad and the provinces immediately around it have fled their homes. Shiites and Sunnis have abandoned mixed neighborhoods in favor of others offering more homogeneous populations.

In recent weeks, Diyala, a province with about 1 million residents just north of Baghdad, has been particularly violent.

On Sept. 18, police in Baqubah, the provincial capital, reported that gunmen had assassinated the Sunni mayor of the nearby village of Udayem, making the official one of hundreds of people killed in the province in recent weeks. It remains unclear why the mayor was targeted or who killed him.

Internal Shiite Warfare

Until recently, southern Iraq seemed relatively peaceful. Now, Shiites, who dominate the region, have splintered into factions that feud over oil resources, smuggling proceeds, political power and religious authority. Violence remains smaller in scale than in the capital, but it is increasing.

Virtually all the south's political and religious institutions are divided among four Shiite groups: the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite party in the country; followers of Muqtada Sadr, the radical cleric who has called for the U.S. to pull out its troops; and two smaller parties, the Islamic Dawa Party and Al Fadila al Islamiya. Because each of the warring local parties is affiliated with Iraq's governing Shiite alliance, local disputes often spread to the highest reaches of society, threatening national stability.

Huge amounts of money are at stake in the fighting. The southern city of Basra, Iraq's second-largest, controls vast oil reserves and the nation's only seaport, making it a vital trailhead for billions of dollars of imports and exports — much of them smuggled. The Shiite parties there compete for illicit profits, many Iraqi analysts say.

The struggles in some cases have flared into open war. In August, in the town of Diwaniya, militiamen loyal to Sadr squared off against government troops infiltrated by the Badr organization, the militia loyal to the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. The resulting battle left 40 dead, including a dozen troops who ran out of ammunition and were executed by Sadr's loyalists. That same month in Karbala, Sadr's fighters fought supporters of competing Shiite cleric Mahmoud Hassani.

Shiite political parties are also using assassinations to knock off opponents in advance of upcoming provincial elections.

"There are clashes among parties and militias at various levels, and by the time the provincial council elections come, there will be bloody conflicts in Basra," an Iraqi intelligence official said.

U.S. and British military officials are moving ahead with plans to withdraw troops from the south, saying the area has stabilized enough for Iraqi troops to handle. Whether that assessment is accurate is unclear. After British troops handed over a base in Maysan province, militiamen vandalized it and stripped it bare as Iraqi troops looked on. American forces plan to withdraw from Najaf by November, said Lt. Col. Michael Hilliard, the commander of Forward Operating Base Duke near Najaf.

These withdrawals are designed to turn security over to the Iraqi government but seem likely to further empower the militias.

"We have no authority in our cities because the clerics and religious powers are controlling the area," Gov. Aqeel Kharzali of Najaf province said Sept. 18 at a conference of Iraqi police and southern politicians.

"This is evident when a policeman tries to confront a militia without a fatwa. Our police in Diwaniya and Karbala are marginalized, and we have no authority to fire renegade officers aligned with the militias."

Kurdish-Arab Clashes

The same day Kharzali spoke, gunmen driving a BMW attacked guards at an oil pipeline near Kirkuk, in northern Iraq. In Mosul, four police officers were ambushed and shot to death.

The main players and political stakes in Kirkuk and Mosul are similar: Both cities have mixed Kurdish and Arab populations battling for local control.

During ousted President Saddam Hussein's rule, the government pursued a policy of 'Arabization' in the north. More than 100,000 Kurds were exiled from the Kirkuk area alone.

DOJ_NMG_0078430

Iraq's constitution calls for a census that will define the voting districts for a referendum on Kirkuk's fate — whether it will be annexed to Kurdistan or to Arab-dominated Tamim province. In Kirkuk and Mosul, Kurdish politicians have been accused of trying to gerrymander yet-to-be-scheduled provincial votes. Arabs and Kurds accuse each other of politically motivated killings.

Kirkuk is the biggest prize because the city and its environs contain about 40% of Iraq's oil reserves.

About 40% of the area's residents are Kurds, including many who have returned since the 2003 invasion. Approximately one-third of Kirkuk's residents are Arabs, many of whom arrived in the city during Hussein's reign. Turkmens constitute about 20% of the regional population. The two smaller groups have sometimes joined forces to resist Kurdish control, but have also battled each another.

Car bomb attacks in Kirkuk have tripled in the last year, and roadside bombings have doubled, according to U.S. military officials who provided trend lines but not actual numbers of such assaults.

Assassinations have also increased, with attackers focusing on politicians and police. Explosions in August targeted a courthouse and Kurdish political offices affiliated with President Jalal Talabani's party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan.

Mosul has none of Kirkuk's oil wealth, but it remains a trouble spot because of its Sunni extremist element. In the wake of the U.S. siege of Fallouja in 2004, fleeing rebels made Mosul their haven. When American troops retook Mosul, insurgent forces fled to Tall Afar. U.S. troops retook the latter city in September 2005 in a large-scale assault, but rebels remain deeply rooted in all three cities.

Until March of this year, most attacks in the Mosul area targeted U.S.-led forces, but by April, there were almost as many assaults against Iraqi security forces as against the Americans. There was also an increase in attacks against civilians, according to the U.S. military.

Despite the violence, the number of U.S.-led troops in Iraq's six northern provinces has been reduced from 31,000 to 21,000.

Alla Eid, a 26-year-old student at Mosul University, said the city has been taken hostage by clashing insurgents and U.S. forces. "We are living like cavemen. We eat and go to work or school every morning, and then life ends before sunset," she said. After dark, Mosul "turns into a city of ghosts."

Unit Due For 3rd Iraq Tour As Troops' Burden Deepens (AJC)

By Ron Martz

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 7, 2006

Fort Stewart — In April 2003, Army Spc. Cedric Shelbon was among the 3rd Infantry Division soldiers based here who led the American assault on Baghdad that hastened the fall of Saddam Hussein. Last year, Shelbon returned to Iraq as a push was made to train Iraqi forces to assume more responsibility for defense of their country.

Now, after less than a year at home, Shelbon and about 4,000 of his fellow soldiers from the division's 1st Brigade Combat Team are preparing for a third tour in Iraq, this time facing nearly out-of-control sectarian violence.

The prospect of spending another year in Iraq as a Humvee driver has left the 23-year-old from Marion, La., pondering his own fate.

"It's kind of nerve-racking. You see your friends get killed and you wonder if the next time it's going to be you," Shelbon said earlier this week as his unit went through its final major training exercises at home before deploying overseas in January.

Shelbon is among dozens of soldiers in the brigade — unit officials say they don't have an official count — who will be making their third combat tour in Iraq in less than four years.

The multiple deployments and rapid turnaround are evidence that the service is stretched so thin it may have to request broader access to National Guard units to meet demands being made on it, Army officials said recently at an infantry conference at Fort Benning.

Turnover has been high

DOJ_NMG_0078431

Col. John Charlton, the brigade commander, is among those who will be serving a third combat tour in Iraq, all with the 3rd Infantry Division.

"Duty calls," Charlton, 46, of Spokane, Wash., said with a smile and a shrug when asked about going back so soon.

Charlton commanded an infantry battalion of about 750 soldiers during the initial invasion, then last year was responsible for helping the division plan its operations. He said he has known for some time that the unit was likely to return in January, even though the official announcement did not come until last week.

"We still have lots of work to do over there," he said. Charlton estimated that a significant percentage of the senior officers and senior enlisted soldiers are combat veterans, but about 20 percent have no combat experience at all.

"There's a significant amount of learning that needs to take place," said Lt. Col. Doug Crissman, commander of the brigade's 2nd Battalion, 7th Infantry Regiment, who has not been to Iraq and only took command in late July.

Crissman, 40, of Burke, Va., estimates about 40 percent of the 728 soldiers in his battalion will be making their third trip to the war zone. "I think it's made for a slightly shorter preparation window and flattened the learning curve for us," Crissman said.

But the turnover in Crissman's unit has been high, especially among officers and senior enlisted, said Command Sgt. Major Samuel Coston, the top enlisted soldier in the battalion.

Out of 728 soldiers in the unit, 316 changed duty stations or left the Army after returning from Iraq in January.

"None of the lieutenants we have now were here [for the last tour], all the previous company commanders are gone and all the first sergeants are new," said Coston, 45, of Wallace, N.C., a combat veteran of Panama and Iraq.

Trainers come to troops

The short turnaround time for the brigade has resulted in a training pace so accelerated that the two weeks it would have normally spent at one of the Army's major training facilities at Fort Irwin, Calif., or Fort Polk, La., before going to Iraq were instead spent here.

Rather than packing up the brigade and sending it to Fort Irwin, the Army brought the trainers from the California base to Fort Stewart to replicate as best they could what is offered at the high-desert training site, which more closely resembles Iraq than the piney woods of southeast Georgia.

Although the woodsy terrain at Fort Stewart is much more confining than Fort Irwin, the trainers were able to use the mock Iraqi villages here and the Iraqi role players in scenarios that allowed the soldiers to use their tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles, Humvees and helicopters in much the same fashion as they will once they get to the war zone.

This is only the third time Fort Irwin trainers have taken their Iraq-preparation program on the road. But the first two times, at Fort Bragg, N.C., and Fort Carson, Colo., were on a much smaller scale, each involving training fewer than 1,000 soldiers, said Lt. Col. Jim Miller, deputy commander for the Fort Irwin training operations group. "It was a little bit of a challenge" to move the Fort Irwin training to Fort Stewart, Miller said.

Iraq combat is changing

Training the 1st Brigade's 4,000 soldiers meant moving much of the Fort Irwin equipment and personnel — about 1,000 trainers and Iraqi role players plus more than 600 vehicles — across the country with just three weeks notice. The total cost was about $10 million, only slightly cheaper than it would have cost to send the brigade to California. But by bringing the trainers to Georgia, what would have been a five-to-six week preparation and training process for the brigade was accomplished in only three weeks.

It was a good exercise for the Fort Irwin group, Miller said, because the pace of current operations may mean future pre-Iraq training exercises at other major bases.

"At some point we anticipate the Army having this capability to come to your home [post] and do the training there," Miller said.

Charlton, the brigade commander, said even the two-time combat veterans need to be retrained because of the changing nature of the fighting in Iraq. More emphasis is being put on such things as quelling sectarian violence and dealing with suicide bombers in these three weeks of training — ending today — than in previous training. "They do a very good job of replicating every scenario we could face over there," Charlton said.

DOJ_NMG_0078432

Staff Sgt. Joshua Pickering, a squad leader with Bravo Company, 2nd Battalion, 7th Infantry Regiment, agreed with Charlton, to a degree.

"For our time constraints, they did the best they could," said Pickering, 24, of Miami, another of the brigade's soldiers heading to Iraq for a third time. But Pickering, whose wife is expecting their first child next month, said his unit did not get this level of training before the initial invasion. He said it is especially good for newcomers because many of the role players are expatriate Iraqis who take their jobs seriously. "I think it opens [the new soldiers'] eyes about how difficult it is to deal with the civilians over there," Pickering said.

Shelbon, the Humvee driver, said, "Nothing is ever going to be close to the real thing, but they do a pretty good job."

Charlton said he is not sure where his unit will be headed in Iraq, although there has been speculation it will replace a brigade of the 1st Armored Division in Anbar province in western Iraq, one of the more restive areas in the country. Pickering, who re-enlisted last year in Iraq for the tax-free bonus, said no matter where the brigade goes, it will be easier dealing with another deployment for most of the soldiers once they are there.

"I'm a little nervous now," he admitted. "It's tough leaving the wife behind, but once you are there you get focused on what you have to do."

Medic Testifies That Marines Shot Iraqi Civilian (MSN)

MSNBC, October 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif. - A Navy corpsman was sentenced Friday after testifying that Marines in his patrol seized an Iraqi civilian from his home, threw him into a hole and put at least 10 bullets in his head and chest after growing frustrated in their search for an insurgent.

Petty Officer Melson Bacos, 21, was sentenced to 10 years in prison, but he will end up serving only a year under a plea deal. Bacos was also dishonorably discharged.

Bacos agreed to a plea deal earlier Friday in which he agreed to testify in exchange for a lesser sentence on kidnapping and conspiracy charges.

A medic, Bacos was charged along with seven Marines in the slaying of Hashim Ibrahim Awad last spring in the town of Hamdania.

“I knew what we were doing was wrong,” Bacos testified, speaking nearly in a whisper. “I tried to say something and then I decided to look away.”

“I was shocked and I felt sick to my stomach,” he added.

Bacos was the first of the servicemen to be court-martialed. The seven others could get up to life in prison.

Prosecutors have said that the servicemen killed Awad out of frustration and then planted an AK-47 assault rifle and a shovel by the body to make it look as if he had been caught digging a hole for a roadside bomb.

The incident was one in a series in which the conduct of American troops in Iraq have damaged America's image worldwide.

Sergeant was 'mad' at release

Bacos testified that the squad entered Hamdania on April 26 while searching for a known insurgent who had been captured three times, then released. Squad leader Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins was “just mad that we kept letting him go and he was a known terrorist,” Bacos said.

The group approached a house where the insurgent was believed to be hiding, but when someone inside woke up, the Marines instead went to another home and grabbed Awad, according to the testimony.

Bacos said the squad had intended to get someone else if they did not capture the insurgent, then stage a firefight to make it appear they had found an Iraqi planting a roadside bomb.

Awad, 52, was taken from the home with his feet and hands bound, then placed in a hole, Bacos said. Bacos said he asked the Marines to let Awad go, but Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda told him in crude terms that he was being weak and should stop protesting.

DOJ_NMG_0078433

Bacos said Hutchins fired three rounds into the man's head after checking to see if he was dead, then Cpl. Trent Thomas fired seven to 10 more rounds into his chest.

Hutchins also called in to a command center and reported the squad had seen a man digging a hole and wanted permission to fire at him, Bacos alleged.

Bacos said he saw Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington put the victim's fingerprints onto an AK-47 and on a shovel to implicate him as an insurgent who had fired first. Bacos was told to fire an AK-47 into the air to simulate the sound of a firefight.

After the killing, Bacos said, he was standing in the road when another Navy corpsman drove by.

"He asked me what happened, and I was very vague," Bacos testified. "I said, 'I want you to remember something. We're different. We're not like these men."'

Transferred for safety

Bacos was recently transferred from Camp Pendleton, where the Marines have been held, to Marine Corps Air Station Miramar for his own safety.

Military prosecutors had charged Bacos under the theory that he did nothing to stop the alleged crime. In return for his testimony, murder charges and other counts against him were dropped.

Along with Magincalda, Pennington, Hutchins and Thomas, the other Marines charged are: Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, Pfc. John J. Jodka, and Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr.

David Brahms, Pennington's lawyer, said Bacos' account will be subjected to intense scrutiny. "This is just one guy who is going to tell the story as he sees it," Brahms said.

"The defense's job is to climb a mountain," he added. "With Bacos' plea, the mountain is slightly higher."

Former Army prosecutor Tom Umberg suggested that others might follow Bacos' lead and strike similar plea bargains.

"You don't want to be the last guy standing. The first guy gets the best deal," he said.

Medic's background

A Purple Heart recipient with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, Bacos was the first to admit his role in the Hamdania case. The murder was one in a series of incidents in which the conduct of American troops in Iraq have hurt the country's image worldwide.

The son of immigrant Philippine parents, Bacos, a former high school varsity wrestler, had hoped to become a doctor and administered first-aid for his platoon.

He enrolled in the Navy after graduating from high school in 2003, was first deployed to Iraq in 2004 and redeployed for a second tour in Iraq this year. In court he wore a Navy summer white service uniform bearing several medals.

Bacos' wife, who is also a Navy corpsman, attended the hearing at Camp Pendleton near San Diego, as did his father.

Other Camp Pendleton-based Marines are under investigation in a separate incident in November 2005 in which 24 civilians were killed in the Iraqi town of Haditha.

Courts have also convicted a series of low-ranking U.S. soldiers for abusing Iraqis at the notorious Abu Ghraib prison.

Sailor Details Killing Of Iraqi Civilian (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Oct. 6 -- Eight members of a Marine squad planned to kill a suspected Iraqi insurgent and developed a cover story before their April raid, but when they could not find their target, they pulled a neighbor from his bed and shot him to death instead, a Navy medic who was part of the group testified Friday.

Melson J. Bacos offered the first testimony in the case -- one of several the government has brought against servicemen charged with assaulting and killing Iraqi civilians -- and it came as the result of a plea bargain for the hospital corpsman 3rd class. Bacos and seven Marines in his squad were charged with shooting a civilian in the Iraqi town of Hamdaniyah on April 26, then planting a shovel and an AK-47 next to him to make it appear he was burying a roadside bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0078434

In exchange for his testimony and an agreement to testify against his former squadmates, prosecutors dropped murder charges against Bacos and accused him instead of kidnapping and conspiracy. Bacos, 21, was effectively sentenced to about seven more months in the brig.

The seven Marines still face charges of premeditated murder, kidnapping and conspiracy.

In quiet but vivid testimony in a courtroom on the military base where he had been imprisoned since May 23, Bacos mostly corroborated the government's account of the slaying and added new detail.

With his wife and father sitting behind him, Bacos haltingly told the court that the squad of eight servicemen was on ambush patrol when their leader gathered them under a tree in a palm grove and said he had a plan. Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III wanted to kill an Iraqi named Saleh Gowad, who Hutchins thought was an insurgent, Bacos said. Gowad had been detained and released three times, Bacos testified, and Hutchins "was mad that we kept letting him go."

Hutchins assigned each man a role: Bacos and two others would steal a shovel and an AK-47 to plant near the body, while others would go to Gowad's home and pull him out at night, Bacos said. They planned to dig a hole so it would seem Gowad had been burying a bomb when he was killed.

If Gowad was not home, they would carry out their plan on another civilian, Bacos testified. They agreed to lie to military investigators who would come behind them.

"We all said, 'I'm in,' " Bacos said.

At 3 a.m. on April 26, the squad put the plan in action, Bacos said. When they went to Gowad's home, "one of the family members woke up and saw us," Bacos said. "So Corporal [Trent D.] Thomas and Corporal [Marshall L.] Magincalda pointed at the house next door."

Thomas and Magincalda went into the house while Bacos and a Marine waited outside. The pair came out with Hashim Ibrahim Awad, Bacos said. Awad was a 52-year-old father of 11 with an injured leg who had worked as a policeman from 1969 to 1990, two of Awad's brothers told military investigators in a videotaped interview that was played in court Friday. Bacos said he did not know Awad's name at the time and had no reason to suspect him of insurgent activity.

The Marines bound his feet and gagged him, Bacos said.

Bacos said he saw Hutchins fire "three rounds into the man's head," Bacos said. "And after, I saw Corporal Thomas fire seven to 10 rounds into the man's chest."

Bacos said he then fired the stolen weapon into the air to make it sound as if a firefight had occurred, he said.

Bacos told Col. Steven Folsom, a military judge, that he had tried to stop the squad members from killing Awad. "I knew what we were doing was wrong," he said. "I tried to say something, sir, and then I decided to look away."

"Why didn't I do more to stop it? Why didn't I just walk away?" Bacos asked during his sentencing. "The answer to that question is, I wanted to be part of the team. I wanted to be loyal. I wanted to be a respected corpsman. But wanting to be a loyal, respected corpsman is not an excuse for immorality. . . . I apologize to my country, to the United States Navy and to the United States Marine Corps . . . and I also ask forgiveness of the Iraqi family."

Bacos was moved two days ago from the brig at Camp Pendleton to a cell at Marine Corps Air Station Miramar. His plea agreement includes a provision that he be notified if any of his co-conspirators are to be housed in the facility where he is serving his sentence.

Government prosecutors argued that Bacos deserved 10 to 15 years in prison and a dishonorable discharge. "This court has a responsibility to harness this tragedy to send a general message to all of the troops serving in Iraq that if you commit a crime of this magnitude, you will face swift and severe justice," said Capt. Nicholas Gannon, the government's attorney.

Bacos can expect blistering cross-examination when he testifies at the courts-martial for the Marines in his squad, said Eugene R. Fidell, a former military prosecutor who now is president of the National Institute of Military Justice. "I know a number of the lawyers involved in the case, and these are not potted plants," he said.

A defense attorney for Hutchins, Lt. Col. Joe Smith, said, "At this point we look forward to proceeding with the case, and think that a much more complete picture will develop through the proceedings."

Corpsman Who Failed To Halt Killing Of Iraqi Receives Prison Sentence (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Oct. 6 — A Navy hospital corpsman who said he watched seven members of his Marine squad repeatedly shoot an unarmed Iraqi in the head and chest in April was sentenced Friday to 10 years in prison, which was reduced to one year in a plea agreement..

The corpsman, Petty Officer Third Class Melson J. Bacos, 21, pleaded guilty to modified charges of conspiracy and kidnapping, but avoided the charge of murder and a possible death sentence by agreeing to cooperate with prosecutors and testify against members of his squad.

With time served, Petty Officer Bacos could be released in five months.

His testimony offered the first detailed public description of the April 26 incident in Hamdaniya, a Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad, where prosecutors say the eight soldiers joined in an unprovoked murder tantamount to a war crime.

The men, all members of Kilo Company in the Third Battalion, Fifth Marine Regiment, are accused of dragging Hashim Ibrahim Awad from his home, binding his hands and feet, gagging him and then shooting him at point-blank range; and later planting evidence and lying to cover up his death.

"I witnessed Sergeant Hutchins dead check the man and then fire three rounds into the man's head," Petty Officer Bacos said, speaking about his squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, a focus of his testimony. After that, he said, Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, another squad member, fired 7 to 10 rounds into the man's chest.

All eight men — the others are Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda, Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington, Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr. and Pvt. First Class John J. Jodka III — were charged June 21 with premeditated murder, kidnapping, conspiracy and making false statements to investigators.

Charges against Petty Officer Bacos were reduced as part of his plea bargain.

The petty officer said the plot to kill an Iraqi and cover it up was devised hours before the shooting as the men "huddled" in a palm grove near the crime scene. The unit had been on ambush duty, searching for Saleh Gowad, a man the government considered "a known, high-value individual," he said. Mr. Gowad had been a detainee at the Abu Ghraib prison but was released, which was an apparent sore point for Sergeant Hutchins, the petty officer said.

"He was just mad that they kept letting him go when he was a known terrorist, sir," Petty Officer Bacos told the military judge, Col. Steven Folsom. "He was detained and released three times, sir."

The petty officer said Sergeant Hutchins and the other marines "devised a plan" to kill any Iraqi if Mr. Gowad could not be found. But he said that he was not part of the initial planning, and that when he first heard the proposal, he brushed it off.

"I didn't believe they would carry out a plan like that," he said.

He protested, he told the judge, saying that in his view, "there was no justification."

"It was unlawful, sir," he testified, but he eventually went along. "I knew what we were doing was wrong," he said. "I tried to say something, and then I decided to look away."

He also said: "I wanted to be part of the team. I wanted to be loyal."

Court documents read into the record Friday recounted how the men stole a shovel and an AK-47 to plant near the body, and later shot rounds in the air to create bullet casings that would suggest a gunfight.

"I feel my honor is gone," Petty Officer Bacos said.

In a statement to the court, he apologized to the victim's family, as well as to his own, and to the Marines and the nation.

"Perhaps he could have had a crisis of conscience when he stole that shovel," said Nicholas Gannon, the prosecutor. "He could have had a crisis of conscience when they approached Mr. Awad's house. But he did not."

Sailor Testifies About Killing Of Iraqi (AP-Y)

By Linda Deutsch, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, October 7, 2006

A Navy corpsman testified Friday that Marines in his patrol seized an Iraqi civilian from his home, threw him into a hole and put at least 10 bullets in his head and chest after growing frustrated in their search for an insurgent.

DOJ_NMG_0078436

Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson J. Bacos said he saw a Marine put fingerprints from the victim onto a rifle and on a shovel to implicate him as an insurgent.

"I was shocked and I felt sick to my stomach," Bacos said.

Bacos, a medic who had been on patrol with the squad, was charged along with seven Marines in the slaying of Hashim Ibrahim Awad last spring in the town of Hamdania. But Bacos struck a deal with prosecutors under which he pleaded guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy and agreed to testify Friday at his court-martial about what he saw.

"I knew what we were doing was wrong," Bacos testified, speaking nearly in a whisper. "I tried to say something and then I decided to look away."

Bacos said he asked the Marines to let Awad go, but Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda told him in crude terms that he was being weak and should stop protesting.

Bacos, 21, was the first of the servicemen to be court-martialed. The seven others could get up to life in prison.

Military judge Col. Steven Folsom sentenced Bacos to 10 years in prison but reduced the term to one year because of the plea agreement. That will be further reduced by time served. Other counts of murder, kidnapping and conspiracy were dropped in exchange for his cooperation while a reduction in rank and a dishonorable discharge also were suspended.

Prosecutors have said that the servicemen killed Awad out of frustration and then planted the assault rifle and shovel by the body to make it look as if he had been caught digging a hole for a roadside bomb.

Bacos testified that the squad entered Hamdania on April 26 while searching for a known insurgent who had been captured three times, then released. Squad leader Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins was "just mad that we kept letting him go and he was a known terrorist," Bacos said.

The group approached a house where the insurgent was believed to be hiding, but when someone inside woke up, the Marines instead went to another home and grabbed Awad, according to the testimony.

Bacos said the squad had intended to get someone else if they did not capture the insurgent, then stage a firefight to make it appear they had found an Iraqi planting a roadside bomb.

Awad, 52, was taken from the home with his feet and hands bound, then placed in a hole, Bacos said.

"I felt I couldn't stop it any more that day," Bacos testified. "They were going to do it. They were going to carry out the plan, so I continued on."

Bacos said Hutchins fired three rounds into the man's head after checking to see if he was dead, then Cpl. Trent Thomas fired seven to 10 more rounds into his chest.

After the killing, Bacos said Hutchins called in to a command center and reported the squad had seen a man digging a hole and wanted permission to fire at him.

Bacos said he saw Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington put the victim's fingerprints onto an AK-47 and on a shovel to implicate him as an insurgent who had fired first. Bacos was told to fire an AK-47 into the air to simulate the sound of a firefight.

"Why didn't I just walk away?" Bacos asked before being sentenced. "The answer to that question was I wanted to be part of the team. I wanted to be a respected corpman, but that is no excuse for immorality."

After the killing, Bacos said, he was standing in the road when another Navy corpsman drove by.

"He asked me what happened, and I was very vague," Bacos testified. "I said, 'I want you to remember something. We're different. We're not like these men.'"

Bacos' wife and father sat in the front row of the courtroom during the court-martial. During a break, Bacos turned to her and mouthed the words, "I love you."

The tiny courtroom was still as Folsom repeatedly asked Bacos if he had been coerced into giving his account of the shooting.

Bacos said he was testifying voluntarily. He wore a white Navy uniform and a Purple Heart his wife said he had been awarded during a previous tour in Iraq.

Bacos was recently transferred from Camp Pendleton, where the Marines have been held, to Marine Corps Air Station Miramar for his own safety.

Military prosecutors had charged Bacos under the theory that he did nothing to stop the alleged crime.

Along with Magincalda, Hutchins and Thomas and Pennington, the other Marines charged are: Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, Pfc. John J. Jodka and Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr.

David Brahms, Pennington's lawyer, said Bacos' account will be subjected to intense scrutiny. "This is just one guy who is going to tell the story as he sees it," Brahms said.

Former Army prosecutor Tom Umberg suggested that others might follow Bacos' lead and strike similar plea bargains.

"You don't want to be the last guy standing. The first guy gets the best deal," he said.

After the proceedings, Bacos said he deeply regrets what happened in Hamdania.

"Hopefully, that family will forgive us for what we have done," he said.

Navy Man Admits Kidnapping Iraqi (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 7, 2006

A Navy petty officer admitted Friday that he was involved in kidnapping an Iraqi man allegedly shot dead by U.S. Marines.

Melson Bacos pleaded guilty to conspiracy and kidnapping in a proceeding at Camp Pendleton, Calif., the Los Angeles Times reported. He was sentenced to a year with credit for time he has already spent in custody.

Bacos' description of the crime can be used in the prosecution of seven Marines charged with the murder of Hashim Ibrahim Awad. He said Awad was trussed up, with hands and feet tied, when he was shot.

Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins, the team leader, went after Awad because he was frustrated at not finding a known insurgent, Bacos said.

"He was mad we kept letting him go when he was a known terrorist," Bacos said.

The Marines and Bacos allegedly set the scene so that Awad appeared to have been planting a bomb when he was shot. But his family complained to military authorities that he had been taken from his house.

Sailor Sentenced To One Year In Iraqi's Slaying (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Navy corpsman admits his role in the killing and asks forgiveness of the victim's family. He will testify against seven Marines in the incident.

CAMP PENDLETON — A Navy corpsman was sentenced Friday to one year in the brig after he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and kidnapping in the death of an Iraqi man and agreed to testify against seven Marines charged with murder.

In an emotional statement at his court-martial, Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson Bacos admitted his role in killing an unarmed man and asked forgiveness of the dead man's family.

"I also apologize to our country, to the Navy and the Marine Corps for not living up to the values of honor, courage and commitment," he told the judge, Col. Steven Folsom. "I've learned from this mistake, and to tell the truth is the only honorable thing I can do."

Bacos, 21, said he was sickened as he watched Marines fatally shoot 52-year-old Hashim Ibrahim Awad, a disabled Iraqi who had been dragged from his home shortly after midnight April 26 in Hamandiya, west of Baghdad.

"I felt shocked and sick to my stomach," Bacos testified.

He said he knew that what the Marines were doing was illegal but he felt powerless to stop it.

"They were going to do what they were going to do," he said. "I felt I couldn't do anything else."

But he added that later in the night, he told a fellow corpsman about his dismay over what the Marines had done, saying: "I want you to remember something — we're different. We're not like these men."

Bacos testified that the Marine squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, had hoped to capture and kill a "high value" Iraqi long suspected of planting bombs. When the original target could not be found, Hutchins allegedly decided to kidnap and kill Awad, who had also been suspected of insurgent connections. The squad was on a late-night ambush mission to catch insurgents planting roadside bombs.

Bacos said he watched the Marines line up and fire at Awad. Hutchins then did a "dead check" on Awad, firing three more rounds into his head, and Cpl. Trent D. Thomas fired seven to 10 rounds into him, Bacos testified.

Bacos said he had earlier asked Cpl. Marshall Magincalda to release Awad but Magincalda refused, telling Bacos he was being a weakling. As a corpsman, Bacos was assigned to provide additional firepower as well as emergency medical help to the Marine squad.

"Why didn't I do more to stop it?" Bacos said in his statement to Folsom. "Why didn't I just walk away? The answer is I wanted to be part of the team."

Prosecutors had asked for a sentence of 10 to 15 years in prison and a dishonorable discharge. Defense attorneys said a term of several months would be sufficient.

Folsom said Friday that he would have sentenced Bacos to 10 years in prison and a dishonorable discharge but that he was bound by the plea agreement already approved by the top general that mandated one year in the brig and no discharge. The secretary of the Navy or the Marine brass, however, could move to discharge him under less than honorable circumstances.

In exchange for his guilty pleas, a murder charge that could have brought the death penalty was dismissed.

Bacos agreed to testify against the Marines, who were once his comrades in Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment.

In the original charges, Bacos faced a murder count even though he was not alleged to have fired his weapon. That charge was based on the theory that any co-conspirator is equally guilty when a murder is committed.

The Marines and Bacos were charged with leaving an AK-47 and shovel near the body to suggest that Awad was an insurgent caught burying a roadside bomb.

Bacos testified that he stole an AK-47 from an Iraqi home and fired it into the air so the Marines would have shell casings to leave beside Awad's body.

Bacos, who is married to a Navy corpsman, had been held at the brig at Camp Pendleton with the other seven defendants since being returned from Iraq in May. But once the plea bargain was reached, he was moved to the brig at Miramar Marine Corps Air Station in San Diego for his safety.

Marine Pfc. John Jodka also has been moved from the brig at Camp Pendleton, suggesting that another plea deal is underway. A gag order prevents lawyers from discussing his case.

Bacos was on his second deployment to Iraq; in his first tour, during the battle in Fallouja in late 2004, he received a Purple Heart after being wounded and a Combat Action Ribbon.

Initially, the Marines told their superiors that Awad had been killed after he was discovered planting a roadside bomb to explode beneath a U.S. military or Iraqi civilian vehicle. But the Marine Corps launched an investigation after Awad's family protested that he had been taken away without provocation and was not connected to the insurgency.

Folsom watched a 19-minute tape of Awad's relatives explaining their version of the April 26 killing before he handed down the sentence. The Iraqi's brothers described Awad as a disabled police officer and father of 11 who bore no malice toward American forces in Iraq.

On Friday, an attorney for one of the Marines asked the judge to close the hearing to the media so Bacos' comments would not be made public and possibly taint any jury pool. Folsom denied the request from attorney David Brahms, who is representing Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington.

"This is not a game," Brahms told reporters. "This is real. I have a man's life in my hands."

The Hamandiya incident is the first of two high-profile cases of alleged brutality against Iraqis by Marines from Camp Pendleton to come to court-martial.

Two dozen Marines are being investigated in a November incident in which 24 Iraqis, including women and children, were killed in the town of Haditha.

A preliminary investigation has concluded that some of the Marines should face murder charges. But Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis Jr., commanding general of Marine Forces Central Command, is still reviewing those recommendations and has not decided whether charges will be filed.

For Recruiter, Saying 'Go Army' Is A Hard Job (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

EL CAJON, Calif. — Sgt. Cameron Murad wanders the strip malls and parking lots of this Iraqi immigrant enclave in the arid foothills beyond San Diego. Wherever he goes, a hush seems to follow.

He stands by the entrance of a Middle Eastern grocery in khakis and a baseball cap, trying to blend in. He smiles gently. He offers the occasional Arabic greeting.

Quietly, he searches the aisles for a version of himself: an Iraqi expatriate with greater ambition than prospects, a Muslim immigrant willing to fight an American war.

There are countless hard jobs for American soldiers supporting the occupation of Iraq. Few seem more impossible than the one assigned to Sergeant Murad. As the conflict grows increasingly violent and unpopular, the sergeant must persuade native Arabic speakers to enlist and serve with front-line troops.

"I feel like a nomad in the middle of the desert, looking for green pastures," said Sergeant Murad, 34, who is from the Kurdish region of Iraq.

Linguists have emerged as critical figures in the occupation. They interpret for commanders in meetings with mayors and sheiks. They translate during the interrogation of Iraqi prisoners. They shadow troops on risky missions.

In the pressing search for Arabic speakers, the military has turned to Middle Eastern immigrants in the United States. Sergeant Murad is a rising star in this effort. He has recruited 10 men to the program in little more than a year, a record unrivaled in the Army National Guard.

Still, he is an unlikely foot soldier in the campaign. His own evolution — from a teenage immigrant who landed in North Dakota after the first gulf war to a spit-and-polish sergeant — has been marked with private suffering.

In boot camp, he was called a "raghead." Comrades have questioned his patriotism. Last year a staff sergeant greeted him by calling out, "Here comes the Taliban!"

He remembers a day in 2002 when the comedian Drew Carey visited a base in Saudi Arabia where he was working. During a skit, Sergeant Murad recalled, Mr. Carey dropped to the ground to mimic the Muslim prayer. As the troops roared with laughter, Sergeant Murad walked out.

"I thought about my mom when she prays, how humble she is," he said.

Yet, day after day, Sergeant Murad sets out to sell other immigrants on the life he has lived. He believes that Muslims need the military more than ever, he said: At a time when many feel alienated, it offers them a path to assimilation, a way to become undeniably American.

It has proved, for him and others, the ultimate rite of passage.

"It's almost like Superman wearing his cape," said Gunnery Sgt. Jamal Baadani, 42, an Egyptian immigrant with the United States Marine Corps. "I've got my uniform on, and you can't take that away from me because I've earned it."

Sergeant Murad has earned it, but with a price. He has changed his name. He has drifted from Islam. He often finds himself at odds with the immigrants he is trying to enlist.

To many of them, he is a mystery. He sees himself as a man of unavoidable contradictions: an American patriot and a loyal Kurd; a champion of the military to outsiders, a survivor within its ranks.

Feeling Like an Outcast

The sergeant is six feet tall, but often stands shrunken, his hands politely clasped. He has a long, distinguished nose and wears glasses that darken in the sun but never fully fade, lending him a distant aura.

He plies the streets of El Cajon in a rumbling, black Toyota Tacoma pickup. In the back, he carries stacks of fliers advertising what the Army calls the "09-Lima" program.

Through the program, speakers of Arabic, Farsi, Dari, Pashto and Kurdish are sent to boot camp like other soldiers. They later receive specialized training as linguists, and a majority are deployed to Iraq.

Of the thousands of interpreters working for the military in Iraq, most are civilians under contract, some of whom earn as much as $170,000 a year. But military commanders prefer uniformed linguists because they cannot refuse combat missions and are subjected to more thorough security checks.

They are offered a fraction of what many civilian linguists earn, with salaries starting at roughly $28,000, including allowances. The program's perks, such as expedited citizenship, a starting bonus and medical coverage, are a major draw, military officials said.

Since the Army created the program in 2003, more than 800 people have signed up. But nearly 40 percent of them have either dropped out or failed language tests or boot camp. Enlistment in the program has improved with the help of civilian Arabic speakers contracted by the Army to recruit.

In California, the Army National Guard is trying the same approach, but with troops. Capt. Hatem Abdine assembled a team of soldiers of mostly Middle Eastern descent to help recruit full time, and brought Sergeant Murad on board last year.

In April, the sergeant arrived in El Cajon. Before his first week was up, he felt like an outcast.

Stacks of fliers and business cards that he had left in grocery stores had vanished. Cashiers who welcomed him on his first visits were suddenly too busy to talk. One manager fled the store. The owner of another shop turned his back and flipped kebobs over a high-licking flame.

"They're so agitated when I approach them," Sergeant Murad said. "Is it because I'm ugly? I don't think I'm that ugly."

Nestled in a parched valley, El Cajon drew its first Iraqi settlers half a century ago because of the resemblance it bore to their homeland. The population boomed in the 1990's when thousands of refugees — primarily Kurds and Shiites — joined what had long been the domain of whites and Hispanics.

Sergeant Murad makes his rounds with a truck full of Army promotional items, including a box of T-shirts that state, in Arabic, "If you can read this" — and then in English — "the National Guard needs you." He cannot bring himself to wear one.

"To put on that shirt and keep a face free of blush — it's just an impossible thing for me to do," he said

He favors a more subdued approach. He strolls into restaurants and barber shops, as though he were just passing through. He offers a smooth, "Assalamu alaikum," or peace be upon you.

A conversation begins. Soon, Sergeant Murad is reminiscing about his hometown, Kirkuk. Then, almost as an afterthought, he mentions his job. "Call if you know anyone," he says, offering a card.

But the calls rarely come. When they do, recruitment is hard won. In the fall of 2005, Sergeant Murad signed up his first two recruits. Over the next 12 months, he found about 20 other men. Half of them changed their minds.

Most often, recruits do not follow through because of objections from a parent or spouse. Others learn of more lucrative opportunities. Store windows in El Cajon are plastered with fliers advertising the six-figure salaries offered to civilian interpreters.

Some of the sergeant's candidates are overcome by fear. A 33-year-old Egyptian man from Hemet, Calif., withdrew from the program in June after watching news from the region on Arabic television channels.

"I know what's happening over there," said the man, who would not give his name. "My kids need me more than the money."

From late 2002 to May 2006, 172 civilian contract linguists were killed in Afghanistan and Iraq, representing 2.6 percent of the roughly 6,500 linguists who worked for United States coalition forces, a Department of Defense official said.

None of the 152 interpreters who have served in Iraq for the 09-Lima program have been killed. But that fact carries little weight in El Cajon, where memories of violence linger.

"They came here to live in peace and now you're asking them to go to war," said the owner of a bakery on Main Street who had fought against Iran with Saddam Hussein's army. "We are full up of the war."

In the pursuit of trust, it does not help that Sergeant Murad is Kurdish. The Kurds, like the Shiites, are often seen to have an interest in promoting the American occupation of Iraq because of the repression they suffered under Mr. Hussein.

The sergeant, who refers to the occupation as "the liberation," does not hide his impassioned support of the war, or the fact that he is Kurdish.

Sometimes, this backfires. When he told an Iraqi woman at a Laundromat that he was Kurdish, she snapped, "Saddam was a wonderful president."

One afternoon last April, Sergeant Murad dropped by the Main Street bakery, bought a box of chocolates and left another stack of pamphlets behind. He was sure they would be tossed, but seemed not to care. He was feeling giddy.

For the first time in weeks, he had a candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0078441

The Sting of 9/11

Sergeant Murad's path to the United States military began 15 years ago, on a lush meadow in Kurdistan.

American helicopters hovered overhead, dropping packets of dehydrated food to thousands of refugees, including Sergeant Murad, his three brothers and their parents.

The next day, they reached a refugee camp run by the United States military in Zakho. There, a group of marines was standing guard, hefty, tattooed and smiling. Sergeant Murad, then 18 and rail-thin, thought the men looked like warriors.

Soon after, in September 1991, the family arrived in Minot, N.D., as political refugees. A year later, Sergeant Murad got his green card and enlisted in the Army.

"If a person like me isn't obligated to serve this country, who is?" he said. "I had to make a decision that this is my country, that this side is my side."

He entered the military as Kamaran Taha Muhammad. When he got to boot camp at Fort Jackson, S.C., he spoke choppy English.

He was, and remains, a shy man. "If a fly looks at me, I turn red," Sergeant Murad said.

But the first time a fellow soldier insulted him, he threw a punch. He fought often enough that he was relegated to kitchen patrol.

In time, Sergeant Murad made friends. When he graduated as a light-wheel mechanic, his fellow soldiers cheered.

The first few years of his military life went smoothly. He was stationed at a base in Germany. After his tour of duty ended, he found work as the head civilian linguist at an Air Force base in Riyadh.

But on Sept. 11, 2001, as Sergeant Murad watched the attacks on television in Riyadh, he felt a searing angst. The next day, he walked into the dining hall holding a tray, and stopped at a table of officers he knew.

He told them he was sorry. No one responded.

"He didn't know where he fit in," said Fernando Muzquiz, 42, now a retired master sergeant with the Air Force.

Sergeant Murad experienced a shift after Sept. 11, both in his relationship to Islam and to America. It was as if a fault line crept through him.

As a Muslim, he felt ashamed.

"I was crushed theologically," he said. He pored through the Koran, looking for proof that it condemned terrorism. But from the loud speakers of mosques in Riyadh, he heard sheiks praying for the mujahedeen.

From Americans, he felt the sting of suspicion.

On trips home to Minnesota, where his parents had moved, Sergeant Murad noticed the new attention he got at airports. In Atlanta, a security officer saw his last name, which was still Muhammad, and called out, "We got one."

Sergeant Murad wanted to prove his loyalty. He got his chance when the United States invaded Iraq.

By then, he was working in Bahrain as a civilian linguist with the Naval Criminal Investigative Service. (He had lost his job in Riyadh after taking an unauthorized trip off base, which he attributed to a lapse of judgment.)

In Bahrain, he was elated to learn that he would be sent to southern Iraq on a top-secret mission with the Navy Seals. But several days into the voyage, he heard a sailor on his ship whisper, "Cam is one of them."

Sergeant Murad stopped working for the Navy in March, with his mission in Iraq successfully completed.

That month, he changed his name.

"In a way, it was my reaction to say, 'No, I am not the same as this criminal, this coward,' " said Sergeant Murad, referring to Osama bin Laden. "I am an American, I am Cam, I am a naturalized citizen."

Kamaran became Cameron. Muhammad was dropped for another, less conspicuous family name, Murad.

The middle name he chose was perhaps most surprising: Fargo.

"I always wanted a connection to North Dakota," he said.

Even with a new name, Sergeant Murad felt ill at ease back in the United States. He has stopped going to mosques. He no longer considers himself a practicing Muslim. He has few Middle Eastern friends.

"If somebody's name is on a list, and that person has my name or contact number, I will get harassed," he said.

The Army, he decided, was the most comfortable place to be. In 2005, he joined the National Guard full time.

DOJ_NMG_0078442

He is careful to tell potential recruits about the military's zero tolerance policy on discrimination, and urges them to file complaints should harassment occur.

Still, Sergeant Murad has never filed a complaint of his own. During several interviews, he was reluctant to talk about his negative experiences, saying that he did not want to "whine" and that all immigrants endure hardship before they are accepted.

Last year, when an instructor at an Army base referred to Sergeant Murad as "the Taliban," he laughed along.

"I laughed not to cause trouble," he said. "I laughed because I am really getting tired of this. I laughed because I know it's a hopeless situation. What do you do? You just have to laugh."

"It doesn't matter what you think of me," he said. "Like it or not, I'm your brother in arms."

Closing the Deal

The new candidate's name was Khaled. Sergeant Murad jotted down his number, passed on by the captain. The Iraqi immigrant had called after spotting a brochure about the program, the captain explained. And there was one more thing: the man was on the fence.

Sergeant Murad's job is often one of delicate persuasion. He began by talking to Khaled, who lived near El Cajon, on the phone. (To protect his identity, the military requested that his last name not be published.)

By the time they agreed to meet, Sergeant Murad felt uneasy. Not only was Khaled a Sunni; he was from Mr. Hussein's home province.

A stout man with a mustache answered the door. He seemed overweight for the rigors of boot camp, thought the sergeant, and his age — 39 — was just short of the cutoff.

They stiffly shook hands, and then sat and sipped tea in a tidy, candle-scented apartment. A framed picture showed Khaled, his wife and three children waving from Disney World. Since arriving in the United States in 1999, Khaled had hopped from one low-wage job to another, pumping gas, stocking groceries.

Now, he told Sergeant Murad, he had made up his mind. He needed the educational loans the military offered.

Still, he was nervous.

"I'm expecting a shock," said Khaled. "I've been hearing good things, bad things."

As he does with all recruits, Sergeant Murad warned Khaled that he might be hazed at boot camp, and distrusted by other soldiers. But over time, the sergeant promised, he would make friends.

The two men sat talking until the afternoon turned to dusk. The sergeant gave Khaled tips on how to lose weight, and promised to help prepare him for the English tests. Before parting, they embraced.

As Sergeant Murad drove off, he smiled and shook his head. "This is an Arab from the Sunni Triangle trusting a Kurd with his life," he said.

Khaled entered boot camp in July and is now in advanced training.

Often, finding recruits is only the beginning of Sergeant Murad's job. He spends time with their families after they have joined up, reassuring mothers that their sons will eat properly, and helping wives fill out insurance forms.

Last April, Sergeant Murad drove to a boxy stucco house to visit the pregnant wife of a 22-year-old Shiite recruit. The woman was worried about her husband's safety in Iraq.

"The fact that he's an Iraqi — it's unfathomable to these nationals that he would be with the United States military," she said in Arabic, perched on a couch next to her mother-in-law.

"He is Muslim and in the military — it doesn't look right."

The older woman frowned.

"If it were up to me, I would make you join the military because they freed you from Saddam," she told her daughter-in-law.

Boot camp had been effective, the mother said. Her son seemed newly disciplined, more mature. There was only one thing she disliked: his limited vacation.

"Just two weeks!" she said. "Even in the army of Saddam Hussein, this wasn't the case."

On a sunny afternoon in August, Sergeant Murad was back in his truck, cruising El Cajon with a fresh stack of business cards.

DOJ_NMG_0078443

He was learning to avoid certain shops. He waved mockingly at the kebab store as his truck rolled by, no longer concerned about who might be watching.

He had come to the conclusion that first impressions counted little.

Plenty of Iraqis had misjudged him. Eventually, though, they grew to like him.

It was the same with soldiers, Sergeant Murad said. He looked back on his time in boot camp as the ultimate proof that hardship can be overcome, and wary comrades, won over.

"In the end, when somebody gets to know Cam the soldier, Cam the citizen, they always take my side," he said. "That's where my triumph is. The hurt goes away."

Picking Up The Pieces Of Slain Troops' Lives (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

ABERDEEN PROVING GROUND, Md. -- Spread across several tables in a vast warehouse here are the pieces of one soldier's life.

There is the photo album with images of graduations and family gatherings, tanks and smiling military buddies. There are piles of brown T-shirts and socks, a jumble of sneakers and boots, a plastic bag filled with handwritten letters. A knife. A stack of video games.

Nearby, surrounded by walls of metal mesh, are rows of dusty black footlockers that have just returned from war. Inside each are the artifacts of other lives cut short.

This is the Joint Personal Effects Depot, a pair of warehouses on this base northeast of Baltimore that serve as the military's main repository for the possessions of U.S. troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan. Within days of troops' deaths in action, their clothes, pictures and books and everything else that defined their lives on the battlefield wind up here.

It is then the job of 138 people to inventory, photograph, clean and pack all of the items so they can be sent home to grieving families, the last remnants of the ones they loved.

There are ghosts here, whispers of these people who sacrificed their lives to serve their country. In a recent tour of the facility, the names and identifying information of the dead were concealed to protect their families, but the presence of the dead was still strong.

"There's a lot of each individual in those lockers," said Lt. Col. L. Scott Kilmon Jr., who commands the depot. Working with the materials day after day can be an emotional strain, he said. "It takes a toll on you."

The workload has gotten steadily heavier over the past few years, as nearly 3,000 U.S. troops have died in the Middle East and thousands more have been injured. The seriously wounded who are evacuated from the fighting also have their things shipped to Aberdeen now. Kilmon said the depot is bracing for the fall and winter, when there have been higher levels of U.S. casualties in Iraq.

And because the fighting seems likely to continue, the Defense Department is working to establish the depot as a more permanent operation. Kilmon said there are plans underway to move the temporary, wartime facility to Dover Air Force Base by 2009, which would put it at the same facility where the troops' remains are processed. Now, the items are flown to Dover and are loaded on semitrailers for the 90-minute drive to this makeshift operation in Maryland, where the effects are organized.

The warehouse feels a bit like a morgue. The rows of mesh cages are chilly, and somber employees meticulously sift through the items.

"Five brown T-shirts," called out Pfc. Alisha Ricketts, sitting in one cage cataloguing the contents of eight footlockers that belonged to a noncommissioned officer recently killed in Baghdad. "One white washcloth."

A photograph of two young children peeked out of a plastic bag in front of Ricketts. Spec. Tyrone Wheatley placed woodworking magazines into a footlocker and glanced at a clipboard. Dirty socks, Fruit of the Loom underwear, shirts and shorts were streaked with desert dust and grime, the pile giving off the scent of the soldier's sweat, fresh from the Iraqi summer heat. A little bit of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0078444

In most cases, after all the items are inventoried, workers wash the clothes, scrub the boots and clean all equipment with compressed air, said Maj. Leslie Rafferty, the depot's operations officer. Washers and dryers hum constantly. Compact discs are wiped of dust. Camera film is developed.

"We slowly but surely lay out their life," Rafferty said.

Some families, she said, send notice that they do not want the clothes washed, so they can smell their loved one when the items are returned. All government-issued items are logged and returned to circulation, so the sleeping bags and compasses are later issued to others who might be deployed.

Marvin Scott, 63, looked up as he tied the laces of a soldier's left Asics sneaker, tucking the bow behind its tongue.

"You're seeing the pictures of their families, their wives, their children, and you know they have a lot of hurt," Scott said. "It can be very emotional. Not everyone can work here."

Scott, a civilian contractor who puts the finishing touches on items that are to be sent home, folds creases into T-shirts and creates careful stacks of DVDs. It can be heartbreaking, he said, but he wants each family to see that someone has taken the time to neatly pack the reminders away for them. And he has seen a lot of those reminders up close.

"You can read a lot about a person by what they had with them," Scott said. "You can tell how they dressed, you can tell what they listened to, what they watched and what they read. Sometimes you can really see them."

This soldier, the one Scott was getting to know on a recent day, was devoted to video games and anime. A PlayStation 2 sat in a plastic bag, a large television tipped on its back in a footlocker. Games like "Ape Escape: On the Loose" lay next to such DVDs as "The Matrix," "Eraser" and "South Park," a veritable catalogue of young-American-male pop culture.

In a separate bag with a set of the soldier's dog tags was a solitary black plastic comb, its tines bent and color slightly faded from countless runs through the man's hair.

Nearby, on a set of tables where a new footlocker was just unlocked and opened, Pfc. James Childress ran a gloved hand over a pile of books, traces of dirt slipping from the worn pages. Stephen King's "Desperation" sat next to a yellowed copy of "You've Come a Long Way, Charlie Brown." Farther down the table was a pair of flip-flops, an impression of feet in the foam.

All documents, letters, data drives and photographs are carefully examined in a secret environment to make sure that nothing classified returns home, and also to make sure that nothing untoward is left for parents, spouses and children. Pornography, for example, is removed. "Human beings are human beings," Rafferty said.

Kilmon said depot employees have found wills and messages to family members on computer drives, including an audiotape one soldier made for his child, who was not yet born when he recorded the message. Sometimes workers have to walk off the line to gather their emotions.

Big-screen televisions have become more common, and employees said they see a lot of guitars, too. An acoustic guitar waited on a table to be packed last week. The most unusual item: a motorcycle.

Though clothes with blood or tissue on them are supposed to go with the bodies for transfer to medical examiners, they appear at the depot from time to time. A large cardboard box sits on a loading dock, labeled "medical examiner." Under the lid are dozens of translucent red biohazard bags filled with camouflage clothes, some bloodstained. Sometimes there are bits of human remains.

The officers here know that when there are mass casualties in Iraq or Afghanistan, their operation is going to be busy about three weeks later; there is an average of 22 days between a death in the field and the arrival of personal items at the depot. Another 11 days or so later, the items are shipped by FedEx to families around the country.

"In my first days here, I was just in awe," Childress said, standing back for a moment to survey one soldier's belongings. "These are all real people. We know we're the final link between them and their families."

Sharon Potter Sworn In As Local U.S. Attorney (WHI)

By MICHELLE BLUM

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, October 7, 2006

WHEELING — Sharon Potter was sworn in Friday as the new U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia, but a formal ceremony will be held at a later date, according to information provided by Potter's office.

Potter succeeds Thomas Johnston, who was sworn in as U.S. District Judge for the Southern District of West Virginia in April.

Potter was sworn in by U.S District Judge Irene M. Keeley in Clarksburg. Details of the formal event have not yet been released.

Potter has served as assistant U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of West Virginia since September 1992, according to information provided by Potter's office.

Assigned to the U.S. Attorney's office in Wheeling, Potter has handled a variety of criminal prosecutions ranging from fraud and tax evasion to drug trafficking and computer-related crime.

Potter has also been involved in criminal and civil property forfeiture cases, generating resources for state and local law enforcement agencies. She has also obtained funds for victims of fraud through restitution in a variety of cases.

Working with the FBI, Potter assisted in forming a district-wide computer crime task force and has been involved in initiatives with federal agencies designed to foster the networking and sharing of knowledge and resources between academia, industry and law enforcement to better identify and prosecute computer crimes.

In 1997, Potter received the Department of Justice Director's Award for Superior Performance following her prosecution of a nationwide securities fraud/money laundering case, which involved about 15,000 victims and netted more than $2.3 million in forfeitures.

In addition, Potter worked closely with the Internal Revenue Service Criminal Investigation Division investigating and prosecuting tax-related cases involving income and employment tax evasion, abusive tax shelters and other financial fraud matters.

She also worked with the Three Rivers Drug Task Force in Fairmont, prosecuting federal drug trafficking offenses.

A graduate of Vanderbilt University and California Western School of Law, Potter began her legal career with the West Virginia Public Service Commission in 1985. From 1987-89, Potter worked as an assistant district attorney in Centre County, Pa. From 1990-92, Potter was an associate with the law firm of Martin & Seibert in Martinsburg and was an assistant prosecutor in Berkley County, W.Va.

Potter resides in Wheeling with her husband and three children.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Farmer Mac Plans To Restate Results From Three Years (WP/BLOOM)

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Farmer Mac, the government-chartered buyer of U.S. farm loans, said it would restate its financial results for 2003, 2004 and 2005 to correct how it accounted for some derivatives transactions.

The changes won't "have any significant" effect on capital, the company said yesterday. Farmer Mac didn't provide an estimate of the size of the restatement. The company reported combined profit of $87.3 million for 2003, 2004 and 2005.

The accounting rule involved in Farmer Mac's restatement is the same one that caused mortgage finance companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and some of the Federal Home Loan banks to restate their results in recent years. The rule requires companies to determine the market value of derivatives and account for them on their balance sheets.

Derivatives are financial instruments derived from stocks, bonds, loans, currencies and commodities, or linked to specific events, such as changes in interest rates or the weather.

There are exceptions, but after reviewing its books, Farmer Mac determined that "fluctuations in the fair value of its derivatives will be reflected in the statements of operations rather than being deferred or offset," the company said.

Shares of Farmer Mac fell 35 cents, to $25.33.

Farmer Mac made no personnel changes related to the restatement, company spokeswoman Andrea Calise said. She declined to say when Farmer Mac began its accounting review.

Accounting errors at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and quarterly losses at some Federal Home Loan banks are fueling a push in Congress to change how government-chartered finance companies are regulated.

Suit Over Sale Of MySpace Dismissed (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 7, 2006

News Corp., the buyer, says it feels 'vindicated'

News Corp., Rupert Murdoch's media company, said a judge dismissed a lawsuit challenging its purchase of MySpace.com, rejecting claims by Brad Greenspan, former chief executive officer of the Web site's parent, that the deal cheated shareholders.

Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Carolyn Kuhl ruled Friday that the acquisition of Intermix Media Inc., MySpace's parent company, last year was lawful and shareholders were fully informed when they voted on the transaction, New York-based News Corp. said Monday.

The decision lifts a cloud over the popular networking site, which Greenspan says he started in August 2003.

He sued MySpace in February, saying the $580 million paid by News Corp.'s Fox unit didn't reflect the growth prospects.

Thursday, he demanded a federal investigation into the sale, claiming the deal defrauded shareholders of more than $20 billion.

News Corp. and Fox Interactive "feel vindicated" by the ruling, Mike Angus, general counsel of News Corp.'s Fox Interactive Media, said.

Greenspan last week posted his claims in a report at Freemyspace.com, a Web site where he argued the purchase should be nullified.

He said he was seeking an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and the Senate.

MySpace would be worth billions of dollars had it stayed on its own and sold shares to the public, Greenspan said, an assertion challenged by analysts.

News Corp. snatched MySpace during a weekend in July 2005 after Viacom Inc. offered $500 million for the business. MySpace has more than doubled its registered users this year, to more than 110 million.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rove Aide Linked To Abramoff Resigns (WP)

By Peter Baker And James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

A top aide to White House strategist Karl Rove resigned yesterday after disclosures that she accepted gifts from and passed information to now-convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, becoming the first official in the West Wing to lose a job in the influence-peddling scandal.

Susan B. Ralston submitted her resignation to avoid causing political damage to President Bush a month before the midterm elections, officials said. "She did not want to be a distraction to the White House at this important time," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

A congressional report showed last week that Ralston accepted sometimes-pricey tickets to nine sports and entertainment events from Abramoff while she provided him with inside White House information. The bipartisan report said there is no evidence that Rove knew of or approved of Ralston's actions, and sources said yesterday that the White House was surprised by the report's revelations.

The White House counsel's office conducted a review of the report, but with Ralston's departure it closed its inquiry yesterday. "Nothing more will come from the report, no further fallout from the report," Perino said.

A senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the counsel's office reached no conclusion about whether Ralston violated gift limits because her resignation made the point moot. But the official said there were

"mitigating circumstances" in her case because she had a preexisting relationship with Abramoff, for whom she worked before joining the White House. The official said the White House made no criminal referral in her case. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment.

The sprawling Abramoff investigations have triggered prosecutions on Capitol Hill and on K Street, but Ralston's resignation brought the scandal into the White House proper. The only other White House official caught up in the probe has been David H. Safavian, the procurement chief for the Office of Management and Budget, who was convicted in June of lying about his ties to Abramoff.

As right hand to the president's most important adviser, Ralston was closer to the center of the Bush operation. She was a key organizer of presidential events, coordinating with White House political, scheduling, advance and public liaison offices. "She will be missed because she solves problems, and finding people in government who solve problems" is rare, a colleague said.

Ralston, who earned $122,000 a year, had been a minor player in the scandal for more than a year, but it was not until her e-mails with the lobbyist were released by the House Government Reform Committee last week that her role became known.

The information supplied by Ralston to Abramoff often involved procedural matters, social events and possible administration appointments, the committee said.

Rules ban White House officials from accepting gifts worth more than $20 from anyone doing business with the government. Exceptions can be made for preexisting relationships, although ethics officers generally advise officials to avoid anything that might be misinterpreted.

Rove has been out of town all week and declined to comment yesterday. A colleague said that neither Rove nor anyone else at the White House pushed Ralston to leave. Ralston did not respond to telephone or e-mail messages yesterday, and her attorney, Bradford A. Berenson, declined to comment.

In a letter to the president dated Thursday, Ralston wrote: "It has been a tremendous privilege to work at the White House and now after almost six years the time has come for me to pursue other opportunities." The White House did not announce the resignation until Friday afternoon, timing that is often used to minimize bad news.

"She leaves without any animosity from us," said White House counselor Dan Bartlett. "She's been a tireless worker for the president, and we will be sad to see her leave."

As a former Abramoff assistant, Ralston played intermediary between the lobbyist and Rove. The congressional report found 66 Abramoff contacts with the White House, more than half of them with Ralston. In addition, Abramoff's lobbying colleagues contacted Ralston 69 times.

On Oct. 21, 2001, Ralston e-mailed Abramoff that Rove had read an Abramoff memo about a political endorsement in the Mariana Islands governor's race, a little-noticed election but one important to Abramoff because he had lucrative clients there. Ralston reported to Abramoff that Rove had agreed, writing the next day: "You win :)."

More often, Abramoff fell short at the White House. Abramoff contacted Ralston to get Rove to place a close ally, Mark Zachares, as head of the Interior Department's Office of Insular Affairs. Ralston rebuffed a meeting with Rove for Zachares, saying it was unnecessary because Rove was on their side. But Zachares did not get the position.

In November and December 2003, Abramoff e-mailed Ralston about Iraqi bonds apparently issued by one of his clients, American Bondholders Foundation, the House committee said. In response, Ralston indicated that the National Security Council had not "gotten back to me yet." Six days later, she had an answer. "The NSC is very suspect of this proposal," she wrote. "The White House will not support it."

Ralston helped Rove get tickets from Abramoff for a game in the NCAA basketball tournament but told Abramoff that "Karl has to pay for his tickets." The White House said last week that Rove paid for his tickets. But Ralston apparently did not pay for tickets she accepted to Bruce Springsteen and Andrea Bocelli concerts and Washington Capitals, Washington Wizards and Baltimore Orioles games.

"Are floor seats available," Ralston asked in December 2001 for four Wizards tickets worth a combined $1,300, the report said.

"For you? Anything!" Abramoff replied. "How many do you need?"

Ralston: "4"

DOJ_NMG_0078448

"You got 'em," Abramoff said. "I'll organize."

Aide Who Linked Abramoff And Rove Resigns At White House (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — Susan B. Ralston, a former aide to the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff who went on to work for the presidential adviser Karl Rove, has resigned from the White House after a report that she was a conduit between the two men.

Ms. Ralston submitted her resignation to President Bush on Thursday night, saying the time had come "to pursue other opportunities."

Administration officials acknowledged, however, that she quit as a result of a Congressional report, released last week, that documented hundreds of contacts between Mr. Abramoff and the White House.

"A protracted discussion of the report was not in anyone's best interest, and when she chose to step down, we supported her decision," a White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said.

According to the report, Ms. Ralston was repeatedly lobbied by Mr. Abramoff after she became a top aide to Mr. Rove, as her former boss sought to curry favor with her new one. Once a high-rolling operator who lavished gifts on lawmakers and officials — in exchange, he hoped, for help with his clients — Mr. Abramoff has become, in the midterm elections, synonymous with corruption.

For more than a year, Ms. Ralston was entangled in two Washington scandals at once. A nexus between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Rove, she was also pivotal in the C.I.A. leak case. It was Ms. Ralston who patched through a telephone call from a Time magazine reporter to Mr. Rove, a conversation that cast a suspicion on the White House strategist. Ms. Ralston testified to a grand jury on the leak and was interviewed by prosecutors in the Abramoff case.

Ms. Ralston was never accused of wrongdoing. The Congressional report suggested she merely passed on messages from Mr. Abramoff to Mr. Rove, who sought basketball tickets from the lobbyist and ate at his restaurant (where, White House officials said, Mr. Rove paid for his own meals).

On Friday, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, which issued the report, accused White House officials of "trying to make Susan Ralston the scapegoat."

"There is a lot that we don't yet know about the assistance that Ms. Ralston provided Mr. Abramoff from inside the White House," Mr. Waxman said in a statement. "But there are also many unanswered questions about the assistance that higher-ranking White House officials appeared to provide Mr. Abramoff."

Ms. Ralston was promoted after the 2004 election, receiving the title special assistant to the president and a raise to $122,000, from $64,700.

White House Aide Ralston Quits After Abramoff Report (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, October 7, 2006

Oct. 6 (Bloomberg) -- A top aide to White House political director Karl Rove has resigned after a U.S. House report examined her ties to disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The aide, Susan Ralston, is quitting a week after a House Government Reform panel described her role in arranging tickets to sporting events from the lobbyist to Rove.

``She recognized that a protracted discussion of the matters in the House Government Reform Committee's report would be a distraction to the White House, and she chose to step down," assistant White House Press Secretary Dana Perino said. ``We support her decision, and after a review of the report, we consider the matter closed."

The report showed that Abramoff claimed at least 485 contacts with administration officials between 2001 and 2004, including nine with Rove. Based on billing records from Abramoff's former law firm, the report said he claimed 17 meetings, seven telephone conversations and 42 e-mail exchanges with White House officials -- more than half with Ralston, who also is a former colleague of Abramoff's.

The report cited several instances in which Ralston helped Abramoff get access to White House officials, passed documents to Rove and kept Abramoff informed about political appointees he was pushing for jobs.

Iraqi Bonds

In November 2003, Ralston told Abramoff about the position the National Security Council was taking on Iraqi bonds, which was of interest to one of Abramoff's clients, the American Bondholders Foundation, according to the report.

Abramoff and Ralston also discussed the possibility of Ralston taking a job with a defense company, the report said.

Ralston may have received tickets for nine sporting events and concerts, including four tickets to an Aug. 10, 2002, Bruce Springsteen concert, the report said. In all, the tickets offered to Ralston were worth $1,300, it said.

``In most cases, the documents do not indicate whether the White House officials paid or offered to pay for the tickets," the report said. Ralston requested tickets for herself on at least seven occasions, the report said. In one instance, Abramoff e-mailed Ralston about hockey tickets: ``No problem, you don't have to pay!"

Other Opportunities

In her resignation letter to President George W. Bush yesterday, Ralston said ``the time has come for me to pursue other opportunities."

The report showed that Abramoff routinely offered concert and sports tickets to White House officials, and that in 2002 Ralston was also the go-between on tickets to the NCAA basketball tournament for Rove, tickets Rove said he paid for.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Jan. 3 to conspiracy to corrupt public officials and is cooperating with a federal probe.

The Abramoff case has already led to the conviction of former White House official David Safavian and an agreement to plead guilty to accepting illegal gifts by Representative Robert Ney, an Ohio Republican.

Abramoff also was sentenced in March to five years and 10 months in prison in a separate Florida fraud case.

In her capacity as Rove's assistant, Ralston also testified before a federal grand jury investigating whether administration officials purposely leaked the identity of CIA agent Valerie Plame; neither Rove nor Ralston was charged with wrongdoing in that matter.

White House Aide To Rove Resigns (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 7, 2006

The latest casualty in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal was a key aide to presidential political strategist Karl Rove who once worked for the disgraced influence-peddler.

Susan Ralston stepped down Friday from her post as a special assistant to President Bush. A congressional report showed she had extensive contacts with Abramoff and had accepted tickets to sporting events and concerts from him.

Corruption and scandal are major issues going into the Nov. 7 elections. Ralston's resignation followed accusations that her contacts with Abramoff showed he was closer to Rove and Bush than the White House has been willing to acknowledge.

"She recognized that a protracted discussion of these matters would be a distraction to the White House and she's chosen to step down," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said.

A recent House Government Reform Committee report listed hundreds of contacts that Abramoff's lobbying group had with the White House. Ralston had been administrative assistant to Abramoff and, after Bush took office, assumed the same post with Rove.

Ralston played an instrumental role in organizing and choosing presidential event sites.

Rep. Henry Waxman of California, the top Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, said he suspects the White House is trying to make Ralston a scapegoat.

"There is a lot that we don't yet know about the assistance that Ms. Ralston provided Mr. Abramoff from inside the White House, but there are also many unanswered questions about the assistance that higher-ranking White House officials appeared to provide Mr. Abramoff," Waxman said.

"The vast majority of lobbying contacts and meals with White House officials documented in the report were with White House officials other than Ms. Ralston," Waxman said.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to fraud and is now cooperating with prosecutors in an influence-peddling investigation that has enveloped Capitol Hill even as lawmakers, facing elections, struggle with the fallout from a scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley's salacious messages to teenage male pages.

The latest Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that about half of likely voters consider corruption and scandal in Congress very or extremely important, and about two in three of those said they would vote for Democrats in House races.

The committee's report — based largely on Abramoff's billing records and e-mails — listed 485 lobbying contacts with White House officials over three years, including 10 with Rove. The report indicated that Abramoff and associates lobbied on behalf of more than 20 individuals for administration jobs but were successful only once.

According to e-mails, Abramoff and his team offered White House officials tickets to 19 sporting events and concerts. Ralston was the most frequent recipient. The report did not make clear whether Ralston or other White House officials paid for any of the tickets.

The federal gratuities statute makes it a crime to give anything of value to a public official for any official act performed by that official. Ethics rules prohibit federal employees from accepting gifts unless given because of personal friendship.

Top Rove Aide Resigns In Lobby Scandal (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Susan Ralston quits after a panel shows her as a link between Jack Abramoff and officials.

WASHINGTON — The top aide to White House strategist Karl Rove quit Friday, a week after congressional investigators portrayed her as a key link between senior officials and the now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff — brokering deals for his clients as she accepted premium tickets to sporting events and concerts.

Susan Ralston had worked as Rove's executive assistant, functioning as a gatekeeper of sorts for President Bush's most trusted political advisor. She was an aide to Abramoff before she joined the White House and became what the lobbyist called his "implant" there.

As Rove's top staffer and a special assistant to the president, Ralston becomes the closest aide to Bush to leave in a scandal that has so far enveloped lobbyists, lawmakers, Capitol Hill aides and an administration procurement official while, until now, sparing the inner sanctum of the White House.

Her departure comes as Republican leaders on Capitol Hill combat allegations that they did not adequately respond to inappropriate behavior toward House pages by Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.). It is the latest GOP setback in a midterm election year increasingly defined by scandal. Republicans are hoping to retain majorities in the House and Senate for the final two years of Bush's presidency.

Ralston "did not want to be a distraction to the White House at this important time," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, adding that Ralston "played a very valuable role in advancing the president's agenda." Perino said Ralston would leave within the next couple of weeks.

The report issued last week by the House Governmental Reform Committee quoted e-mails from Ralston in which, among other things, she helped lobby Rove about political endorsements in tiny U.S. protectorates represented by Abramoff and arranged for Rove to sit as Abramoff's guest in a private box for first-round games in the NCAA basketball tournament.

The bipartisan investigation documented more than 400 lobbying contacts between Abramoff's team and the White House between January 2001 and March 2004, including dozens with Rove's office and nine with the top strategist himself. The report was based on thousands of pages of billing records and e-mails obtained from Abramoff's firm.

The committee did not subpoena information from the White House, making it difficult to conclude in many cases whether Abramoff's requests were granted and whether the lobbyist, as White House officials have argued, was exaggerating his influence.

The report suggests Ralston accepted premium tickets to nine events, including professional basketball, hockey and baseball games as well as a performance by Italian tenor Andrea Bocelli for which ticket prices, according to a newspaper account at the time, ranged from $88 to $333.

Ethics rules forbid officials from taking gifts worth more than $20 from people doing business with the government, but the committee investigation did not determine whether Ralston and other officials paid for tickets in every case or listed them on disclosure forms. E-mails suggested Rove paid $50 apiece for NCAA basketball tickets.

Perino said Friday that the White House review of the 91-page report was "complete" and that "we expect nothing further to come of the report" beyond Ralston's departure.

Democrats were not satisfied, charging that the White House was making Ralston a "scapegoat" to avoid answering more serious questions. The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of Los Angeles, issued a statement Friday noting that Ralston's 69 contacts with Abramoff and his team reflected less than 15% of all of the contacts with White House officials, and saying that the actions of senior aides such as former political director Ken Mehlman deserved more scrutiny.

Last week's report included e-mails suggesting that Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, was offered tickets to a rock concert and helped an Indian tribe represented by Abramoff secure $16 million for a jail despite resistance from Justice Department officials.

"The vast majority of lobbying contacts and meals with White House officials documented in the report were with White House officials other than Ms. Ralston," Waxman said. "It is ludicrous for the White House to say it considers the review of the committee report 'complete' when it has not provided answers to any of the most important questions involving Mr. Mehlman and other senior White House officials."

In an interview Friday, Mehlman said he did not recall any specifics from his dealings with the Abramoff team.

"I can tell you that as political director I was always very careful to make sure everything I did was above board and consistent with the rules," he said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to federal charges as part of an ongoing congressional bribery investigation that continues to loom over Capitol Hill and the GOP. A Senate subcommittee concluded that Abramoff fleeced Indian tribes out of millions of dollars in fees that he split with one of his associates.

One associate, Tony Rudy, a onetime aide to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), has pleaded guilty to conspiracy. He admitted accepting favors, cash and other gifts while working for DeLay and after leaving to become a lobbyist.

According to the House report, Ralston often helped coordinate dealings between the Abramoff team and her bosses.

In October 2001, when Abramoff asked through a series of memos and e-mails that the White House withhold an endorsement from a candidate in the tiny Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, Ralston finally responded: "You win :). KR said no endorsement."

Another set of e-mails suggested Ralston could be interested in parlaying her relationships with Abramoff and the White House into a lucrative business deal, perhaps creating a defense or homeland security firm, but only for the right price.

"It would take a significant amount of money for me to be lured away [from the White House] so unless you're really serious and can make it worth my while, let's wait until 2005," she wrote to Abramoff in November 2002.

Replied Abramoff: "I am not in a position to offer you serious money for this right now."

Secret Papers Could Halt CIA Case (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff intends to load up his criminal trial with information about nine national security matters, the names of foreign leaders and details about various terrorist groups, according to court filings in the Valerie Plame leak case.

The papers filed this week hint at what has been taking place behind closed doors as Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald tries to limit the amount of classified data that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is permitted to use at his trial, scheduled for January.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton is asking whether classified evidence would overlap with what Libby is likely to say in his testimony. Libby's attorneys have said he will take the witness stand to deny lying to the FBI in its investigation of the disclosure of Plame's identity to the media.

Even if prosecutors agreed ahead of time about the importance of the "nine national security matters" he wants to disclose, Libby would be entitled to introduce additional evidence, the lawyers wrote.

In court documents, prosecutors argued that it would be "unnecessarily wasteful of time" to allow Libby to present "names of foreign leaders or government officials of other countries, or the names and histories of various terrorist groups."

The danger for prosecutors is that the sheer volume and sensitivity of the classified information Libby wants to introduce could scuttle the trial. Once the judge identifies classified information Libby is entitled to present, U.S. intelligence agencies must rule on whether the secrets can be declassified. The trial would collapse if the intelligence agencies refuse to declassify the information.

Libby is charged with five felony counts of perjury, obstruction and making false statements to the FBI. He is accused of lying about how he learned of Plame's CIA employment and what he told reporters about her when her husband, former U.S. ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, was accusing the Bush administration of twisting prewar intelligence to help sell the public on waging war against Iraq.

Libby plans to use what his attorneys call "a memory defense" and must be allowed to demonstrate how busy he was, the lawyers say.

Report On Possible Abuses By Former Member Of Intelligence Panel Is Held Up (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — A report on whether a convicted former member of the House Intelligence Committee abused his position has remained under wraps for nearly four months, largely because of a battle between the committee's leaders over issuing a subpoena in the matter, members of Congress say.

Representative Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the committee, complained about the delay in a letter sent Thursday to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan. Ms. Harman protested what she said had been Mr. Hoekstra's refusal to subpoena the former lawmaker, Randy Cunningham, a California Republican.

Mr. Cunningham resigned from Congress in November and is serving an eight-year sentence in federal prison for accepting more than $2 million from supporters and military contractors in return for helping them obtain government business.

Mr. Cunningham's guilty plea centered mainly on his actions as a member of the House Appropriations Committee. He was also a member of the intelligence panel, and its investigation examined whether he tried to improperly influence decisions on classified spending proposals. Mr. Cunningham first sat on the Intelligence Committee in 2001 and for part of last year was chairman of its subcommittee on terrorism and human intelligence.

The committee hired an outside counsel, Michael Stern, to carry out the Cunningham inquiry. Mr. Stern's specific findings are not known, although some Congressional officials have suggested that his report, which was completed in June, is critical of Mr. Cunningham for using the committee's secrecy to conceal his efforts on behalf of friends to insert spending items into classified bills.

The skirmishing over the subpoena and the Cunningham report, as well as its possibly embarrassing conclusions, reflects the erosion of bipartisanship that once flourished on the intelligence panel but has frayed over the years, with the rancor seeming to grow as the November elections approach.

A spokesman for Mr. Hoekstra, Jamal D. Ware, said Mr. Hoekstra wanted to obtain Mr. Cunningham's testimony, which he said was crucial to the inquiry. But Mr. Ware said that issuing a subpoena would not force Mr. Cunningham to testify because the former lawmaker had said he would cite his constitutional right against compelled self-incrimination to refuse to appear before the panel.

Ms. Harman's office declined to comment on the confidential letter, a copy of which was provided to The New York Times by a Congressional official who insisted on anonymity.

In the letter, Ms. Harman also expressed dismay over another issue. She said Mr. Hoekstra wrote her last month saying that he had been in direct contact with Mr. Cunningham — apparently to seek informally his appearance before the committee.

"I am deeply disappointed that you contacted him unilaterally without notifying me," Ms. Harman wrote.

In her letter, Ms. Harman also said, “I again urge you to reconsider your decision not to subpoena him.”

She also wrote about her concern that Mr. Hoekstra might try to visit Mr. Cunningham in prison, saying, “I believe this would be highly inappropriate.”

Ms. Harman said the report should be released now because it was an unclassified document.

Mr. Ware said the report was not meant to be public. He said it had never been assigned a security classification because it had not been reviewed to determine whether it contained classified information.

Cunningham's Wife To Pay U.S. $1.6 Million (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 7, 2006

SAN DIEGO, Oct. 6 -- The estranged wife of disgraced former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham will pay $1.6 million in back taxes and penalties for her role in the bribery scandal that landed him in prison, according to a settlement filed Friday.

The federal government sued Nancy Cunningham last year. The settlement means she will not be prosecuted for any charges relating to her husband's activities, according to papers filed in federal civil court.

Duke Cunningham resigned from Congress and was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison. The eight-term Republican admitted last November that he took $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors in exchange for government contracts and other favors.

The couple separated in July 2005, when FBI agents raided their home in ritzy Rancho Santa Fe, seizing rugs, furniture and jewelry.

Nancy Cunningham's attorney, Douglas Brown, called the deal "a compromise settlement" and said his client intends to file for divorce soon.

Spouse Of Lawmaker Agrees To Penalties (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

The estranged wife of disgraced former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham has agreed to forfeit $760,000 to the IRS from the sale of the couple's Rancho Santa Fe home, acknowledging that they had financed the house, in part, with more than $1 million in bribe money, authorities said Friday.

Additionally, Nancy Cunningham signed an agreement admitting that she had tax violations and will pay $1.6 million in taxes and penalties.

Her husband, a former eight-term Republican congressman from Rancho Santa Fe, pleaded guilty in November to taking $2.4 million in bribes and evading more than $1 million in taxes. In March, he was sentenced to serve 100 months in prison.

An investigation by the FBI and IRS determined that Cunningham bought the home after a defense contractor, Mitchell Wade, paid an inflated price for the Cunninghams' former home in Del Mar Heights. Wade pleaded guilty to federal charges earlier this year.

This week's actions came more than a year after the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego filed a civil forfeiture action against the Cunninghams, declaring that the home had been financed with significant proceeds from a bribe.

Coupled with the $1.2 million already turned over to the IRS from the home's sale, U.S. Atty. Carol Lam said the new court order "returns nearly $2 million to the public … and ensures that the Cunninghams in no way profit from the sordid conduct that occurred in this case."

The most recent payment to the government leaves the Cunninghams with about $900,000 in outstanding tax liability.

In exchange for her acceptance of responsibility in the case and continuing cooperation with an ongoing federal investigation, authorities say they have not filed criminal charges against Nancy Cunningham.

Wins Government Contracts
Boosting Contributions to a Key Senator
By BRODY MULLINS
October 7, 2006; Page A1

Huntsville, Ala.

AS A GRADUATE STUDENT in political philosophy at the University of Virginia, Stewart Hall grew a beard, rented a house in the woods and lived what he calls the "hippie lifestyle."

In 1991, after earning his Ph.D., he set off down a different path. He shaved, squeezed into his only sport coat and drove to Washington to seek a job with Sen. Richard Shelby, a fellow Alabaman. Mr. Shelby hired him as a legislative assistant.

So began Mr. Hall's second education -- in the ways that politics and private enterprise intersect in modern Washington. After working for nearly five years on Capitol Hill, he left government and became a lobbyist.

Stewart Hall in his Washington office

Then, a few years ago, Mr. Hall went one better than the other former aides who prowl the halls of Congress on behalf of government-contracting clients. Mr. Hall, 40 years old, set out to become the client himself. All he needed was a company.

"Business is business, whether it's a government-relations firm or a coffee shop," says Mr. Hall. "You learn lessons in business and life, and you apply those lessons to other ventures."

He decided to create a government contractor nearly from scratch. He assembled a group of investors, many of them fellow lobbyists. Together they bought a 25% stake in Huntsville, Ala.-based Digital Fusion Inc., a small technology-consulting company on the verge of bankruptcy. It did little business with the government, so Mr. Hall set out to beef up its defense-contracting business. Today, it mainly helps government agencies use computer technology for tasks ranging from budget analysis to missile engineering.

That happens to be a growing part of the government's large defense operations in Huntsville, the home terrain of Sen. Shelby.

Mr. Hall hired a slew of people with connections to Congress, the Pentagon and the Department of Homeland Security, including former generals -- unusual star power for a company of its size. Digital Fusion and its officials and investors became the No. 2 financial supporter of the political action committee of Sen. Shelby, a top lawmaker on the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Since then, Digital Fusion has cashed in on the post-9/11 boom in defense and homeland-security spending. It has snagged more than $85 million in federal software contracts. In the two years since Mr. Hall invested in the company, revenue tripled to $20.9 million. The stock shot up as high as $3.75 earlier this year from a low of 15 cents before Mr. Hall showed up.

Friday it closed at $1.50 a share in trading on the OTC Bulletin Board, a market for small stocks. In two years, the value of Mr. Hall and his lobbyist friends' stake has jumped 50% to $3.2 million. Mr. Hall, who sits on the company's board, and one of his investors are entitled to 20% of the company's profit.

AS THE NOVEMBER elections draw near, lobbyists are under more scrutiny than ever. A sweeping Justice Department probe into bribery by lobbyists has netted guilty pleas from a half-dozen of them, including lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and cost three House members their jobs. The scandal gave currency to the view that money and connections can be used to manipulate the appropriations and legislative processes, and that lobbyists are in the thick of such dealing.

Mr. Hall seems to have found a new and legal twist in the lobbying game. There is no evidence that Digital Fusion did anything improper to get its contracts, nor are there any rules against lobbyists like Mr. Hall going after government contracts themselves. Mr. Hall, who is still a lobbyist, says he simply took what he knew about Washington spending and positioned Digital Fusion to benefit.

Neither Mr. Hall nor representatives of most of the federal agencies that awarded contracts to Digital Fusion will discuss in detail how decisions about the contracts were made. Mr. Shelby, 72, says he hasn't lifted a finger to help Digital Fusion or Mr. Hall. "How he does in his private business? Gosh, I don't know," Mr. Shelby says. "My interest is what's best for the nation and how it can help Huntsville."

Mr. Hall, who holds power of attorney for his investment group's stake, says he never asked Mr. Shelby for help, even though he frequently lobbies his former boss on behalf of other government contractors. "I don't think Richard Shelby even knew the name of this company until a few weeks ago," Mr. Hall said in a recent interview.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration, which has awarded work to Digital Fusion, said the company simply won a competitive-bidding process, with no outside help from anyone. Spokespersons for the White House, the State Department, the Homeland Security Department and the Army declined to comment on their decisions to hire Digital Fusion.

Financial ties between lobbyists and their clients are unusual but are no longer unheard of. Over the past few years, some cash-poor companies have paid lobbyists with stock. Mr. Hall received 50,000 shares of Flight Safety Technologies Inc. as compensation for lobbying on the aviation company's behalf as it sought contracts from the Transportation Department and NASA. It is unclear whether Mr. Hall still holds that stake, which would currently be valued at about $93,000.

AT 6 FEET 4 INCHES TALL and more than 250 pounds, Mr. Hall looks more like an offensive guard than a lobbyist. As students at the University of Alabama, he and his wife volunteered for Mr. Shelby's successful 1986 campaign for the U.S. Senate. At the time, Messrs. Shelby and Hall were Democrats.

Mr. Shelby says he thought Mr. Hall would "wind up as a professor." But Mr. Hall says he didn't think he would fit in with the liberal academic world, so he took a job with Mr. Shelby.

When Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994, Mr. Shelby switched parties and became a Republican. So did Mr. Hall. Republicans gave Mr. Shelby a coveted seat on the Appropriations Committee, which funds every program in the federal government. Mr. Hall became his boss's top legislative aide and his envoy to the appropriations panel.

With Republicans in control of Congress for the first time in decades, demand shot up almost overnight for lobbyists with connections to key congressional Republicans. In early 1996, at the age of 30, Mr. Hall left government and founded his own lobbying outfit: G. Stewart Hall & Associates.

The following year, Mr. Shelby became chairman of an appropriations subcommittee that funds highways, bridges and other transportation projects. Later, he snagged top positions on panels allocating money for defense and NASA. Since 1998, Mr. Shelby has issued more than 1,000 press releases touting his success steering billions of federal dollars to Alabama.

Mr. Hall billed $1 million in lobbying fees in his first year, and the next year, he hit $2 million, according to public records. Eventually, his clients included AT&T Inc., FedEx Corp. and Philip Morris, now called Altria Group Inc. A proposal his firm sent to one client touted his connections. With an "especially close relationship with Senator Richard Shelby and his staff," it said, Mr. Hall has "successfully secured millions of dollars in appropriated funds" for clients.

After renaming his firm the Federalist Group, he began hiring other lobbyists, primarily young, Southern Republicans with ties to the top lawmakers. Eventually, he merged with a firm run by Wayne Berman, a top fund-raiser for Mr. Bush whose wife is currently the White House social secretary.

In 2003, Mr. Hall wanted a new challenge, he says, and decided to try to get into the government-contracting business. "I never let a lot of grass grow under my feet," he says.

IN THE MONTHS after the 9/11 attacks, Congress had created the Department of Homeland Security and funded it with a budget that is now $35 billion a year. Wars in Afghanistan and Iraq drove up defense spending to $500 billion last year from $300 billion in 2001. "Money poured into security and defense," says Mr. Hall. "The government as a market became very attractive....We felt like the time was then to start a new business opportunity."

DOJ_NMG_0078456

Mr. Hall figured that Huntsville, one of the nation's defense-contracting hubs, would be a beneficiary. At a gated military compound stretching across 60 square miles of former cotton fields, more than three dozen federal agencies conduct research into defense, space and homeland security. Researchers at the Richard C. Shelby Center for Missile Intelligence analyze foreign missile systems and help U.S. pilots evade enemy attacks. A huge office park across the street is home to more than 200 defense and aerospace contractors. All told, Congress funds about $20 billion in research and development in Huntsville each year, accounting for half the area jobs.

In the fall of 2003, Mr. Hall flew to Huntsville to meet Gary Ryan, a man with a lifetime of experience in Huntsville's contracting business. The two had met a decade earlier when Mr. Hall was an aide on Capitol Hill. When Mr. Hall arrived in Huntsville, he told Mr. Ryan that he could raise the money to buy a small government contractor in Huntsville if Mr. Ryan agreed to run it.

The government tries to help small businesses by setting aside some contracts for them. Within a few months, Messrs. Hall and Ryan had set their sights on Digital Fusion, which had been founded in New Jersey as Internet Broadcasting Systems during the technology boom. The company had struggled to find its niche. Initially it planned to deliver television content over the Internet. Then it shifted to computer networking and Internet services for businesses, then to hosting Web pages and providing Internet service.

It went public in March 1998. In 1999, its shares began plummeting as the dot-com bubble burst. The company shifted course yet again, buying a small Internet consulting firm in Tampa, Fla., and taking the name Digital Fusion. By the end of 2003, its market capitalization had shrunken to $2 million, its revenue was only $6 million, and just a few dozen employees were left.

Only a small portion of Digital Fusion's revenue came from government contracts. Mr. Hall figured it could do more, so he set out to buy a big stake. First, he started an investment fund, named after Madison County, which surrounds Huntsville. He chipped in about $300,000. Mr. Berman, his lobbying partner, invested. So did Ray Cole, another former aide to Mr. Shelby who worked at a competing lobbying firm, and Tom Young, Mr. Shelby's chief of staff for 12 years, then a political adviser to Sen. John McCain. Other investors included onetime top aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott.

Eventually, Mr. Hall raised $2.1 million. Between May and October 2004, Digital Fusion sold his group new stock and warrants that gave it a 27.7% stake, making it the largest single shareholder.

Not long after the deal was completed, the company won a $277,596 contract from the White House to install a customized software program to manage assets.

MUCH OF THE government's missile-defense research and development takes place in Huntsville, so one way to win contracts there is to bid for modeling and simulation work on the systems. Digital Fusion didn't have such a business, so it paid $2.7 million to buy Summit Research Corp., a smaller defense contractor that did, and hired an engineer with three decades of experience in Huntsville's defense industry. Days after the deal was struck, Summit won a $24.4 million Defense Department contract to help design and test software related to the missile-defense shield. John Cummings, a spokesman for the Space and Missile Defense Command, said the contract was awarded after a competitive bidding process.

To help land more contracts, Digital Fusion hired Mr. Shelby's appropriations aide, Joseph Summers. In a press release, Digital Fusion said his "considerable understanding of federal programs and processes will assist us tremendously in our pursuit of opportunities in markets such as NASA, Homeland Security, Intelligence and Defense."

In March 2005, Lt. Gen. Frank Libutti, a former top official at the Department of Homeland Security and a onetime Marine known for doing one-armed pushups during meetings, was hired to find homeland-security contracts. The following month, the company added to its board both Mr. Libutti and former Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, once the Bush administration's reconstruction czar in Iraq.

At about that time, Mr. Shelby became chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that funds science programs, including NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville. Mr. Shelby also served on the defense-spending committee.

Business has rolled in: $49 million to help NASA with accounting and procurement; $11.7 million to help integrate the missile-defense system; $12,554 to install software for the State Department's Baghdad annex; $2,522 to update computer software for the secretary of the Homeland Security Department; and $13,000 to configure computer equipment for the Army.

Although funding for all contracts comes from congressional appropriations committees, bid winners are generally chosen by the government agencies and departments for which the work will be done.

Digital Fusion secured the NASA contract, for example, through a competitive-bidding process run by the space agency's Huntsville-based Marshall Space Flight Center. A report prepared by an agency procurement director said that Digital Fusion's proposal was better than those of two other bidders, and that it "was not a close competition." Mr. Ryan, the seasoned defense-contracting executive recruited early on by Mr. Hall, had once performed similar work for another company. A spokesman for the flight center says the selection of Digital Fusion was based on the recommendation of a committee of experts, including procurement specialists. "No one tried to influence [the] decision in any way," the spokesman says.

Mr. Hall declines to detail how the company goes about winning contracts. The company noted in its 2005 annual report that the "relationships and reputation that many members of our senior management team have established and maintain with government personnel contribute to our ability to maintain good client relations and to identify new business opportunities."

BECAUSE CONGRESS controls the purse strings, lawmakers can deny funding for projects they oppose or beef up spending on pet projects. In the five years before Mr. Hall invested, Digital Fusion executives made a total of $2,250 in political donations to all candidates. Although Mr. Hall says he has never lobbied Mr. Shelby on behalf of Digital Fusion, the company's executives and investors have contributed $60,500 to Mr. Shelby's Defend America PAC. Lawmakers use money from leadership PACs to help colleagues in other races.

Mr. Shelby says he is proud of the amount of defense-contracting money that he has helped bring to Huntsville, although he says he hasn't helped Digital Fusion get any of it. "I work for the community," he says. "It's very important to my state."

Last fall Mr. Hall and his partners sold their lobbying firm to Ogilvy Public Relations Worldwide, part of WPP Group PLC, for more than $20 million. Under the terms of the deal, he will continue to work there for a few more years.

The year Mr. Hall invested in Digital Fusion, it lost $1 million. Last year it reported net income of $7,000, its first profit ever. In September, it said it would deregister its common stock, freeing it from the obligation to file regular financial reports with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The company said doing so would save time and money.

The government accounted for nearly all of its business last year. This summer it opened a Washington office. "If you're not here, you're absent," says Mr. Libutti, the former Marine general, who now serves as the company's chairman and chief executive. "You have to physically be there … . You have to walk the hallways."

Disabled Can't Use Park's Restrooms (APP)

By Bob Cullinane, STAFF WRITER

Asbury Park (NJ) Press, October 7, 2006

Feds: That's an ADA violation

By locking the front door of the Visitor Center in Thompson Park on weekends but leaving the back door open for restroom access, the Monmouth County Park System is likely violating federal law, a spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said Tuesday.

That's because the back door of the Middletown park building is at the top of an eight-step stairway, making the restrooms inaccessible to some people with disabilities, especially those in wheelchairs.

The park system cannot open the facility on weekends — the busiest visiting days in summer — "yet close the only accessible entrance to it" without violating standards of the federal Americans with Disabilities Act, said Eric Holland of the U.S. Department of Justice. His is the agency that enforces the regulations of the disability act.

Holland said that in order to comply with the law, the Park System must provide an entrance accessible to all visitors if it opens the building at all.

The front entrance has a ramp.

Policy not changing

Laura Kirkpatrick, the parks' public information officer, said there are no plans to open the front entrance on weekends.

"There are restroom facilities at the Craft Center (in the park) that are handicapped-accessible," Kirkpatrick said of another park building at the park's western end.

However, there is no sign at the Visitor Center advising people about the other location. And there are no paved public roads connecting the two buildings. Visitors would need to drive outside the park and re-enter at a different entrance on Newman Springs Road.

Kirkpatrick added that since the Visitor Center also houses park employee offices on the second floor, there are security concerns with opening the front entrance on weekends.

"You can't just open and let people walk through," she said of the building, which was recently renovated by the county at a cost of $3.6 million.

"County officials should know better," said Carolyn Schwebel, a Middletown resident who uses both a cane and a wheelchair to get around.

Schwebel, who recently filed a lawsuit charging that Monmouth County violates ADA access regulations at seven other county buildings, said she checked out the VisitorCenter last weekend after an Asbury Park Press story reported the building is closed on weekends. In addition to not having a ramp, "there are also supposed to be two handrails along the stairs," she said of the back entrance. There's only one handrail.

Park officials "probably just didn't think about wheelchairs when they decided to leave the back door open," said Jim Marzano, 70, of Union Beach, who has used a wheelchair his entire life.

"Why don't they just unlock the front door on weekends? That would fix things."

Kirkpatrick, the parks spokeswoman, said that won't happen until sometime in October, when the park celebrates Thompson Park Day with an exhibit in the Visitor Center.

And there's no guarantee that after that, the park will keep the Visitor Center open on weekends.

"We plan to monitor attend-ance and see what kind of visitation we have," she said. "We may just open it seasonally."

"Internal" decision

Kirkpatrick said park officials did not consult with the director of the county's Office on Disabilities, Alexander Buono, about access to Visitor Center on weekends. Buono could not be reached for comment.

Kirkpatrick said park officials also did not contact federal authorities to see if the practice of leaving the center's back door open complied with ADA regulations.

Instead, she said, an "internal committee" made the decision that the park system was not violating ADA guidelines.

Dave Yanchulis, an accessibility specialist with the Access Board, a federal agency that maintains accessibility design standards, agreed that weekend access at the Visitor Center is likely in violation of federal law.

Stan Soden, a coordinator for Moceans, a "center for independent living" in Long Branch, said he is surprised by the county's noncompliance.

"I've been to a number of county parks, and they are relatively accessible in terms of the restrooms," said Soden, who uses a wheelchair.

Pat McShane, the executive director of Moceans, said the organization may contact both the county and the Department of Justice about the issue.

"We'd just like to make sure (the county) is in compliance" with ADA regulations, she said.

Justice Department May Investigate Case Against Sheriff's Office (DAYBNJ)

By Kenya Woodard, Staff Writer

Daytona Beach (FL) News-Journal, October 7, 2006

PALM COAST -- The Flagler County Sheriff's Office could face an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice after a federal commission found "reasonable cause to believe" the office discriminated against an employee who was fired in May.

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said it found "reasonable cause to believe" the Sheriff's Office discriminated against former victim's advocate Vicky Peppin because of her Cuban background, according to a letter dated Aug. 31 from Federico Costales, director of the commission's Miami District.

DOJ_NMG_0078459

In addition, the commission determined "that there was reasonable cause to believe" the Sheriff's Office retaliated against Peppin after she filed her complaint with the EEOC in November 2005, Costales said in a separate letter dated Aug. 31.

In a telephone interview Wednesday, Peppin said she felt compelled to file the complaint to fend off allegations of a poor work performance and to combat the harassment and discrimination she faced.

"The only thing I have is my name," she said. "All I wanted to do was my job."

The EEOC's ruling is the latest controversy involving the Sheriff's Office. The agency is still under a shroud of scandal following the May indictments of six deputies and the former jail director following investigations of inmate abuse. One of those investigations involved State Attorney John Tanner's daughter Lisa being strapped into a restraint chair at the jail. Two deputies were charged with abuse in that incident.

The EEOC's nine-month investigation began when Peppin filed a complaint with the commission in which she stated that she was being "discriminated against, harassed and retaliated against on a daily basis by the new sheriff and his staff."

In addition to the EEOC complaint, Peppin filed a lawsuit this summer in circuit court against the Sheriff's Office alleging wrongful termination.

In her EEOC complaint, Peppin, 45, also charged she was a victim of sex and age discrimination.

However, Costales told Peppin in a letter dated Aug. 31 that evidence obtained by the commission was "insufficient" to support those claims.

Costales told Peppin in a letter dated Sept. 18 that the commission's efforts to settle the case had been "unsuccessful" and it will forward the matter to the Department of Justice "for whatever action is deemed appropriate on this charge."

Peppin voluntarily turned over copies of the commission's ruling and other documents related to the investigation to The Daytona Beach News-Journal.

Sheriff's Office attorney Wayne Helsby said Thursday the EEOC passing the case along to the Department of Justice for review was "just part of the process."

"It doesn't signal anything," he said. "(Department of Justice) may or may not investigate."

Peppin was the former director of the Victim's Services Unit and began working in the Sheriff's Office under former Sheriff Bob McCarthy in 1999.

On Wednesday, Peppin said she never experienced any mistreatment while working under McCarthy or Jim Manfre, who became sheriff in 2000.

But things changed when Sheriff Don Fleming took office in January 2005, she said.

According to Peppin's complaint, Fleming demoted her as director of the victim's services division and cut her salary shortly after taking office. In September 2005, Peppin was formally stripped of her title and the victim's services unit was split between the Sheriff's Office in Bunnell and a precinct in Palm Coast. When Peppin asked about the changes, Look told her it was "due to a perception that we were not doing our jobs" and that "a division with three people did not need a director," the complaint said.

At that time, there were several departments operating with three or fewer people and white directors at the helm, Peppin said in her complaint.

Peppin said Wednesday she was fired from the Sheriff's Office because she filed the EEOC complaint.

But sheriff's officials dispute Peppin's claims in documents obtained by The News-Journal through a public records request.

In a statement to the EEOC, Helsby said Peppin's salary was readjusted after an evaluation found it to be "significantly inflated."

Peppin was "earning the salary of a 10-year supervisor" although she only had seven years of experience, Helsby said.

Peppin's title change was made to comply with the terms of a state grant that financed the victim's services division, Helsby said.

A supervisor also found that Peppin had mismanaged cases and that the Sheriff's Office had received complaints about her job performance from the Department of Children & Families and Diane Christen, director of the Family Life Center, a Flagler County women's shelter, Helsby said.

Peppin was fired in May after an internal investigation found she had violated agency policies and procedures, Helsby said in the statement.

Feds Clear St. Landry Elections (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess, Advocate Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, October 7, 2006

OPELOUSAS — Federal observers found no irregularities in recent elections in St. Landry Parish, federal and state officials said Friday.

But a losing candidate in the town of Washington's mayoral race said he plans to file a legal challenge alleging widespread voter registration fraud.

A team of observers with the U.S. Department of Justice kept watch on last Saturday's elections in St. Landry Parish after complaints of possible racial intimidation of voters, particularly in the sheriff's race.

"They gave us a clean bill of health," said St. Landry Parish Clerk of Court Charles Jagneaux.

Justice Department observers are expected to return to the parish for the Nov. 7 election, which includes a runoff in the sheriff's race between Laura Balthazar and Bobby Guidroz and the general election for U.S. Representative in the 7th Congressional District.

U.S. Atorney Donald Washington said the concern over voter intimidation arose during a routine pre-election meeting between state election officials and Justice Department.

Though federal observers noted no complaints on election day, Washington mayoral candidate Anthony James Soileau said he plans to file a lawsuit Monday to challenge the qualifications of at least 40 voters.

Incumbent Joseph "Joe" Pitre retained the mayor's seat with 299 votes to Soileau's 217. A third candidate, Thirkield Smith, received 58.

Soileau said he began working to verify voter registration records before the election. He alleges that dozens of out-of-towners registered to vote in Washington using the addresses of abandoned houses or the names of dead people.

He also claims that felons who had lost their right to vote were allowed to cast ballots.

"I was amazed how easy it is to commit voter fraud," Soileau said.

Soileau said he does not have evidence linking his opponents to the alleged voter fraud.

Washington, the U.S. attorney, said he has heard second-hand of the complaints of voter fraud in the Town of Washington.

"We do want to take a look at those issues," he said.

An investigation of similar complaints in the 2002 St. Martinville elections resulted in the conviction of a former city councilwoman for falsifying voter registration information to allow people who lived outside of her district to vote there.

Same-sex Rite Stalls Judge Nomination (AP)

By Sam Hananel And Ken Thomas

AP, October 7, 2006

A judge's elevation to the federal bench could be derailed because she helped preside over a commitment ceremony for a lesbian couple four years ago.

Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas has placed a hold on the nomination of Michigan Court of Appeals Judge Janet T. Neff, saying her presence at the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony raises questions about her judicial philosophy.

"It seems to speak about her view of judicial activism," Brownback said Friday. "It's something I want to inquire of her further."

Brownback, a vehement opponent of gay marriage who has presidential ambitions, said he wants to know whether Neff might have presided over "an illegal marriage ceremony" that skirted Massachusetts law. He has asked the Justice Department for a formal legal opinion on Neff's conduct.

Ceremonies marking the union of same-sex couples are usually symbolic events that carry no legal benefits and require no government approval. Massachusetts did not recognize gay marriages in 2002 but legalized same-sex marriage two years later after a ruling from its highest court.

DOJ_NMG_0078461

Conservative activists expressed concerns about Neff after seeing her name in a September 2002 New York Times "Weddings/Celebrations" announcement. It said Neff led the commitment ceremony for Karen Adelman and Mary Curtin with the Rev. Kelly A. Gallagher, a minister of the United Church of Christ.

Both women are former employees of the gay rights group Human Rights Campaign in Washington.

"When she did the commitment ceremony, she was doing it in her role as a judge, and that draws up a serious question," said Tom McClusky, a spokesman for the Family Research Council, a conservative group. "She would be more sympathetic to an activist on the issue of homosexual marriage."

The Senate Judiciary Committee last week approved Neff for a seat on the U.S. District Court in Michigan's Western District, and the nomination is pending before the full Senate. A single senator can block a nomination from moving forward by placing a hold on it.

Neither Neff nor a White House spokesman returned calls seeking comment on Friday.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who learned about the ceremony this week, said based on the newspaper announcement it didn't sound like Neff did anything illegal.

"There's no reason why two people can't stand up and exchange commitments with each other provided they don't do anything illegal," Levin said.

Brownback cited recent instances in California and New York where local officials issued marriage licenses to same-sex couples contrary to existing laws.

"I don't know what she did," Brownback said. "That's why there's a factual question."

Gay activists call Brownback's inquiry a publicity stunt that is irrelevant to Neff's qualifications.

"This has got nothing to do with legal or ethical concerns by Sam Brownback and everything to do with him finding another opportunity to show himself to be the mean-spirited bigot that he is," said Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign.

Neff, 61, has served on the Michigan Court of Appeals since 1989. She was nominated by President Bush in June — along with Grand Rapids attorney Robert Jonker and Berrien County Circuit Judge Paul Maloney — to fill three vacancies on the district court.

Levin said Neff was nominated along with Jonker and Maloney as part of an agreement he and Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., reached with the White House. Brownback said Neff has a more liberal reputation while Jonker and Maloney are considered conservatives.

McClusky said he doesn't understand why Bush struck a deal to appoint Neff and said the president is going back on his promise to appoint judges in the mold of Supreme Court Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

Bush has long advocated a ban on gay marriage. In July, a proposed constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage failed to win the needed two-thirds support in both the Senate and House.

Forty-five states have either constitutional amendments banning gay marriage or statutes outlawing same-sex weddings. Twenty states, including Michigan, have approved bans on same-sex marriage, and eight states are considering similar measures in November.

ANTITRUST:

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Looking Sweeter (AJC)

By Scott Leith, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 7, 2006

Federal regulators are still weighing their approval of AT&T's deal to acquire BellSouth. But the buyout, as it draws close, has earned the blessing of Wall Street.

Slowly but surely, shares of AT&T and BellSouth have climbed since the companies announced their deal March 5. As a result, the value of the transaction has spiked by about $10 billion, to a total of about $99 billion at the moment. AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is easily the most expensive acquisition involving a Georgia company — ever.

DOJ_NMG_0078462

BellSouth shares, which closed at $31.46 just prior to the news that AT&T would buy the company, have been trading in the mid-to-low $40s lately. Shares topped $44 on Sept. 25, their highest level in five years but still well below the all-time peak of $52.31 on April 11, 2000.

The jump is particularly noteworthy in Georgia, home to a high concentration of BellSouth shareholders — about 50,000 of them. After the deal closes, those shareholders will get AT&T stock, which has traded upward in tandem with BellSouth.

AT&T shares, meanwhile, have partly recovered from their malaise. AT&T, formerly known as SBC Communications, reached a high of $33.49 on Sept. 25, which put shares in territory not seen since the middle of 2002.

The spike in share prices means the value of the deal has jumped, given that AT&T's purchase of BellSouth is an all-stock transaction. At current prices, the deal is valued at about $77 billion in stock and $22 billion in BellSouth debt.

Announced deal put worth at $89B

When the deal was announced, the price tag was $67 billion in stock plus $22 billion in debt, for a total of $89 billion.

BellSouth shareholders will receive 1.325 shares of AT&T for each share of BellSouth.

Analyst Tim Horan, of CIBC World Markets, recently raised his targets for AT&T performance. He thinks the deal will help earnings next year instead of causing a slight drag.

But analysts differ on AT&T's expected performance. The consensus estimate is for shares to be trading at about $33 a year from now. But Horan, who is bullish, believes AT&T will climb to $40.

Though BellSouth Chairman and Chief Executive Duane Ackerman was criticized at times for not pursuing deals that could have expanded the company, spokesman Jeff Battcher said the results show the sale to AT&T was the right move.

"With a 60 percent increase in our stock price in the last 12 months, it is clearly obvious that shareholders overwhelming approve of the direction that Duane Ackerman has put BellSouth on," Battcher said.

Before the deal can close, AT&T needs approval from the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission.

The DOJ could announce a decision at any time; the FCC is scheduled to vote on the issue Thursday, although meeting times have been known to change.

EPA Criticized For Not Toughening Soot Law (LAT)

By Janet Wilson

The Los Angeles Times, October 7, 2006

Up to 24,000 lives could be saved annually in the U.S., and savings on healthcare and in other areas would outweigh the costs, a panel says.

As many as 24,000 lives — a large number of them Californians' — could have been saved each year if the head of the Environmental Protection Agency had tightened soot standards by one microgram per cubic meter annually, according to an analysis released Friday.

The cost-benefit analysis also shows that although the tab for power plants, refineries, auto manufacturers and other industry for such a change would be about $1.9 billion a year — or about $15 per household — the savings in healthcare costs, work and school attendance and other benefits would be between $4.3 billion and $51 billion.

Exposure to soot, or fine particulate matter, has been repeatedly linked to respiratory and cardiac illness and premature death. Southern California and the San Joaquin Valley have the worst fine particulate pollution in the nation, largely because of diesel-powered vehicles. The estimates found as many as 6,400 lives would be saved annually in California.

By law, the EPA is not allowed to consider the costs of a new regulation. But it, along with all other federal agencies, is required to calculate them. The agency is required to consider health benefits.

EPA administrator Stephen Johnson has been harshly criticized by medical groups, environmentalists and his own science advisors for his Sept. 21 decision to retain a standard allowing annual exposure of 15 micrograms per cubic meter, rather than tightening it to 14 micrograms or fewer.

DOJ_NMG_0078463

The American Medical Assn., the American Lung Assn., pediatric and environmental groups and scores of doctors and academics who specialize in heart and lung disease had asked Johnson to set a standard of between 12 and 14 micrograms per cubic meter of air for fine particulates, saying that study after study had shown a correlation between increased exposure to soot and higher numbers of illnesses and deaths.

Friday's online posting unleashed a new round of criticism.

"It's pretty sobering and shocking stuff to realize the agency concluded the human cost of refusing to strengthen these air quality protections was going to be [thousands of lives] lost each year," said attorney John Walke, the clean air director for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Walke said that although the cost to industry "is not insignificant … it pales in comparison to the $50 billion annually that they project will be incurred in healthcare costs as a result of the failure to upgrade the standards."

"It's pretty darned obvious that better standards would mean fewer premature deaths," said Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch.

Industry representatives could not be reached for comment late Friday.

Johnson did significantly tighten daily exposure amounts to soot, cutting the allowable level from 65 to 35 micrograms, which electric industry representatives in particular had criticized as being of unproven need and costly. The same analysis released Friday shows as many as 13,000 lives will be saved as a result of that change, at a cost of $5 billion annually, with $9 billion to $76 billion in social benefits. Johnson was not available for comment Friday. He said at the time of his decision that "reasonable minds can disagree" and that there was disagreement among scientists on the evidence concerning annual particulate exposure.

But the analysis released Friday shows that every member of a 12-member panel of scientists convened at the request of the White House Office of Management and Budget and National Academy of Sciences found that thousands of additional lives could be saved if the tougher annual standard were adopted.

The panel was made up of authors of the studies that Johnson used and specialists picked by their peers as the leading experts in particulate pollution. All reviewed the available literature on soot illness and death and primarily relied on the same two studies that Johnson did in making their estimates.

"I feel that he didn't really take into account the best available science, which is now saying very clearly that there are very significant health effects related to this longer-term exposure," said Dr. Bart Ostro, one of the 12 panelists and chief of the air pollution epidemiology section for the California EPA.

Ostro said the science panel had set risk percentages of increased illness and mortality, which the EPA then converted into possible deaths based on U.S. population and total death rates. Under a limit of 14 micrograms, those estimates found a range of lives saved from 2,200 to 24,000, or an average 13,000 annually. In all cases, the highest number of deaths avoided would be in California.

Ostro said that because California has the most fine particulate pollution and a large population, "we would see a large chunk of the benefits" if the standard were set at 14 micrograms.

"We're talking about … hospitalization and emergency room visits, asthma attacks and work loss as well as mortality," he said.

Acting assistant EPA administrator William Wehrum, who worked with Johnson on the new rules, said Friday that the new analysis was not ready when Johnson made his decision, so it was not included as part of that process. But it would be helpful in future regulations, he said, adding that Johnson and agency staff "absolutely considered impacts to human health."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Indicts 56 On Drug, Laundering Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Federal authorities yesterday announced the indictment of 56 persons on drug-smuggling and money-laundering charges, 27 of whom were arrested for their purported links to international drug cartels.

The arrests were part of "Operation Watusi," coordinated by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), along with the FBI's "Operation Green Traketon" -- operating under the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force.

The investigations focused on drug cartels that operated in Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Martin, Netherlands Antilles, the U.S. Virgin Islands, the British Virgin Islands and the Dominican Republic.

ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said simultaneous arrests took place in several countries. Numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts were seized, along with $3.1 million cash, about 4,000 pounds of cocaine and six boats.

According to one of the indictments, a purported leader of one of the organizations, Luis Pena-Pena, coordinated the kidnapping of an undercover ICE agent in Medellin, Colombia, in December. The indictment also said a ransom of $2 million was requested for the release of the undercover agent.

The purported drug traffickers, who thought they were dealing with a drug smuggler, later discovered the kidnapped man was a U.S. drug agent and he was released.

"We will leave no stone unturned in hunting down those that kidnap and threaten undercover ICE agents. In this case, our agent was fortunate to escape with his life," said Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie B. Myers, who heads ICE.

Two of eight indictments in the probe said the cartel members and their co-conspirators coordinated the transportation of multimillion-dollar shipments of cocaine from South America to Puerto Rico via boat. Seven of the eight indictments accused cartel members of laundering the narcotics proceeds through various financial transactions.

Mr. Boyd said the cash was laundered through a complex money-laundering scheme known as the "Black Market Peso Exchange."

During the investigation, Mr. Boyd said federal agents were able to infiltrate money-laundering and drug-trafficking organizations, identifying the source of the drugs, the foreign and domestic drug transporters, a distributor and money launderers. As a result of the simultaneous arrests, he said, federal agents dismantled several drug-trafficking and money-laundering organizations.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Pushes Guest Worker Program (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 7, 2006

President Bush on Friday shoehorned a plug for his guest worker program between making a joke about an award winner and listening to love songs Friday at a White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month.

Bush said that as lawmakers debate immigration policy, they need to remember that while enforcing U.S. borders is important, it is only one step in the struggle to stop illegal immigration. He pressed Congress to pass his guest worker program to legally bring in new foreign workers and give some of the country's illegal immigrants a shot at U.S. citizenship.

"We must understand that you can't kick 12 million people out of your country — that we must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship," Bush said.

"Nobody in our land wants to grant automatic amnesty. But everybody in our land understands these people must be treated with respect and dignity," he continued. "There are citizenship lines for people from our neighborhood. People ought to be given a chance to get at the back of the citizenship line and have a chance."

Latin pop singer Ana Christina closed the event in the East Room with three love songs, singing one in English and two in Spanish.

Bush opened the event with a few jokes.

DOJ_NMG_0078465

"I am proud to be here with Lt. Col. Consuelo Kickbusch," Bush said about an influential Hispanic motivational speaker and the highest ranking Hispanic woman in the Army, who won the 2006 Hispanic Heritage Award.

"Interesting name: Kickbusch," Bush said. "Sounds like a political campaign."

President Touts Alien Citizenship (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

On the heels of signing a bill to boost border security funding, President Bush yesterday said immigration reform requires granting citizenship to current illegal aliens.

"You can't kick 12 million people out of your country," Mr. Bush said at the White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month. "We must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship."

Since this spring, Mr. Bush has been a supporter of allowing some illegal aliens to earn citizenship, and he backed a Senate plan that divided immigrants, giving longtime illegal aliens a chance for citizenship while withholding that chance from less-entrenched illegal aliens.

Any action on immigration will have to wait until Congress returns, either during a lame-duck session after next month's elections or next year, when a new Congress is sworn in.

But in the meantime, Mr. Bush will soon sign a bill authorizing 700 miles of fence to be built along the U.S.-Mexico border. This week he signed a spending bill that included the first installment of money for that fence, as well as for other infrastructure such as vehicle barriers and ground-based radar.

The fence is already stirring the political pot, even before construction begins.

Mexican officials sent a diplomatic protest to the Bush administration this week and have said they doubt the fence will ever be built. A report in The Washington Post yesterday seemed to concur, stating that the wording of the fence and spending measures gives the Bush administration so much leeway that it is unlikely the 700 miles will be completed.

But Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican, who wrote the fence provisions that passed last year as part of the House's enforcement-only bill, said yesterday that building the fence is not optional.

He held a press conference yesterday on the U.S.-Mexico border to address the report and said the language in the bill means the administration "shall" build it.

During the celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month Mr. Bush praised U.S. troops who are Hispanic, noting that more than 200,000 are in uniform now.

He also urged that the immigration debate not turn nasty.

"We are a land of immigrants, and as we debate immigration policy, we must always keep that important fact in mind," Mr. Bush said.

It is the first time the president has used the phrase "earn citizenship," a description popular among groups that lobby for granting rights to illegal aliens. But many critics, including Republican leaders, equate that concept with amnesty.

Mr. Bush had some fun with one of yesterday's visitors to the White House, retired Lt. Col. Consuelo Kickbusch, winner of the 2006 Hispanic Heritage Award for leadership.

"Interesting name, 'Kickbusch' -- sounds like a political campaign," the president said.

Silencing Of A Speech Causes A Furor (NYT)

By Karen W. Arenson And Damien Cave

The New York Times, October 7, 2006

When protesters stormed a Columbia University stage on Wednesday evening, shutting down a speech by the head of a fiercely anti-immigration group, they not only stopped the program, but also hurtled the university back into the debate over free speech on campus.

DOJ_NMG_0078466

The fracas, which came just weeks after the president of Iran was invited to speak at Columbia and then told not to come, was captured live by Columbia's student-run television station, CTV, as well as by two commercial stations. It was shown repeatedly on television in New York yesterday and was widely available on the Internet.

Yesterday Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg chastised Columbia for the disruption. "I think it's an outrage that somebody that was invited to speak didn't get a chance to speak," he said in response to a question on his weekly radio program.

"Bollinger's just got to get his hands around this," Mr. Bloomberg added, referring to Columbia's president, Lee C. Bollinger. "There are too many incidents at the same school where people get censored," he said, using Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as an example.

This time the speaker, invited by a campus Republican group, was Jim Gilchrist, the head of the Minuteman Project, which assembled hundreds of volunteers last year, some armed, to patrol the Arizona-Mexico border for illegal immigrants.

Mr. Bollinger, a legal scholar whose specialty is free speech and the First Amendment, quickly condemned this week's disruption.

"Students and faculty have rights to invite speakers to the campus," he said yesterday in an interview. "Others have rights to hear them. Those who wish to protest have rights to do so. No one, however, shall have the right or the power to use the cover of protest to silence speakers."

He added, "There is a vast difference between reasonable protest that allows a speaker to continue, and protest that makes it impossible for speech to continue."

Monique Dols, a senior in history at Columbia's School of General Studies, said she had mounted the stage in protest and unfurled a banner but that at such events in the past the speakers had kept going.

"We have always been escorted off the stage and the event continues," she said, adding that this time the protesters were attacked.

"We were punched and kicked," she said. "Unfortunately, the story being circulated is that we initiated the violence."

While college campuses have long been battlegrounds for freedom of speech issues, Columbia seems to attract more attention than most when such problems arise, perhaps because of its location in New York and its history of political protest.

Mr. Bollinger, who has held high-level positions at the University of Michigan and Dartmouth, said he did not believe that Columbia was unusual in the number of disputes over free speech. Officials are studying whether disciplinary steps are warranted, he said.

On campus yesterday, many people condemned the silencing of Mr. Gilchrist.

"I think it was really wrong not to let him speak," said Anusha Sriram, 18, a Columbia freshman studying political science and human rights, who moved to the United States from Mumbai five years ago. "He wasn't being violent. He was giving his view peacefully."

She said she was upset that by keeping Mr. Gilchrist from speaking, the protesters had unwittingly turned the tables of the discussion against themselves.

"That just undermined the entire protest," she said. "Now everyone looks at the protest in a bad light instead of him in a bad light."

She added, "They should invite him back and maybe set up a debate."
